Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

Limited List Prescribing

1. Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the proposals to limit the range of drugs prescribed under the National Health Service.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): The proposals for limited list prescribing announced on 8 November 1984 by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services have been the subject of consultation with the medical, dental and pharmaceutical professions and the pharmaceutical industry. The consultation period ended on 31 January and the many responses received are now being considered.

Mr. Raffan: Will my hon. Friend give the most serious consideration to the introduction of an over-rule that drugs not on the list may be prescribed under the NHS subject to accountability to the local general medical committee? Would that not ensure not only that doctors could meet all clinical needs, but that they would be less likely to trade up, which could dramatically reduce savings?

Mr. Roberts: I appreciate my hon. Friend's comment. He will know that it is our intention that the list of NHS drugs should meet all clinical needs, but if it is demonstrated that there is a real problem in particular circumstances, we shall consider how best to deal with it. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his suggestion.

Mr. Abse: The 900 people employed at the Parke-Davis factory in my constituency could be severely affected if the list is restricted. Has the Secretary of State for Wales, as I requested, made representations to his colleague the Secretary of State for Social Services pointing out the serious employment consequences if the proposed drugs list goes through?

Mr. Roberts: My right hon. Friend has of course been closely involved with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services because of the responsibility that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has for health in Wales. He has made known his views about likely effects on the pharmaceutical industry in Wales. I cannot comment further on our proposal until conclusions have been reached.

Sir Raymond Gower: Is it possible for my hon. Friend to give assurances that where there is a long history of a patient being allergic or intolerant to certain generic drugs, but able to take some particular proprietary drug, the doctor will have some scope for selecting such a drug?

Mr. Roberts: My hon. Friend is basically on the same point as my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan), and I stress yet again that it is our intention that the list should meet all clinical needs, but we are aware of problems, and they will be considered before the final list is drawn up.

Dr. Roger Thomas: Why does the Minister not accept the method suggested by the Greenfield report, which will lead to savings in the drugs bill that will not discriminate against the less well-off members of our society?

Mr. Roberts: We have no intention of discriminating against the less well-off members of our society, and I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the comments by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health in an Adjournment debate last Thursday. He said:

"The Government have no intention of debarring any of the poor or elderly from the treatment, free if necessary, under the NHS that they require. We have every intention that under the NHS it should be possible for doctors and patients to have access to a complete list of preparations, which is sufficient to cope with all the clinical and medical needs of the service."—[Official Report, 7 February 1985; Vol. 72, c. 1231.]

Mr. Best: Is my hon. Friend aware that there is a capacity for real saving in the prescribing of drugs by ensuring that doctors, whether through oversight or otherwise, do not over-prescribe? Many recipients of drugs commonly find that they are given far more than they need for a course of treatment. Will my hon. Friend look into that aspect?

Mr. Roberts: The point has been made by hon. Members on each side of the House, in particular in the debate on 8 November. There has been a doubling of the cost of drugs used in Wales. In 1978-79 the cost was £41·2 million; in 1983-84 it had risen to £80·7 million. That is an increase of 96 per cent.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Does the Minister appreciate that Aneurin Bevan introduced a National Health Service based on the principle that the best health service should be available to all, and that money should not be the consideration or the passport to better and quicker treatment?

Does he further appreciate that the proposal to limit the range of drugs will, if implemented, bring a two-tier system of medical care into every surgery, and that such a system has been banished since 1948?

Mr. Roberts: It is clear that the hon. Gentleman has not listened to my remarks. It is our intention that the drugs list will cope with all clinical needs of people within the Health Service.

Heath Hospital, Cardiff

2. Mr. Abse asked the Secretary of State for Wales why the details of the settlement between the Welsh Health Services Technical Organisation, S. W. Milburn and Partners and W. S. Atkins and Partners pertaining to structural and material defects at the Heath hospital, Cardiff, were not published at the time of the settlement; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): Yes, Sir. I intend to make a statement to the House tomorrow.

Mr. Abse: So grave, in my judgment, is the breach that the Secretary of State for Wales has committed against the House in this matter, that he could do no other than reply that he will make a statement. But in the meantime, will the Secretary of State, having presided over the most massive administrative blunder in the history of the Welsh Office, and being known throughout Wales as Mr. "Nobody-tells-me-anything" Edwards, will he explain why, in a parliamentary reply in May 1983, he denied me access to reports on the hospital on the ground that they were relevant to litigation, and now admits that he so failed to monitor the chaos of that litigation that he knew of the final settlement only by reading the South Wales Echo?

Why does the Secretary of State shamelessly seek to blame his own civil servants, including, of course, Mr. Lloyd, his assistant principal secretary, who, on his behalf, signed the settlement? Even more absurdly, why is the Secretary of State trying to blame a Labour Administration when it was in his period of office that the decision had to be made whether to issue writs, and when all he did was to issue a writ that was five days late?

Finally—[HON. MEMBERS: "No. Too long."]—since the Secretary of State clearly has no control over his own Department, why does he not have the dignity to admit ministerial responsibility and resign?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appeal for briefer questions, otherwise we shall not get anywhere today.

Mr. Edwards: So many, so serious, so wild and so inaccurate are the allegations that I think it best that I deal with them all in the statement tomorrow. The hon. Gentleman is wrong in most of his allegations, including the allegation that the matter was out of time.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend is to be congratulated on the way that he has acted so typically quickly and completely correctly in the matter, in obtaining a full disclosure of all the information.

Will my right hon. Friend consider telling the House, in his statement tomorrow, whether it would be appropriate for the matter to be considered by the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs, as the important point now is to ensure that it does not happen again?

Mr. Edwards: I would welcome the fullest possible examination, becsause it is a story that covers many years, many organisations, many people, and different Administrations. I believe that there are lessons to be learnt from it. I will accept my degree of responsibility in the matter; I hope that others involved will accept theirs.

Mr. Williams: When he makes his statement, will the Secretary of State explain how he reconciles the concept of ministerial responsibility with his statement that he knew about the settlement only when he read about it last week in the newspapers? Will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind that the House will not accept as honourable a Cabinet Minister who tells the House, "It is not my fault. My officials got it wrong."?

Mr. Edwards: I shall deal with those points in my statement tomorrow. It might also be a good idea if at some point it could be decided whether it is right that your rulings, Mr. Speaker, should appear for the first time not in the House but in the South Wales Echo.

Mr. Barry Jones: In supporting what my right hon. and hon. Friends have said, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman to say whether the legal proceedings and writs involve any other major hospitals in the Principality? Has the right hon. Gentleman in any way concealed the true cost of repairs at the Heath hospital? In his estimate of an outline cost of £4 million, in reply to a parliamentary question from me, did he leave out the cost of repairing the roofs?

Mr. Edwards: That £4 million figure is absolutely correct and will be dealt with in my statement tomorrow. A writ was issued on 1 November in respect of Ysbyty Gwynedd and a statement of claim is being prepared.

Cigarette Smoking

3. Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he has taken to discourage cigarette smoking *(a)*in his Department and (b) amongst the general public in Wales since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In addition to various nationwide activities by the Government to discourage smoking, specific action in Wales includes the provision of funds for Action on Smoking and Health and the production of bilingual advice to retailers and schools to combat smoking by children. Within the Welsh Office, certain no smoking areas are already designated and an extension of them is being considered.

Mr. Grist: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind the cost in lives and to the Health Service in Wales of cardiac and respiratory diseases, let alone cancer? What success is his campaign likely to have?

Mr. Roberts: Of course I hope that our campaign is very successful in Wales. My hon. Friend is certainly right, in that many deaths and much of the incidence of heart disease are due to smoking. Indeed, I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security on 14 December 1984. It is because of the relationship, particularly in Wales, between smoking and heart disease that the health community in Wales welcomes the Welsh heart programme.

Mr. Soames: Will my hon. Friend take it from me that such interference is absolutely intolerable? Although I accept that there is everything to be said for educating children about smoking, will my hon. Friend accept that if adults wish to smoke,, that is entirely up to them and has nothing to do with the state?

Mr. Roberts: No, I cannot agree with my hon. Friend. There is a connection between smoking and disease. Although I am a smoker, I say so with regret, and can only say video meliora proboque deteriora sequor.

Local Authorities (Capital Expenditure)

5. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will ensure that Government measures to restrict capital expenditure by local authorities in Wales take full account of the loss of assisted area status and of diminished access to European Economic Community loans and grants.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Government measures announced last December are restrictive only in the sense that they should ensure a much closer match between local authorities' capital spending and the sum allowed for this in the Government's expenditure plans than has been the case this year under the previous arrangements.

Sir Anthony Meyer: In the light of that reply, will my right hon. Friend assure me that no local authority will find that its calculations on the availability of capital for urban schemes or such like will be seriously affected by the unexpected withdrawal of assisted area status, leading in turn to reduced ability to obtain, for example, loans from the European Investment Bank?

Mr. Edwards: Capital allocations are now largely determined by formulae agreed with the local authority associations. Urban programme applications are considered individually on their merits. As I have already told my hon. Friend, we are considering whether any further action is possible in connection with the European Community.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge that Government restrictions on capital expenditure have, to some extent, at least in mid-Wales, been counterbalanced by the successful activities of Mid-Wales Development? When shall we hear that Mid-Wales Development is to have a substantially increased budget for the next financial year?

Mr. Edwards: I agree that Mid-Wales Development has been doing extremely good work. For example, I welcome its contribution to the recent Laura Ashley decision. The announcement about the budget will be made shortly. I cannot anticipate the amount, but among other matters the Laura Ashley involvement will be properly taken into account.

Mr. Best: Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that local authorities' accumulated capital receipts will remain theirs to spend and that they will be spent by the local authorities as soon as it is possible to remove the restrictions by the Government on that spending?

Mr. Edwards: Yes. We have already said that we intend local authorities to spend the money over a number of years rather than in a single year, since many of them have already, in effect, used the money once by increasing their borrowing in the last year or two. We shall have to spread the expenditure over more than a single year.

Cynon Valley (Housing Survey)

7. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales what response he has made to the findings of the Cynon Valley housing survey.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The 1981 Welsh house condition survey had already made clear the poor condition of much of the housing in the south Wales valleys. As the House well knows, the need for extensive renovation and repair lay behind the Government's recent grants initiative. The particular situation in Cynon valley—as in all district council areas—was taken into account when determining the housing capital expenditure allocations.

Mrs. Clywd: I am afraid that the Minister has not answered the question. On 24 January my council in the Cynon valley sent the Minister the house condition survey of the valley, which that 48 per cent. of private housing is unfit for human habitation. Will the Minister receive a deputation from the council and make additional resources available under the capital programme, to come out of the housing improvement programme, to deal with the serious and shocking housing conditions in the Cynon valley which without doubt are the worst in Wales and probably the worst in the whole of Britain?

Mr. Roberts: I am already aware of the council's request to send a deputation to see my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Consultative mechanisms already exist for discussing such matters. It would be easier to be more sympathetic Cynon valley if it had a better record of spending on renovating its private sector stock.

Mr. Roy Hughes: When will the Government recognise the need to build new houses in areas such as the Cynon valley, which has such massive unemployment? Does the Minister agree that a housing drive would not only improve the infrastructure at a stroke, but provide jobs where they are so vitally needed?

Mr. Roberts: It is for the local authorities to decide their spending priorities within their allocations. There is a record spend on housing for 1984-85. Apart from 1983-84, when there was exceptionally high expenditure on improvement grants, 1984-85 is the subject of the highest forecast expenditure figure for housing in Wales over a run of years going back to 1978-79.

River Dee (Pollution)

8. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps are proposed to minimise the further risk of pollution of the River Dee.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Improved monitoring introduced following the pollution incident in January 1984 has enabled recent incidents to be detected in sufficient time to prevent polluted water entering the public supply. A working group established by the statutory water undertakers which abstract water from the Dee is considering the need for further measures, and its report will be made public shortly.

Dr. Marek: I accept that the majority of companies act responsibly after a pollution incident. However, does the Minister agree that, in the light of the phenol incident last year, it would be desirable if there was an obligation on companies to notifiy the water authority as soon as possible after any pollution incident?

Mr. Roberts: I am very glad to tell the hon. Gentleman something that he may already know — that the last incident, when some melamine was deposited in the river, was reported by the company of its own volition. I agree that when pollution is even suspected it is highly desirable that any company associated with it or knowing anything about it should report it to the relevant authority.

Mr. Raffan: Will my hon. Friend tell me how much the voluntary system depends on the co-operation of local companies? Will he assure us that they can all be relied upon to be as conscientious as Kronospan at Chirk?

Mr. Roberts: The procedures adopted after the first phenol pollution incident in January 1984 have been very successful. Although there have been two pollution incidents since then, the intakes of water from the Dee into the public supply system were closed in time so that the pollutants did not enter the supply system. The water authorities and the companies involved are to be congratulated on their prompt action after the phenol incident.

Mr. Barry Jones: Is the Minister aware that the Connahs Quay town council and the Alyn and Deeside district council still favour a public inquiry into the phenol incident, which poisoned many thousands of my constituents? Is the hon. Gentleman further aware that those who requested a public inquiry were told that a court case would ensue? It did not ensue. People on Deeside are angry and astonished that there is not to be a public inquiry. May we have one, please?

Mr. Roberts: We must ask ourselves whether a public inquiry would serve any useful purpose, and I believe that the answer to that is no. Following the phenol incident, the chief executives of the authorities and the companies concerned set up, their own inquiry and instituted remedial action. In addition, something known as the Dee working group was set up and it will be reporting shortly. When the report is published, I hope that Opposition Members will give it as much publicity as they can so that consumers' fears are allayed.

Labour Statistics

9. Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are unemployed in (a) Clwyd and (b) Wales compared with 1979, as a total and as a percentage; and, of the total unemployed, how many are long-term unemployed.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 10 January 1985 there were 25,105 unemployed claimants in Clwyd. A comparable claimant-based figure for 1979 is not available. The figure for registered unemployed in January 1979 was 13,569. For Wales as a whole, for the same dates, the figures on a claimant-basis calculation were 185,529 and 86,416 respectively, an increase of 114·7 per cent. The latest figures for the long-term unemployed relate to January 1985, when 75,697 had been unemployed in Wales for over one year.

Mr. Jones: In the light of those quite disparate figures, will the right hon. Gentleman seek an emergency jobs package from his Cabinet colleagues? Will not his tenure of office be remembered as terribly destructive to manufacturing industries in Wales? With more than one in five men in Wales jobless, and growing social and economic problems ensuing from those policies, is not the right hon. Gentleman's record the worst of any Secretary of State for Wales?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that we are spending about £2 billion on employment and special training measures, and that more than 41,000 people in Wales were covered by those measures at the end of December 1984. There is also a massive capital programme in Wales. I am glad to say that, as a result of the activities of the agencies and other Government initiatives, a large quantity of new investment is being made, much of it in Clwyd, which has been outstandingly successful in attracting new projects which are building their labour forces.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the process of finding badly needed new jobs in Clwyd would have begun much earlier and been much more successful had it not been for pressure from both sides of the House to delay the closure of the steelworks at Shotton?

Mr. Edwards: The problems of the steel industry were undoubtedly magnified by the fact that essential decisions were not taken earlier. But hon. Members on both sides of the House must welcome the way in which the Welsh steel industry has faced competition during the past two or three years and made itself outstandingly successful.

Mr. Foot: In view of those terrible figures — the worst in Wales, at any rate since the 1930s — will the Secretary of State take into account the fact that he has added insult to grievous injury by telling me in a letter that the cut in regional aid will assist in creating employment? When will the cut have that beneficial effect, and what will be its precise effect in the areas deprived of special development status?

Mr. Edwards: We believe that the new regional scheme will be more beneficial and cost-effective than the previous scheme. There will be no cut in regional expenditure in Wales during the next couple of years; the reduction will come only after that. The area which the right hon. Gentleman represents retains the highest level of assistance under the new scheme and is in an especially good position to compete.

Mr. Grist: Does my right hon. Friend agree that major contributors to unemployment are political strikes and real pay rates increasing faster than productivity?

Mr. Edwards: Political strikes are undoubtedly especially damaging, although it must be said that any industrial dispute may threaten jobs. I hope that the unhappy dispute now taking place in Merthyr will be brought to an end, because we all hope that the new investment being committed for the Hoover plant there will go ahead and that the future of that plant will be safeguarded.

Mr. Rowlands: This is a civil question, and I hope that I shall receive a civil answer from the Secretary of State. When does he expect the figures for unemployment, in percentage and number terms, to return to the figures for May 1979?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that no Minister in any Administration has ever made such a forecast. It would be foolish to do so.

Council House Sales

10. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many council houses have been sold to sitting tenants in Wales since May 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: A total of 39,432 council dwellings were sold to sitting tenants in Wales between May 1979 and 30 September 1984. In addition, 2,292 dwellings were sold by the Cwmbran Development Corporation and Mid-Wales Development.

Mr. Knox: How do those figures relate to right-to-buy applications?

Mr. Roberts: There were more than 60,000 right-to-buy applications to Welsh local authorities. In addition, more than 3,000 applications were received from tenants of Mid-Wales Development and the Cwmbran Development Corporation. At the end of September 1984, sales represented about 59 per cent. of right-to-buy applications and about 88 per cent. of live applications. Offer notices have been issued to about 88 per cent. of applicants.

Mr. Anderson: The Minister, in response to an earlier question, ingenuously said that housing expenditure this year was the highest since 1978-79, thus comparing expenditure with years of Conservative control only. Does he not feel some shame at the fact that sales of council houses have gone ahead at a time when house building in both the public and private sectors has slumped terribly under this Government and when the property that is being sold is not being replaced?

Mr. Roberts: The hon. Gentleman knows only too well that sales of council houses to sitting tenants do not decrease the housing stock. The secure tenants who have bought would have remained as tenants had they not become owners. There is no doubt that sales of council houses have resulted in considerable receipts for local authorities, and those receipts have been spent on improving older properties. The Government's policy has been extremely successful both in increasing home ownership and in improving the housing stock.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Is my hon. Friend satisfied that the principles of the right-to-buy legislation are being extended fairly to all tenants of houses owned by county councils in Wales?

Mr. Roberts: My hon. Friend will know that the Housing and Building Control Act 1984 extended the right to buy to groups of tenants who did not previously qualify, including some county council tenants. The Act increased the maximum discount to 60 per cent. and introduced the right to buy on a shared ownership basis. I am satisfied with the implementation of the Act.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the Minister agree that one result of the sale of council houses is that district councils have been supplying large sums of money by way of mortgages? If so, will he explain why the Welsh Office is dictating to district councils what they can do with the mortgages? As the mortgages are the assets of the district councils, they should be allowed to use them as such.

Mr. Roberts: Local authorities have been lending money for the purchase of council houses. That is a right that tenants have under the right-to-buy legislation. It is entirely for the local authorities to decide what they will do with the mortgage books. If they choose, as many have, to sell the books to the private sector, I see no objection to that.

Labour Statistics

11. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the male, female, youth and total unemployment rates for Mid-Glamorgan for the latest available date.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 10 January 1985 in Mid-Glamorgan there were 26,264 males unemployed, a rate of 23·3 per cent., 9,884 females or 13·1 per cent., giving a total of 36,148, or a rate of 19·2 per cent. The number of unemployed youngsters between 16 and 19 in October 1984 totalled 7,800 or 4·1 per cent.

Mr. Davies: First, may I suggest to the Secretary of State that he has a word with the chairman of British Rail? I am sure that British Rail could reduce the unemployment figures by employing a few extra linesmen to hasten the unfreezing process for the HS125 service from Cardiff to London.

Will the Secretary of State confirm that the figures that he has recited reflect the fact that in Mid-Glamorgan there are 37 unemployed adults for every vacancy that exists? Will he also confirm that in the Rhymney Valley 1,500 young people are searching for jobs and that on 10 January there was not one vacancy? How will the cut of £60 million in regional aid solve the problem?

Mr. Edwards: I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House would wish to express regret at the death of some linesmen on British Rail last night in a sad and unhappy accident, and I take this opportunity to do so.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman at least welcomes the fact that there has been a substantial reduction in the number of unemployed school leavers in Wales, including Mid-Glamorgan. I am sure also that the hon. Gentleman is pleased that again Wales has had the highest success rate in Great Britain in finding youth training scheme places. We have met the Christmas undertaking. Only 77 minimum-age school leavers had not received an offer of a place at the time that undertaking concluded.

Mrs. Clwyd: However much the Secretary of State tries to sugar the pill, the fact is that Wales has suffered a massive cut in regional aid. My constituency is again at the top of the league table with 27·7 per cent. male unemployment—the highest unemployment rate in the whole of Wales. The only things that the Secretary of State can offer are factories such as Hitachi which encourages people at the age of 35 to become redundant. The National Coal Board plans to shut at least one pit in my constituency. What hope can the Secretary of State offer to those men in my constituency who, under this Government, have only long-term unemployment to which to look forward?

Mr. Edwards: I am sure that the hon. Lady welcomes the fact that her constituency receives the maximum assistance under the new regional policy scheme. I am sure that she also welcomes the fact that there is no blockage of an area with an even higher level of assistance further to the east. I am surprised at the suggestion implicit in the hon. Lady's question, that she was somehow running down the jobs provided by firms such as Hitachi, which provide not only jobs but a degree of technical innovation and standard of management which are likely to improve job prospects generally.

Mr. Barry Jones: The right hon. Gentleman has cited statistics which depict the daunting problems of our valley communities. Why, therefore, do the Government propose to close skillcentres in South Wales? Since the Scottish local authority member of the MSC has resiled from his support for closure, the Secretary of State now has the excuse to go to the Cabinet and say that the skillcentre at, for example, Pontllanfraith should not close. Will the right hon. Gentleman do that?

Mr. Edwards: Part of the MSC's programme is to extend and enlarge the training programme, and to provide in a more flexible way, more, not fewer, training places in Wales. The MSC has recently put specific proposals to Ministers, which are being considered.

East Dyfed Health Authority

12. Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide additional finances to the East Dyfed health authority to enable the completed intensive care unit to receive patients.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No, Sir. East Dyfed health authority is responsible for the revenue cost of running the intensive care unit.

Dr. Thomas: Is the Under-Secretary of State aware of the deep outrage felt in that area, especially as almost one third of the money for the capital cost of that unit came from the public and recently the unit has been lucky enough to have a consultant cardiologist?

Mr. Roberts: If there is a sense of outrage, I am afraid that it reflects on the East Dyfed health authority, because the authority should not have embarked upon the unit until it was sure that it had the money to run it. I am aware that, of the total capital cost of £341,000, some £54,000 was raised from voluntary sources locally and £287,000 came from the district health authority. As I understand it, the authority is waiting for some savings to be made. It is to be hoped that the unit will be opened in the not-too-distant future.

Nuclear Burst

13. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Wales what effect a megaton nuclear burst at a height of 300 miles overhead would have on the equipment and resources in his charge.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I am advised that there would be no physical damage by blast, shock or heat, but that the electromagnetic pulse produced could cause damage to unprotected electrical and electronic equipment over a wide area.

Dr. Twinn: Can my right hon. Friend assure me that his Department will be studying the effects of electromagnetic pulses, and will he ensure that the civil defence authorities in Wales have that information and are able to plan effectively with it?

Mr. Edwards: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department is responsible for these matters and for giving that kind of advice, and I shall draw his attention to my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Buchan: Does not the description of the electromagnetic effect on Wales bear a startling resemblance to the Government's effect on the country at large?

Mr. Edwards: I am not sure that that arises from the question that I have answered.

Labour Statistics

16. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the male unemployment figures in Swansea at the latest available date; and what were the figures for the equivalent months since 1978.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 10 January 1985 the male unemployment figure for the Swansea travel-to-work area was 13,816. Comparable figures for earlier years are not available because of changes to travel-to-work area boundaries and the move to claimant-based figures.

Mr. Anderson: Have not male unemployment figures in the Swansea area increased by roughly three times since 1979, when they stood at about 8 per cent.? They are now almost 23 per cent. Does the Secretary of State recall that when he was Opposition spokesman there was a large advertisement in Swansea in 1979 which read, "Labour is not working"? Is he not now ashamed of the con trick which over the years has led to three times the male unemployment of 1979?

Mr. Edwards: We must all be anxious about rising unemployment. The hon. Gentleman was no doubt worried when it rose steeply under the Labour Administration that he supported. He will be aware that we have been taking a number of measures, particularly in his constituency, to attract new investment and jobs. There have been notable successes through the urban programme in regenerating the lower Swansea Valley, and the enterprise zone there is proving a considerable success.

Nuclear Burst

17. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Wales what action he is taking to harden vulnerable equipment in his charge against the effects of nuclear electromagnetic pulse.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: None, Sir.

Mr. Bowden: Will my right hon. Friend ensure that adequate places are available on training courses so that those who need to know about the effects of the nuclear electromagnetic pulse can learn, study and make provision for such an emergency?

Mr. Edwards: Once again, that is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. I shall draw that suggestion to his attention.

Mr. Best: Will my right hon. Friend deprecate the decisions of some county councils in Wales, under whose charge the citizens are placed in the event of such a catastrophe occurring, not to involve themselves fully in civil defence matters? Will he also remind the House that a unilateral declaration that Wales is a nuclear-free zone is not of much use unless the Kremlin agrees to it as well?

Mr. Edwards: I agree entirely with what my hon. Friend says. I believe that it is of great importance that we should pursue civil defence measures. My Department will continue to give every possible encouragement to the activities of those involved to ensure that proper civil defence arrangements are made.

Labour Statistics

18. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total number of unemployed in Wales in 1979 and at the latest date; and what is the change, expressed as a percentage of the 1979 figure.

4. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total number of males and females unemployed in Wales at the latest date for which figures are available; how many were unemployed in May 1979; and what, in percentage terms, is the difference.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 10 January 1985 total unemployment in Wales was 185,529, comprising 131,720 males and 53,809 females. In May 1979 the equivalent figures were 77,200, 55,800, and 21,400, respectively—an increase of 140·3, 136·1 and 151·4 per cent.

Mr. Hughes: In relation to those disgraceful figures, has the Secretary of State's attention been drawn to the article in the Financial Times this morning, which said that the Japanese Honda company had acquired a huge 330-acre site in Swindon for the development of an engine plant and full car production? Does he appreciate the anxiety that that has caused throughout British Leyland's ranks? If that project is to go ahead, will he ensure that the Government have the necessary powers to see that that plant comes to South Wales; or is he prepared to see the further rundown of our communities?

Mr. Edwards: I have, of course, seen this morning's press reports. I am aware that Honda has taken a site at Swindon, where it intends to carry out pre-delivery inspection of cars manufactured jointly with BL as well as perhaps producing certain components. No proposal for a major car assembly facility has been put to the Government by Honda. If such a proposal were advanced, we should clearly have to consider it carefully and judge whether mutually acceptable arrangements to benefit the United Kingdom as a whole could be worked out.

AIDS

19. Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what recent representations he has received asking him to take early steps to make acquired immune deficiency syndrome a notifiable disease in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I have not received any representations on this matter.

Sir Raymond Gower: Does my hon. Friend agree that information from other countries, including the United States and Australia, shows that there is a terrifying possibility that this disease will spread? Does he also agree that there is probably far too much complacency about the matter in this country?

Mr. Roberts: The Government are certainly not complacent. We are very concerned, but the consensus of the DHSS expert advisory group on AIDS is that there are, as yet, no clinical grounds to support making AIDS a notifiable disease. However, the point is very much under consideration. While appreciating the gravity of the problem, we are anxious not to cause unnecessary panic.

THE ARTS

National Theatre

23. Mr. Freud asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what representations Her Majesty's Government have had regarding future funding for the National Theatre; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): My noble Friend had a case put to him and discussed it with the theatre's chairman; but it is for the Arts Council to decide the level of funding.

Mr. Freud: Will the hon. Gentleman persuade his noble Friend to look at separate funding for the National Theatre building, in the way that the National Gallery and the British Museum are separately funded, and thus allow the National Theatre to continue to produce plays of excellence and to collect seven-figure sums in VAT for the Treasury?

Mr. Waldegrave: That is one point which I am sure Sir Peter Hall put to my noble Friend. If it means that, from one source or another, more money is to be spent on the National Theatre, that will have to be met out of the budget somehow.

Mr. Jessel: Does my hon. Friend agree that the superb and brillant standards of acting and production at the National Theatre do not always require quite such lavish sets and costumes and extras as they sometimes receive? Does he agree also that it is not self-evident why a cut of one fiftieth in real terms in the grant should lead to the closure of the Cottesloe Theatre and the sacking of 100 people? Is Sir Peter Hall sacrificing his staff to make a point?

Mr. Waldegrave: I saw a suggeston in an article by Michael Ratcliffe at the weekend that Sir Peter Hall might be closing the Cottesloe to make the maximum stink. I doubt whether that is so. We must remember that the National Theatre has had an increase in its budget from the Arts Council since 1979 of a little more than the inflation rate. Therefore, it should be able to live within those figures.

Mr. Foot: What is the use of having a great and adventurous National Theatre and a Cabinet of barbarians? Cannot we get rid of the second instead of the first?

Mr. Waldegrave: One of the things that soon gets lost in any discussion of money for the arts is relevance to reality. The right hon. Gentleman has given us another example of that. There has been an 18 per cent. real increase in Government spending on the arts since 1978-79, and that is not a record of which to be ashamed.

Mr. St. John-Stevas: As my hon. Friend is a distinguished hon. Member and not only not a barbarian, but a Fellow of All Souls, would he care to essay an answer to Machiavelli's question, "What good is power without glory?" Is not the National Theatre one of our greatest glories? I appointed an independent commission to examine the financing of the Victoria and Albert Museum and my successor appointed an independent commission to examine the financing of the Royal Opera House. Could not my hon. Friend do the same for the National Theatre and give satisfaction all round?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his kind words. Certainly we need the glory, but, as the Arts Council has said, perhaps the glory needs to be spread around the country. That is one reson why some pressure has been brought to bear on the London companies. I believe that an investigation by the National Theatre is already in train. We hope that when other ways of raising money have been examined, the Cottesloe will still be open.

Mr. Meadowcroft: If the Minister believes that Sir Peter Hall is not closing the Cottesloe to make a point, presumably he accepts that it was inexorable that its closure would follow the level of grant given?

Mr. Waldegrave: No, I do not think that that necessarily follows. There must be a whole range of things to which the National Theatre and other companies can look. For example, it is always taken that the level of pay is given in all those matters. I am not sure whether that should be accepted without question.

Mr. Hannam: Does my hon. Friend accept that the investigation by Lord Rayner has already corroborated the need to close the Cottesloe Theatre so that the National Theatre can survive the cuts that are taking place? Does he agree that the Arts Council's reduction in the amount that should have gone to the National Theatre as a result of its policy of taking the arts out to the regions will kill off the main trunk that is necessary to sustain the arts?

Mr. Waldegrave: With respect to my hon. Friend, I think that we must keep some sense of proportion. The National Theatre will still get a larger grant—it is a considerably larger amount—than that of any other theatre company in the country. I believe that just under £7 million in subsidy to the National Theatre is not unfair when taken with the fact that there has been a real increase in its funding since 1978-79.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: If the Cottesloe closes, the Minister's noble Friend will be the first Minister for the Arts to be responsible for shutting rather than opening a theatre that is the subject of public funds Is that not a disgraceful turn of events? Will the hon. Gentleman report to those responsible how the House feels about the matter, and bring about a change in policy?

Mr. Waldegrave: My noble Friend is no more responsible for closing the Cottesloe Theatre than he is for the superlative performance of "Guys and Dolls" which National Theatre put on this year. Those are matters for the management of the theatre, in conjunction with the Arts Council.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend accept that the quality of Sir Peter Hall's work has always been excellent and stimulating? However, does he agree that the National Theatre is receiving a subidy of nearly £7 million a year, and that Sir Peter Hall should be able to cut his coat according to that cloth?

Mr. Waldegrave: Sir Peter Hall's work has always been adventurous and always on a large scale. The successes have been on a large scale and sometimes the failures have also been on a large scale, as we saw with "Jean Seberg". The whole purpose is to be adventurous. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that with such a scale of financing it is possible to produce good theatre in the centre of London.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the Minister aware that there is a link between the low level of settlement which the Government made on the Arts Council this year, rate capping and the abolition of the Greater London council? When will he become alarmed and worried, and indeed honest, and admit that the Government have betrayed the arts?

Mr. Waldegrave: There is no relationship between those things. The hon. Gentleman may have noticed that the GLC has not yet been abolished, unfortunately; and it may be of interest for him to know that the Arts Council's funding for the National Theatre has increased a little faster than the GLC's funding for the National Theatre since the Labour party took over the GLC.

Mr. Buchan: The Minister must not rest on this business of the amount of money being given to the National Theatre. It is not one theatre, but three. It has been bequeathed an extremely costly building at over £2 million. Is not the truth simply that, not content with running down our manufacturing and coal industries and, for that matter, the pound, the Government are equally complacent about running down one of our national glories? If we have any respect left in the world under the Government, it is with regard to our National Theatre. Will the hon. Gentleman bring the matter back to the Cabinet? He might remind the Prime Minister that the last major play put on at the National Theatre was about Coriolanus, who was not totally dissimilar, apart from his unfortunate predeliction for compassion now and again. The hon. Gentleman might show the same in relation to the arts.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall not venture into arguments about Coriolanus with the hon. Gentleman. We must remember that funding for the arts has increased sharply since 1978-79—by 18 per cent. in real terms. There has been a real terms increase this year as well.

Public Libraries

24. Mr. Fisher asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what representations Her Majesty's Government have received on his planned expenditure on public libraries in 1985-86.

Mr. Waldegrave: None, Sir.

Mr. Fisher: Is the Minister aware that the public expenditure White Paper shows a real decrease of £55 million in Government expenditure on libraries next year? Is he further aware that that decrease is forcing library authorities throughout the country to cut services, that Somerset has had to abandon all spending on adult fiction, and that the Highlands and Islands have had to reduce their book fund by 82 per cent? What does he intend to do about that? Does he perhaps think that libraries were overfunded this year and thus require a decrease next year?

Mr. Waldegrave: Since 1978-79 there has been a reduction of only 1 per cent. in the number of people employed in the public library service. My noble Friend is satisfied that the level of provision is adequate, although no doubt there are hard choices to be made in individual instances.

The Arts (Private Sector Funds)

26. Mr. Proctor asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what representations he has received with regard to tax advantages to private sector funders of the arts.

Mr. Waldegrave: My noble Friend the Minister for the Arts has received some letters from the National Federation of Playgoers' Societies advocating further tax concessions. The question of tax reliefs for the arts continues to be kept under review.

Mr. Proctor: Is my hon. Friend aware that there is continuing concern about the activities of the Inland Revenue special unit at Bristol, which tends to depress available private sponsorship for the arts? Is he further aware that the Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts is currently collecting representations from its members and that a document prepared by leading accountants will be in the Minister's hands in April? Will he give that document and those representations the most careful consideration?

Mr. Waldegrave: I was aware that ABSA was looking into this, and I will take seriously any representations submitted by it, although I am not aware of any evidence that the Inland Revenue has changed or tightened its rules in this area.

Mr. Speaker's Letters to Members

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Secretary of State for Wales, whose capacity for getting things wrong seems to be unlimited, said in a supplementary answer at Question Time that it was improper that your ruling on a recent application in relation to contempt was read in a newspaper before it was heard on the Floor of the House or notified to the House. As this is an important matter perhaps you, Mr. Speaker, will confirm for the record that you told me that you would rule out of order any attempt to raise the matter on the Floor of the House but that I was perfectly free to make the contents of your letter known to whomever I wished, although the releasing of the letter was a matter that you wished to consider. Will you confirm that you are currently considering the question of the confidentiality of Mr. Speaker's rulings given in letters to Members?

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman is quite correct. I am considering the extent to which letters from me to right hon. and hon. Members could be released to the press. Clearly, I cannot give a blanket agreement to all my letters being released, but I am looking at the matter and I will be in communication with the right hon. Gentleman.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Perhaps you will also consider whether it is good practice for a Member to approach you to inquire about a possible breach of privilege involving another Member without that other Member being in any way involved in the approach and for that other Member to read about the matter in a newspaper in which your letter is published in full under the headline, "Edwards Secrecy Contempt Warning," as that does not seem to me to be a very satisfactory way to proceed.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know the date on which that article appeared.

Mr. Edwards: It was on 5 February.

Mr. Speaker: Last Tuesday. I think that puts into perspective my comments about my letters having wide distribution in the press. I am considering the matter. Clearly, my public rulings are available to everyone, but private letters to Members should perhaps not be quite so public.

Haringey Borough Council

3.34 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about meetings and other contacts between his Department and Councillor Salinger or other councillors of Haringey borough council and the disclosure to Councillor Salinger of the Secretary of State's assumptions under the Rates Act about the finances of the borough council.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Patrick Jenkin): There has been no impropriety. The Guardian headlines are flatly wrong in suggesting either that Councillor Salinger has been "given information refused to Councils" or that I misled the House.

The majority parties in the rate-limited authorities are refusing to negotiate with the Government about their rate limits. I have made it absolutely clear that in those circumstances I am prepared—indeed, legally bound—to take account of information from elsewhere, including of course from elected councillors, of whatever party. It was in that context that one of my officials telephoned Councillor Salinger on 5 February because he understood that Councillor Salinger might have relevant factual information to provide. In Haringey's case I have not needed to make any assumptions, as all the figures required to calculate its rate limit have been supplied to me at various times by the council itself. The suggestion that I have privately revealed assumptions made in calculating Haringey's rate limit is, therefore, entirely false.

There have been meetings between Ministers or their special advisers and Conservative Members of Haringey council. One of the meetings was attended by officials, who, in accordance with the normal conventions of such meetings, recorded factual information and commented on its technical relevance.

Dr. Cunningham: The Secretary of State's statement is singularly unconvincing. Will he confirm that Councillor Salinger has confirmed that there were discussions with officials of the right hon. Gentleman's Department about the assumptions and has clearly stated that the assumptions were given to him at an open meeting of the borough council?

Did not the Secretary of State tell the House as recently as last Wednesday that there had been no contact between his Department and Conservative councillors on the borough council? That is on the record. Why has the Secretary of State not taken this opportunity to put the record straight and to be candid with the House about his dealings with minority group councillors in an attempt to bypass the decisions of the ballot box at Haringey?

Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm the figures given in The Guardian and in the letter of the chief accountant of Haringey borough council?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a question, not a statement.

Dr. Cunningham: Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that in exercising his discretion in this matter he has capriciously withheld £6·4 million from Haringey borough council? Does not the whole sorry affair demonstrate the fact that the punitive centralising legislation is a mess, and that fixing the budgets of councils, is no business of the House or of the right hon. Gentleman's Department?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman continues to make a very bad case. He should accept that I have made no assumptions whatever in relation to Haringey. The council gave me all the figures necessary to enable me to calculate its rate limit. The accusation made in the House last week was that I told Conservative members of Haringey council of assumptions made in calculating the Haringey limit.

Dr. Cunningham: The right hon. Gentleman's Department told them.

Mr. Jenkin: No. What I said in the House was absolutely correct. Indeed, I went on to say that had there been any meeting with officials at which such assumptions had been disclosed——

Dr. Cunningham: They have been.

Mr. Jenkin: No, they have not. I have made no assumptions in relation to Haringey. In suggesting that if an elected councillor chooses to contact a Government Department that is bypassing the ballot box, the hon. Gentleman is carrying the argument to absurd lengths.

We all know what the hon. Gentleman is up to. It is spelt out in The Guardian. The hon. Gentleman and the councils which he supports are trying to demonstrate that the assumptions are unreasonable, so that I can be beaten in the courts and the whole rate-capping policy reduced to tatters. That is what he says, that is what he is after and that is what this is all about.

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): Is my right hon. Friend aware that Haringey is one of the most extravagant and profligate local authorities in the United Kingdom, with expenditure running at 34 per cent. above GRE; that for the past 12 years both Labour and Conservative Secretaries of States alike have drawn attention to the council's spending policy but that it has refused to heed any of them; and that currently it is more concerned with an expensive advertising campaign and confrontation with the Government — with the encouragement of the Opposition Front Bench—than with trying to bring about economies in expenditure? Is he also aware that my constituents and ratepayers will welcome and endorse anything that he does to reduce the intolerable burden at present upon them?

Mr. Jenkin: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. If I may say so, this is all a very sad falling away from the days when he and I served on Hornsey borough council, Haringey's predessor.

Mr. Norman Atkinson (Tottenham): Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that the speech that we have just heard from the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) is precisely the same as his remarks to justify his call to the Haringey authority to dismiss some 2,200 of its workers from service? The hon. Gentleman stands condemned for demanding that of the local authority.

Is it not the explanation for all these revelations much more politically sinister than the Secretary of State makes out? Has not the right hon. Gentleman indeed made a number of assumptions? He quoted the figure of £6·4 million, which was one of his assumptions and which appears in the correspondence. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman is condemned by his own correspondence with the local authority.

Is not this part of a political strategy? The Secretary of State knows that all the rate-capped authorities have agreed to act in unison. The right hon. Gentleman wanted Haringey to come to see him personally and he would then have conceded the £6·4 million, thereby making it beneficial for those authorities to come to see him, and as a result breaking the unity——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We cannot have speeches during questions on a statement. The hon. Gentleman must bring his question to a close, because he has now been on his feet for several minutes.

Mr. Atkinson: Is not a political strategy the purpose of these "behind the scenes" discussions with friends of the right hon. Gentleman's own family whom he has known for many years? Was it not from out-of-hours discussions that these revelations emerged?

Mr. Jenkin: The hon. Gentleman knows that the leader of Haringey council, Councillor Meehan, has consistently argued that he ought to be free to talk to the Department about the rate limit, but that because of this stupid boycott imposed by Labour's national executive committee he has been precluded from doing so. There is still time, and if Councillor Meehan wishes to argue for a higher rate limit, my door is open.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm the statement apparently issued by his Department on Friday that the deputy treasurer of Haringey telephoned his Department and had certain calculations confirmed? Will he make a similar service available to the other rate-capped authorities? More important, will he make available to the House details of the assumptions which he has used so that we do not have a repetition of last week, when the House was asked to rubber stamp rate limits without adequate information?

Mr. Jenkin: I have made it clear that in relation to Haringey there were no assumptions. If any authority wishes to discuss the calculation of its rate limit, it is absolutely clear under the Act that it should use the right of appeal to come in and put forward an alternative rate limit. These matters may then be discussed. The deputy treasurer of Haringey did have a consultation, and, as I have said frequently, skilled treasurers are perfectly well able to work out how their authority's rate limit has been calculated. Haringey got the relevant calculations right within two days of the announcement last December.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Private notice questions are an extension of Question Time. We have a heavy day ahead of us, with Private Members' motions.

Mr. Clive Ponting (Trial)

3.45 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It may be of assistance to the House if I say now that it is the Government's intention for an oral statement to be made tomorrow concerning the Ponting case.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would it be in order for me to make an application under Standing Order No. 10 at this stage? If not, at what stage would it be appropriate?

Mr. Speaker: Not until after the statements.

Mr. Morris: In that case, I give notice that I intend to do so.

Mr. Speaker: I say to the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) and other right hon. and hon. Members who have given notice of Standing Order No. 10 applications that this is a private Members' day, and we already have two statements and two other applications under Standing Order No. 10 that came in before 12 o'clock. I appreciate that the judgment in the Ponting case was not received until after noon, so it might be appropriate to delay further applications under Standing Order No. 10 until tomorrow, in the interests of private Members.

Mr. Morris: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is my intention, as I have given notice, to move my application today because the earliest that we could have a debate, as opposed to a statement, would be tomorrow.

Mr. Norman St. John-Stevas (Chelmsford): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As many hon. Members will not even have heard the verdict in the Ponting case as yet, and as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has given an undertaking that there is to be a statement tomorrow, would it not be reasonable for hon. Members to read and reflect on the verdict before we have a discussion in the House?

Mr. Speaker: I have not heard the details either, so I am as much in the dark as anybody else.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As the Leader of the House has raised this point of order, would it be in order to ask him which Minister will make the statement? Will it be the Prime Minister, in view of her responsibilities as head of the Civil Service? Can it be made clear to the Government that many of us feel that, as the Prime Minister has misled the House, she should make the statement?

Mr. Biffen: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The purpose of my point of order was to inform the House that a statement would be made at the earliest possible opportunity. I shall take account of what right hon. and hon. Members have said.

Sleipner Gas

3.47 pm

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the proposed purchase of gas from the Norwegian Sleipner field.

As the House is aware, major negotiations have been in progress for some time between the British Gas Corporation and the licensees of this gas field, which has reserves of some 7 trillion cubic feet, for supply of gas to the British market. Any deal resulting from the negotiations required the endorsement of Her Majesty's Government, and I had made this clear to the parties concerned.

The British Gas Corporation approached me during 1984 with the terms of a provisional agreement under which delivery of gas would start in the early 1990s, reaching a plateau in the mid-1990s at a rate which would be sufficient to meet up to 30 per cent. of United Kingdom requirements and continuing at that level well into the 21st century. The Government immediately examined the details of the contract from the point of view of the broader national interest and thereafter entered into discussions with the Norwegian Government. We explained to the Norwegians that, at the rate of delivery proposed, there was a serious risk that prospective development of gasfields on the United Kingdom continental shelf would be held up. We accordingly sought agreement that the rate of delivery provided for in the draft contract should be reduced. Discussions with the Norwegians on this and other matters continued throughout the remainder of 1984 and good progress was made.

The Government have now reviewed the proposed purchase in the light of the situation which has developed during the period of these discussions. In particular, the Government have been impressed by the results of the recent record levels of exploration and appraisal activity. As a result the estimates of proven and probable gas reserves remaining in the United Kingdom continental shelf, as shown in the Brown Book published in April 1984, have increased by 6·2 trillion cubic feet. As a consequence the Government have concluded that it will no longer be necessary to import gas in the 1990s on the scale anticipated even last summer. Accordingly, the Government have decided not to endorse the draft contract negotiated by the British Gas Corporation for the purchase of gas from the Sleipner field. The Norwegian Government and the British Gas Corporation have been informed of this decision. We recognise that the Governnent's decision will cause disappointment to our Norwegian friends. I emphasise that we shall continue to value the relationship which has developed between our two countries through our common interest in oil and gas matters.

The Government welcome the fact that current and prospective developments on the United Kingdom continental shelf now seem likely to provide sufficient gas to meet the needs of the British market well into the 1990s. However, they recognise that the British Gas Corporation has clear obligations in regard to the security of gas supply. The Government, in consultation with the corporation, will therefore keep under review the likely availability of supplies to meet demand in the coming decades.

The improved prospects for the development of our own offshore gasfields over the next few years will have important and welcome implications for the generation of additional orders and employment in the offshore supplies industry as well as reducing expenditure on imports in the 1990s.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): The statement begs as many questions as it answers. Above all, I find it astonishing that the Secretary of State has made no mention of price. He has based his decision on a major revision of North sea gas reserves. The question is not just about the size of the reserves but whether they can be developed to meet gas demands in the 1990s.

In recent reviews it was assessed that 45 new fields could be developed between now and the year 2000, providing North sea related jobs, but that that would still leave a significant gap between supply and demand. Will the Secretary of State tell us which additional fields he has identified to fill that gap?

In view of the potential demand for gas in the 1990s, will the Secretary of State at least confirm that British Gas will be allowed to consider importing gas in the future if it finds that it has insufficient supplies?

The Secretary of State mentioned the discussions with the Norwegian Government. I hope that the decision will not damage our good relations with Norway. Will he make it absolutely clear that there will now be no question of exporting North sea gas from Britain?

With regard to the future of gas, will the Secretary of State say whether supplies from the North sea will be significantly cheaper than those offered under the Sleipner contract?

What role has the collapse of the pound played in the Government's decision?

The Secretary of State has taken a risk and a gamble on the nation's future gas supplies. The House deserves a much fuller assessment than he has included in his statement. Will he provide it as urgently as possible, so that the House can make a proper judgment as to the extent of the gamble?

Mr. Walker: I understand the views put by the right hon. Gentleman. I understand his fears about supplies, as he does not have the updated detailed information. We shall be making that detailed information available to the Select Committee in the very near future, so it will be available to the House, and the right hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members can then make their judgments on the validity of the improvement in the supply position. It is a genuine improvement and a pleasing one for both sides of the House. Some people think that we are still underestimating the supplies that will be available during the period concerned, but we have made our estimates in accordance with the usual prudent methods employed by the Department, under all Governments.

With regard to price, if we are talking about the price of deliveries in 10 years' time, obviously the exchange rates then prevailing will have an enormous influence. The variation in the currency exchange rate during the period since the contract was originally negotiated shows the degree to which, if the dollar is strong at a particular time, it produces a big variation in the price.

In looking at the availability of our own supplies, as opposed to the need to import them from Norway, my guess is that the availability of our own supplies will mean that prices will be lower than they would have been if we had taken the Sleipner contract—[Interruption.] There is no way in which one can make a valid pronouncement on that. However, that is my genuine guess about the position.

As I made clear in my statement, I accept that there is a statutory obligation on the British Gas Corporation to ensure security of supplies. It is the duty of any Government to ensure that that is so. As I also made clear in the statement, judging by the now known reserves, we believe that far fewer imports will be required in the 1990s than was originally envisaged. On current estimates, it is still likely that some imports will be required during that period. Of course, the BGC will negotiate in consultation with Government—as it always has done—about the possibility of those supplies coming from Norway or elsewhere. While that remains the position the question of exports does not arise, especially if the demand for gas in this country is not met by our own supplies. In the foreseeable future we shall need all the supplies from the North sea. As hon. Members know, at present we are a major importer from the Frigg field in Norway.

I assure the right hon. Gentleman that I have not taken a gamble. We have consulted carefully, and the BGC has increased its estimate of gas reserves since it began negotiations. That implies is no criticism of the corporation because when it began negotiations it was working, perfectly sensibly, on the then known facts.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I repeat that we have a private Members' day today, and it would be very unfair if a lot of time was taken up by the statements. I therefore propose to allow questions to run for a further 15 minutes on this statement, and that goes for the next statement as well.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): Is not the key fact that we now have a rate of increased finds in the North sea? Does that not have major implications for security of supplies and, just as importantly, for British jobs? Can my right hon. Friend estimate how many British jobs will flow from this decision?

Mr. Walker: It is impossible to give any accurate estimate, but, obviously, as we find more gas fields in the North sea there will be substantial investment. As the majority of that investment will come from firms operating in Britain, the availability of more supplies, and new and better discoveries, are obviously good news for jobs, particularly as many of those jobs will be provided in the north east and in Scotland, which are areas of high unemployment.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): In view of his statement, will the Secretary of State give an assurance that he will not in any circumstances permit the export of southern sector gas from the United Kingdom? Will he give some assurances about the finds of probable and possible reserves about which he spoke. The probable reserves are very futuristic. What is the right hon. Gentleman's guesstimate of how long we can be assured of security of supplies? What——

Mr. Speaker: Briefly.

Mr. Douglas: Yes, Mr. Speaker. What is the likelihood of publishing the BGC's background papers, together with the right hon. Gentleman's views, on the contract that he has renounced?

Mr. Walker: Obviously, it is for the BGC to decide what it should publish.

The hon. Gentleman asked about security of supplies. I can only say that the increase of about 15 per cent. in availability that has occurred since we published the Brown Book in July is something that I could not have predicted last June. The hon. Gentleman has considerable experience of, and interest in, these matters, and he will understand the difficulty. Ten years ago, when I previously had responsibility for oil and gas, I was shown predictions which have now been proved to be totally wrong. I hope that that trend will continue, because they are often proved wrong in the right direction for this country. The estimates that we are now making are below those of some oil companies and above those of others. To some extent, because of what is required from the licensing agreements that we have with various fields, is only the Department that has all the detailed information. Thus we believe that there is good security of supply. Judging by present requirements, all the gas in the North sea will be required by the BGC in the immediate future. Obviously, if the time comes when our gas supplies are such that we have surpluses, any Government would have to review the scene.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his statement, because had it not been for the excellent news about reserves additional to those published in the Brown Paper in April the position would have been unfortunate for my constituents. Will my right hon. Friend maintain close liaison with the British Gas Corporation on the question of increased production? Does he agree that that would not only secure existing jobs at St. Fergus in my constituency, but possibly create further jobs?

Mr. Walker: My hon. Friend referred to the Brown Book published in April. He is right. I referred to it as the July Brown Book, but it was published in April. This decision will be helpful for jobs. A great deal of investment will take place in the new fields. In the period leading up to the 1990s there will be further requirements for pipelines, which will also provide more work.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): In the light of the Secretary of State's encouraging words about improved prospects for the development of our own offshore gas fields over next few years and his hope that they will have welcome implications, will he look sympathetically at the desirability of extending supplies of gas from the continental shelf to areas such as Northern Ireland, where such gas is not currently avaialble?

Mr. Walker: I shall certainly discuss that with my right hon. Friend who has responsibility for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, although deciding not to buy may or may not be a big decision at this time, it could have traumatic effects upon a supplier who has relied upon a contract, as in this case? May we have my right hon. Friend's assurance that the Norwegian Government—very good friends of ours—have been kept fully in the picture and that there is no financial liability upon us for non-completion of the contract?

Mr. Walker: Yes. I can assure my hon. Friend that we value the manner of our talks with the Norwegian

[Mr. Walker]

Government. I have been involved in meetings with Norwegian Ministers and my right hon. Friend the Minister of State has been in Norway over the last few days having full consultations with the Norwegian Government. They will be disappointed, but they understand the reasons. The Government's objective is to continue to have good relations with Norway.

Mr. James Tinn (Redcar): Is the Minister aware that, following the earlier Government decision not to go ahead with the gas-gathering pipeline, to encourage the development of a totally unnecessary and unwanted petrochemical complex at Mossmorran is yet another body blow to the people of Teesside, where unemployment is the highest in mainland Britain? What does the right hon. Gentleman propose to do? Why will the Government not allow the corporation to go ahead with an agreement which makes good commercial sense to it and sound common sense to our good friends the Norwegians?

Mr. Walker: I do not think that the news is bad for Teesside. There will be more developments in our own sector of the North sea and more suppliers, investment and equipment will be required, much of which can come from the north-east. Further pipelines are likely to be developed in this period and requirements in refining capacity are likely to be increased from our own resources of gas in the North sea. That should not be bad news for the north-east.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the unsatisfactory aspects of the proposed deal was that the British Gas Corporation was prepared to offer a higher price for Norwegian gas than it was to our own suppliers? If our suppliers had been offered better prices earlier, we should not have had to negotiate for the gas.

Mr. Walker: The fact that there has been such success in our exploration over the period, and that there have been finds, shows that every encouragement and incentive have been given for people to develop and produce. If one is negotiating an import contract for the 1990s, one has genuinely to calculate the world price for that volume of contract at that time. I am sure that that is what the British Gas Corporation did. I am pleased that the taxation and other policies pursued by the Government have encouraged this development of our own resources.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Is the Secretary of State not in danger of misleading the country by presenting this as an either/or decision, when the reality is that even the best forecasts suggest that we are likely to need Sleipner, and everything else that has been discovered and is not yet discovered? Is the Minister not gambling on supplies which have not yet been found? Will he acknowledge that by using the improving success rate as a justification for his decision he is giving the opposite reason to that which the Government gave for not going ahead with the gas-gathering system, which might have secured the gas supplies which we now need?

Mr. Walker: I think that further pipeline developments will take place. I totally disagree with the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question. If he looks at the facts and the figures he will see that a contract for sales from Sleipner is not needed for the 1990s.

Mr. T. H. H. Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, to get security of supply, it would be best to link the European grid system with the English grid system? Is my right hon. Friend aware that by his good decision announced today producers will be given the incentive to bring their gas production forward, because there are ample supplies in the North sea?

Mr. Walker: My projections show that there are better supplies in the North sea than we predicted for the 1990s. Forecasts of consumption suggest that there might well be a need for imports during that period. Any Government and the corporation have a duty to keep the position under careful watch and care. Linking pipelines here with those in Norway or elsewhere depends upon the nature of the supply and demand built up. At present we are in the happy position of being able to take ourselves all the gas from North sea.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): In reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) the Secretary of State said he was unable to make any prediction about price. How then is he able to predict capacity and volume? Further to that, and following the question by my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Mr. Tinn) about employment—which is of dire importance to us in the north-east—is the right hon. Gentleman saying that the 650 jobs at the Philips handling, storage and processing facility which will be at risk before the end of the decade will be guaranteed beyond the end of the century by the home-based reserves which he says we shall tap for the next 15 to 20 years?

Mr. Walker: There was no guarantee under any Sleipner agreement. Under that agreement, no decision was made about where the liquids would go. There was no agreed position on that. As a generalisation, I think that for jobs in the north-east today's announcement is a plus. On estimates and capacity, one must take the best information available. The Department of Energy, under all Governments, can never be accused of having made over-optismistic estimates of capacity. The Department has made the current estimates of capacity in the same way as it has done over the years, under all Governments. The estimates are highly conservative and they are not as accurate in their optimism as they could be. The Department has always been wise to be on the side of prudence rather than of extravagance. It has continued that with these estimates.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): Does my right hon. Friend agree that we have given a great deal of thought to this complex problem for many years? Does he think on reflection that, looking at the possibility of a serious gap in the 1990s, we might have passed up a valuable opportunity by turning down this contract? Does he agree that we might have to resort to panic buying of Dutch and even Soviet gas in the 1990s?

Mr. Walker: Obviously, if I had thought that I should have given approval to the Sleipner deal without hesitation. As my hon. Friend knows, we examined the matter carefully, without any prejudice against the deal. The situation has genuinely changed to the advantage of our country. It is the duty of any Government and the British Gas Corporation to ensure that they have secure supplies for the decades to come. Those supplies may be available from many parts of the world, including Norway, in the future.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Do not the anxieties mentioned by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) exist because the country and the House are so uncertain about the Government's hopes and intentions for energy supplies from all different sources in the coming years? Will the Secretary of State make much more clear to the House and to the country how the Government see the energy mix for the future, so that better judgments can be made on such deals? What is the British Gas Corporation's reaction to the decision that he has just announced?

Mr. Walker: The British Gas Corporation must be free to make its own pronouncements. It has been fully consulted throughout and knows of the adjustments we have made with regard to capacity and also the validity of the reasons on which we have based our judgments. Obviously, having negotiated the Sleipner deal, the corporation must be disappointed that it has not been completed. I am sure that the BGC will wish to continue good relations with Norway as a potential supplier of gas in future, as it is at the present time.

On the hon. Gentleman's question about projections on a whole range of energy supplies, I remind him — although not wishing to do so — of his political past. The party of which he used to be a member published a series of projections for energy supplies over five and 10-year periods, but the only thing that can be said about them is that they were all proved to be dramatically wrong.

Atomic Energy Authority

4.10 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the future of the Atomic Energy Authority. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy told Parliament on 28 March that he had set in hand a wide-ranging review of the role and activities of the authority. On 3 October he placed in the Library of the House a press statement which summarised the recommendations of the review. Following consultations with the interested parties, I can now inform the House of the conclusions reached by the Government.

Since the authority was established in 1954 as a vote-funded body with a high degree of statutory independence, it has made a crucial contribution to the development of the civil uses of nuclear power in this country. Today, civil nuclear power is an essential and established part of our national life. Last year more than 18 per cent. of electricity supplied in the United Kingdom was nuclear. The proportion will reach 21 per cent. when the three nuclear stations most recently linked to the national grid reach full power, with a further increase when stations now under construction are completed. The civil nuclear industry in the widest sense now provides about 100,000 jobs. All this has been achieved with an excellent safety record. The authority's work is held in high regard and it will continue to have a major role to play in both the nuclear and non-nuclear field.

The review had two guiding principles: first, that the authority should move further towards a commercial basis of operation; secondly, that a defined customer-contractor relationship should be applied as far as possible to its work. The Government fully endorse those principles.

The review recommended, and the Government accept, that the activities of the authority should be placed on a trading fund basis. The authority will be required to account for its activities in a fully commercial manner, within financial objectives set by the Secretary of State. We intend to provide the authority with a capital structure and powers to borrow as required to enable it to operate as a trading fund from April 1986, and will introduce legislation as soon as possible for that purpose.

I have considered carefully, in consultation with the authority and with its customers in the nuclear industry, how the principles of the review should apply to the funding of particular programmes at present financed by my Department. A balance is required between the application of the customer-contractor principle, which is valuable for financial discipline and a more commercial approach, and the retention of an independent capability for safety and underlying research in the authority. The electricity industry, like the Government, attaches importance to that independent capability. Although the generating boards will increase the amount of work which they pay for on a customer-contractor basis, my Department will continue to fund a substantial authority programme of thermal reactor and general safety research. The Government broadly endorse a recommendation of the review group that there should be an element in the authority's charges to customers, including the Department, in respect of underlying research. I am discussing the application of this recommendation with those principals concerned.

The effect of the proposals will be to carry further the development of recent years under which the funding of the authority's expenditure has become more broadly based and proportionately less dependent on Department of Energy Votes. In particular, there will be a further increase in funding by the CEGB. With other changes, I expect this to result in a reduction of £5 million in my departmental Vote in 1985-86 compared with previous plans.

I have already mentioned the authority's contribution to the development of civil nuclear power in this country. It continues to give valuable support to the nuclear industry in both the public and private sectors. It is diversifying its services in the non-nuclear field, and has made an important contribution to technology relevant to North sea development.

The evolutionary changes I have just announced will put the authority on an increasingly commercial footing and will give its staff a new incentive. I am confident that the changes will enable the authority further to develop its role and contribution to the economy on both a national and international basis. I am also confident that all those concerned will join in taking full advantage of this new opportunity.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): The Minister's announcement is unsatisfactory on three counts. First, as the Minister said, to put the authority on a commercial basis is an evolutionary change. We believe that it is a change towards privatisation. I draw the Minister's attention to the note appended to the statement of 3 October so that the House is under no misunderstanding about the way in which the Government have clothed today's statement. Paragraph 9, entitled states:

"The extension of the customer/contractor approach to the Authority's nuclear work for the Department would be facilitated by putting the Authority on a Trading Fund basis. This would require all work to be accounted for on a fully commercial basis, impose additional discipline through the requirement to meet financial objectives, create financial flexibility between years, highlight major issues which need to be dealt with in commercial terms, and facilitate possible eventual privatisation."

Secondly, does the Minister realise that the people of this country will be appalled that work connected with nuclear power, whether research or in any other area, will be on a commercial basis, in private hands? The Minister has argued that the justification for that is the saving of £5 million. That is not an argument; it is an unsafe betrayal in the interests of private profit.

Thirdly, is it not monstrous that the result of the announcement will be to take from Parliament the right to question and seek accountability for that aspect of nuclear power activity?

The Government appear not only to be preparing the way for privatisation, but to be weakening the authority of Parliament.

Mr. Goodlad: I may be able to put some of the hon. Gentleman's fears at rest. There are no plans to privatise the Atomic Energy Authority. Therefore, the fears that animated his first and second points do not apply.

On the hon. Gentleman's third point, there will be no reduction in accountability to this House because of the change to the trading fund.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): Does my hon. Friend agree that this decision really consolidates the existing trend on outside financing? Will he reiterate that research into the safety of nuclear reactors will still be a top priority of the Government?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend is quite right to say that the move to a trading fund will reinforce a trend that is already taking place. He is also correct to say that the resources available to the authority for thermal reactor and general safety research will not be reduced. The Department will continue to fund substantial authority programmes in that area. The Government attach paramount importance to safety, and will continue to do so.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Under the trading fund structure, will capital borrowings now cease to be counted by the Treasury in the public expenditure totals?

Mr. Goodlad: The capital structure of the trading fund has yet to be established by my right hon. Friend, and will be the subject of continuing consultations.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): In welcoming the statement, may I ask whether the authority will continue to co-operate with its European partners in the projects that are currently operating?

Mr. Goodlad: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I accept that, after it has successfully spearheaded the development and research of the nuclear programme during about 30 years, it is sensible to move towards a recognition of the commercial possibilities of the authority. However, does the Minister realise that his statement is unsatisfactorily opaque in that, although it accepts in principle the recommendation of a trading fund, it does not begin to define which matters will still be funded by the Department? There have been six months of consultation on this matter. Is there a risk that fundamental research will not be commissioned, and therefore, not carried out? How does the Minister propose to continue to fund the fast-breeder reactor programme?

Mr. Goodlad: I said in my statement that the underlying research of the authority will remain a priority. That will be the case. My Department will continue to provide funding to underlying research, and the industry will also contribute. The position of the fast-breeder reactor programme will remain as it is at present. The programme is proceeding through the collaborative arrangements set out in the intergovernmental memorandum of understanding which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State signed in January last year. The resources available to the programme are not changed by this decision, but the work will be carried out on a more explicit customer-contractor relationship between the Department and the authority.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): My hon. Friend's statement will be studied with the keenest interest at the atomic energy establishment at Winfrith, which is the largest employer in my constituency. The workers there will appreciate his remarks about their work in safety and nuclear matters, and about the additional research that they have done on North sea oil. However, will he give them some assurance this afternoon as to whether the commercial implications of his statement, which I am sure will be broadly welcomed, will give undue leverage to the Central Electricity Generating Board over the authority's activities? Does he accept that many people throughout the industry, and especially in my constituency, would be most grateful for a reassurance on this matter?

Mr. Goodlad: I join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to the distinguished work that has been done at Winfrith for many years, in which I know he has taken a close interest. I assure him that no undue influence will follow this review either from the CEGB or anyone else.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride): The Minister referred to research, notably in connection with the fast-breeder reactor. What effect will the Government's proposals have on longer-term research into changing to the fusion process instead of fission?

Mr. Goodlad: The review of the authority did not cover fusion. The position remains that research into fusion forms an integral part of the Euratom fusion programme and is a successful example of European co-operation in a high technology sector. Recently I announced that the Government's direct contribution to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority's fusion work, which is carried out under a contract of association with Euratom, should be £15·9 million in 1985-86, £13·7 million in 1986-87 and £13·3 million in 1987-88. That funding, together with our commitment to the joint European Torus project under the joint understanding and the host agreement, will ensure that the United Kingdom maintains a substantial fusion programme.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): Will the external financing limit of the electricity supply industry be adjusted because of its increased contribution, which will come about presumably because of this change?

Mr. Goodlad: In principle, changes will be reflected in the EFL.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Does the Minister accept that nuclear power capacity is a matter of considerable political sensitivity, and that there is genuine concern that increased commercialisation is bound to impinge on control and accountability? Will he expand his previous assurance and tell us what changes are being made to ensure that, in this different perception of the authority's role, there will be genuine accountability to, and control by, the House?

Mr. Goodlad: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government and the House will have as much control and accountability as they have always had.

Mr. T. H. H. Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): Will the financial objectives be set out in White Papers or in specific legislation brought before the House for that purpose, like section 29 of the Water Act 1973? When is such legislation likely to appear?

Mr. Goodlad: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be responsible for setting the financial objectives of the authority, with the agreement of the Treasury and after consultation with the authority. The timing of legislation will be a matter for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

NHS (Theft and Corruption)

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the detailed revelation that has just been made of the magnitude of theft and corruption in the National Health Service by a number of consultants who abuse NHS facilities in their practice of private medicine at a cost to the public purse of some tens of millions of pounds a year."

The matter is specific because, for the first time, after an in-depth audit of 37 district health authorities after the revelation of significant fraud at Sutton Coldfield last summer, several hospitals and consultants were named in a detailed analysis of the official evidence by a "TV Eye" programme last Thursday evening entitled "Consultants on the Make." It revealed point by point how even the recently tightened procedures adopted by many health authorities cannot prevent abuse by private medicine on a significant scale, and showed that it is now becoming endemic in the National Health Service.

The matter is of vital national importance because it reveals that the fundamental principles of the NHS are being eroded, not by the odd rotten apple in the barrel here and there, but systematically and all over the country. In Darlington, consultants destroyed 27 key forms which showed that fees were owed to the NHS. In Merthyr Tydfil, NHS patients were told that they would have to become private patients if they wanted hospital treatment urgently. In Sutton Coldfield, after the original row had been made public and a tightening-up exercise instituted, consultants' fees to the Good Hope hospital suddenly increased by £1,000 a month. In Wakefield, consultants manufactured forms to conceal evidence of having treated private patients. In Derby, NHS laboratory facilities were used for testing hundreds of animal specimens for local vets, without the knowledge or permission of the health authority, and such tests were given precedence over tests for some human patients. Yet the "TV Eye" programme shows that those examples are only the tip of the iceberg.

This matter is urgent for two main reasons. First, Ministers have a clear public duty to stop this haemorrhage of public funds from the abuses now uncovered as being of a serious and growing magnitude. The annual loss to the Exchequer is already substantially greater that the annual income to the Exchequer from the overseas visitor regulations which the Government insisted on introducing because a tiny number of foreigners were not making full payment of fees to the National Health Service.

The matter is also urgent because in any other walk of life theft on this scale would have resulted in instant dismissal and criminal proceedings, possibly involving years in prison.

Where persons are found to have been deliberately using their positions of power and prestige to defraud the rest of the community, the issue should be taken up without delay. The individuals concerned should be named and dealt with immediately. I submit that it is incumbent upon us to ensure, for the good name of the House, that that happens. For these reasons, I request that the matter be debated in the House at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the

[Mr. Speaker]

House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the wholesale evasion of fee-paying by those practising private medicine in the NHS and the consequential major loss of public revenue as revealed by a Thames Television programme entitled 'Consultants on the Make'."

I have listened with care to the hon. Gentleman, but I regret that I do not consider the matter which he has raised as appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. Therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Coal Industry Dispute

4.32 pm

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the deteriorating situation in the Scottish coalfield which raises questions about man management relations, the future of jobs and investment prospects in the area and the survival of local communities, indicating the need for a principled and negotiated settlement of the current dispute."

The matter is specific, Mr. Speaker, because, while it is part of the miners' general dispute, it relates to a specific coalfield. The background for that coalfield is different from that for other areas of the United Kingdom, because before the present dispute there was evidence of a difference in the approach of management to safety cover. In other areas of the coal board, the British Association of Colliery Managers was called in to provide safety cover, but in Scotland that has not happened. I have made submissions previously on this issue and referred to the Bogside colliery in my constituency.

We have no doubt that management has a right to manage, but anyone who knows anything about the coal industry will recognise that this is an extremely circumscribed right because of practice and legislation. A suitable analogy is that of the safety of a ship at sea. The coalmine manager wants the right to manage, but he cannot manage properly without the co-operation of others in the industry, especially the members of the NUM and NACODS.

In my constituency and in other areas of Fife there has been a massive loss of jobs, which has made the matter extremely urgent. We have lost faces at Castlehill and at the Frances-Seafield complex. The evidence is that the men have provided safety cover when requested to do so. On the other hand, management has played a cat-and-mouse game.

There has been disagreement in the House about a principled and negotiated settlement of the dispute because of different interpretations of the NACODS agreement of October 1984. I shall quote briefly from the agreement to show that we must adopt a different interpretation from the one that has been adopted by Ministers. Part of the NACODS agreement states:

"the Board are very ready to re-examine the Review Procedure and to adopt any amendments which will improve its effectiveness. The Association will appreciate, of course, that this must be done in a way which will meet with the approval of all the parties concerned, including NUM and BACM."

I submit that that sentence gives the lie to the Government's interpretation of the agreement. The agreement cannot be triggered, except with the approval of the NUM and the BACM. That reflects the negotiated intentions of the parties.

The matter is urgent, because we are suffering a massive haemorrhage of jobs in the coal industry in areas of high unemployment. We need to reach a settlement because of the damage to Scottish employment and the effect that the dispute is having on areas of high unemployment, such as my constituency in Fife.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this matter should take precedence over the business of the House as set out on the Order Paper, and request you to grant a debate on it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the deteriorating situation in the Scottish coalfield which raises serious questions about man management relations, the future of jobs and investment prospects in the area and the survival of local communities, indicating the need for a principled and negotiated settlement of the current dispute."

I regret that I have to give the hon. Gentleman the same answer as I gave to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). I listened carefully to what he said, but I do not consider that the matter which he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10, and, therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Mr. Clive Ponting (Trial)

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the misuse of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act and whether the Attorney-General, in current circumstances, should have granted his consent to prosecute in the case of the Queen v. Ponting."

The intervention of the Leader of the House on a pre-emptive point of order does not satisfy us. A statement is to be made by a person unknown—the Government are coy about revealing who will make the statement. That is no substitute for a debate at the earliest opportunity.

This matter is specific. As the House began this afternoon's sitting, the news reached us of the aquittal of Mr. Clive Ponting. It might be said that it was as much a conviction of the Government as an aquittal of Mr. Ponting. It is possibly a reflection on the role of the Secretary of State for Defence and his Minister of State, both of whose actions must cause considerable anxiety to the House.

It is important that the Attorney-General, with the Solicitor-General, took the decision to prosecute in a case where there was, on the Crown's admission, no security consideration. It is important that we hear the Attorney-General's justification for his decision. On 12 November 1984 he told the House:

"Once the case has been disposed of, I shall have to answer for my decision here, and I am not frightened to do it."—[Official Report, 12th November 1984; Vol. 67, c. 410.]

The matter is urgent because, for all we know, there may be other cases pending that are awaiting the decision of the Attorney-General. Can the House save the Crown from falling flat on its face again? Are others to be put in unnecessary jeopardy because of the Attorney-General's decisions and Parliament's failure to substitute a code that is more intelligible and more capable of enforcement? That was the effect of the Lord Chancellor's words when he was introducing a Bill seeking the protection of official information in 1979. That measure sought to deal with the issue and to limit criminality.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the misuse of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act and whether the Attorney-General, in current circumstances, should have granted his consent to prosecute in Regina v. Ponting."

The right hon. and learned Gentleman has raised this matter at the first possible opportunity. He knows that the verdict was announced after I took the Chair and he has heard the Leader of the House say that there is to be a statement tomorrow. I have listened with care to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but I regret that I do not consider the matter which he has raised as appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and, therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish in any way to contest your ruling on the application of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) to seek to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10. However, I have a constituency interest in the matter that he raised and I seek your guidance on how it will be possible, after tomorrow's statement, to call the Government to account for their motives and reasons for bringing the prosecution in the first place. It does not seem to be possible, after a statement, to put such questions to the Attorney-General. I ask for guidance on this extremely important matter.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot advise the hon. Member about tactics, and he would not expect me to do so. He should wait for the statement tomorrow. If he catches my eye he will have the opportunity to put a question to the Minister who makes the statement. There are other parliamentary ways of bringing this matter before the House.

Abortion

4.40 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): I beg to move,

That this House notes with concern the continuing high numbers of abortions in the United Kingdom, particularly the number of late abortions highlighted by the recent study group of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists; and calls upon the Government to pay attention to the moral and ethical questions raised by abortion.

A Member of Parliament may have to wait a considerable number of years before he is fortunate enough to have a motion called for debate. I could have decided to ask the House to debate the economy, which is of central concern to the nation, but the House spends virtually every day of every week discussing such issues.

Abortion is one issue of vital moral and ethical concern to millions of people which has not been discussed in the House for nearly five years. Since that issue was last discussed, about 600,000 abortions have been performed. Since the passing of the Abortion Act 1967, 2,234,326 abortions have been carried out — 145 every day of every year. As one person put it, "It seems that the Abortion Act has got cancer." It has resulted in many more abortions being performed than the original sponsors of the 1967 legislation intended. For those reasons, I believe that it is my duty to give Parliament an opportunity to debate this issue.

The abortion issue raises classic arguments between principle and expediency. I shall deal, first, with the arguments of principle, then go on to the arguments of expediency and finally review the law as it stands.

Two questions are raised in the arguments of principle. First, is human life sacred? Secondly, where does human life begin?

The answer to the first question must be an unequivocal yes. Human life is sacred to the Christian who believes that every soul has a right to conscience so that it can know God. Human life is sacred to the humanist who believes that, because life terminates with death, everyone has a right to life. I believe that human life is sacred because everyone has a right to life. The mentally retarded have as much right to life as the mentally normal. The old, the sick, the weak and the stupid have as much right to life as the young, the healthy, the strong and the clever.

The second question is: where does human life begin? Foetology has made great strides in recent years. Ultra-scan techniques allow us to peer into the secret life of the womb. We know that the embryo is genetically complete at conception. We know that at the 25th day following conception the heart beats. We know that the bones are being formed by the sixth week and that by the 10th week all limbs are established. Even to the layman's eye, the foetus is obviously a human being. We know that at the 16th week the heart pumps about 50 pints of blood a day. We know that at the 20th week eyebrows and eyelashes have already formed. From the knowledge that has been built up during the past 20 years, we know that birth is an incident in a long-established process. A line cannot be drawn at any one stage — whether at six, 12 or 20 weeks, or even birth — at which one can say, "This is where life begins." The only logical conclusion is that life begins at conception.

Another objection to these arguments is that life begins when it is capable of being sustained away from the mother. That begs other serious questions. Is life sustainable immediately after birth when a baby is still reliant on outside support? A baby left in the womb would have a chance to survice. Most important of all is the question: does dependence deny existence?

A woman certainly has a right to choose to have, say, her appendix taken out. Her appendix is dependent on her and can have no prospect of independent existence. Does a woman have a right to choose to terminate the foetus, which is certainly dependent on her but which has the opportunity of independence in the future? Those are two very different arguments.

I should have thought that those arguments show that, if one looks at this issue purely from the point of personal principle, there can be only one answer—that abortion is wrong. However, many would say, "Although, speaking for myself, I may think that abortion is wrong, I am not prepared to impose my views on society."

I do not want to deny the seriousness of the back-street abortion argument or to deny the pain and humiliation suffered under the previous law by many women through back-street abortions. I must, however deal with the moral argument put forward by the anti-abortionists who say, "Because burglaries will always take place, is that an argument for making them legal?"

One need not take the moral point of view alone. There is evidence that the 1967 abortion laws created a new clientele for abortion. Society today is very different from society in 1967. Birth control is universally available. Society hopes to care and counsel women faced with unplanned pregnancies rather than to censure them.

An interesting report published by the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists in 1966 showed that, based on hospital admissions and deaths, there were about 14,000 illegal abortions in 1966. That compares with 128,000 abortions a year now. It is said by those in favour of abortion that the official statistics camouflage the real state of affairs. If that were the case, one would have expected the deaths to figure somewhere in the official statistics. In fact, the figures show that, although the number of deaths among women of child-bearing age was decreasing by 300 a year before 1967, in the first full year of the operation of the 1967 Act the number increased.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that Britain has one of the lowest abortion rates in the world—a rate that has changed little during the past 10 years — contrary to the impression that he is trying to give?

Mr. Leigh: I said that there had been about 128,000 abortions a year. The abortion rate has been fairly steady in recent years, as the hon. Lady said. That is a matter of interest and concern to the House.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Since the passing of the 1967 legislation, there have been about 2,333,000 abortions. That is a substantial and damaging figure.

Mr. Leigh: I said that at the beginning of my speech. My hon. Friend has made a fair point.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): The hon. Gentleman has cited the number of abortions since the 1967 legislation was passed. He seems to be motivated by the increased numbers. Have we any means of finding out the number of back-street abortions? Does the hon. Gentleman assume that the number is less since the 1967 Act and that more abortions are now carried out in a proper way because that is the more sensible approach?

Mr. Leigh: I said that the report by the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists suggested that there were about 14,000 illegal abortions in 1966. There is no doubt that, although the Act has resulted in fewer back-street abortions, it has created a considerably enlarged clientele for abortions, and that is a matter of anxiety. They have increased. There have been 2 million abortions since 1967. There is no doubt that the Act has resulted in a considerable increase in abortions in this country.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood) rose——

Mr. Leigh: I am sure that the hon. Lady will wish to speak. I want to go on to other points. If she wishes to intervene on them, I shall give way.

I shall deal with the difficult arguments about rape. I do not deny the existence of the serious and heartfelt anxiety about that issue. The Churches take a moral line which I must mention briefly. It is that one act of violence can never justify another, but the figures show that only about 2 per cent. of abortions are for genuine medical reasons, including rape. Many people who are worried about the abortion legislation as it now operates would be prepared to provide for rape, but that would not affect the 108,000 abortions carried out last year under section 2.

The main argument pursued by pro-abortionists is: better no child than an unwanted child. In modern Britain there is and need be no such thing as an unwanted child. For every child there are 10 childless couples desperate to adopt. Our want is not a reliable judgment as to whether a human life should be allowed to exist. There is no evidence to show that wanted children are not maltreated. Dr. Edward Lenoski calculated that 91 per cent. of child abuse took place with wanted children. Since the passing of the Act, there have been 317,000 more children in care. The arguments about wanted or unwanted children are the same as those used in the pagan world about infanticide and exposure of children on the hillside.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Does my hon. Friend agree that the statistics show that in 1968—the year that the Abortion Act came into effect—there were about 24,000 adoptions in this country, and that in 1983 there were about 9,000 adoptions, of which only about 3,000 were for truly illegitimate children and were non-parental applications? Does not that vast decrease in the number of children available for adoption since 1968 say a great deal in favour of the point that he is making?

Mr. Leigh: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. There is the argument that, as a man, I have no right to discuss this issue. It is not my business to apportion blame. I do not underestimate the considerable pressures caused by unwanted pregnancy. Society has no right to censure unplanned pregnancy. Society has a duty to care and to give unstinting love, guidance and advice on how life can be saved rather than on how it can be destroyed. The House has a duty and a right to speak up for the weak against the strong.

I said that I would begin by looking at the arguments of principle and then of expediency. I wish briefly to review the law as it stands. The fundamental law on this subject is the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, which proscribed abortion. That was amended by the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929, which introduced the offences of child destruction or causing the death of a child capable of being born alive. That is an important point to which I wish to return later, because it is of significance to late abortions. The Act was amended as a result of the case of Regina v. Bourne which decided that a woman's life depended upon physical and mental health as much as anything else.

[Mr. Leigh]

Those Acts were amended by the Abortion Act 1967. The Abortion Act provided four grounds for abortion—life saving, therapeutic, social and engenic. In 1983, out of 127,375 abortions, 108,806 — the vast majority — were performed under section 2, which relates to the risk of injury to the physical or mental health of the woman; only 538 abortions were perfomed under section 1, which relates to the risk to the life of a pregnant woman; and only 2,019 were carried out under the engenic section, which relates to the risk of birth of a severely abnormal baby.

Apart from the strongly pro-abortion lobby, there is almost universal anxiety about the number of late abortions. I am talking about abortions performed between the 24th and 28th weeks. Advances in medical science have ensured that babies of fewer than 24 weeks gestational age can be born alive. As The Times put it on 9 January 1984:

"Every advance in obstetric techniques makes the present position less tenable."

My reading of the Acts, and that of many others, tells me —I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will comment on this point — that the Infant Life (Preservation) Act defines child destruction as the killing in utero of a child capable of being born alive regardless of gestational age. A baby aborted alive is covered by the law relating to homicide.

I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to comment on the view that it is unnecessary to have a new upper limit Bill. All that the Government need do is to circulate and inform area health authorities that, with the advances in medical science, the age of viability stands, according to the Department of Health and Social Security, at 20, 22 or 24 weeks and that abortions committed beyond that gestational period are illegal.

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): How many abortions have taken place after 20 weeks of pregnancy during the past five years or so?

Mr. Leigh: I do not have the figures in my head, but I have them in my briefing papers.

Mrs. Short: That is the case.

Mr. Leigh: Of course, the hon. Lady is right. The vast majority of abortions are performed within the 10th or 12th week period.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride) rose——

Mr. Leigh: May I just answer the hon. Lady's point? As I said, the vast majority of abortions are performed early in pregnancy, but that does not deny the argument about principle that I put forward earlier. Abortions are still carried out beyond the 20th week.

Mrs. Renée Short: How many?

Mr. Leigh: I wish to deal with that point now.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): In the interest of accuracy, will my hon. Friend accept from me that in 1983 —the latest year for which figures are available—the number of abortions carried out later than 20 weeks was 1·38 per cent. of the total and that the reasons for those abortions were good and strong?

Mr. Leigh: To answer that point, I wish to deal with the confidential study carried out by the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, which was worried about late abortions, and some interesting facts emerged from that study. The number of late abortions was six to one in the private sector as against the National Health Service; 54 per cent. were carried out on women from abroad; 87 per cent. were under section 2, which, I think, answers the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison); and only 0·16 per cent. were carried out under section 1—risk to life of the pregnant woman.

There is anxiety about late abortions and the financial link between referral agencies and abortion clinics, which are not allowed to advertise, and how people are persuaded to go to abortion clinics on the advice of referral agencies.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Before the hon. Gentleman leaves the issue of late abortions—I sympathise and agree with much of what he is saying—does he accept that it is not as easy as he says to pinpoint the exact time when an abortion is late? He says that 26 weeks is accepted, but it is not accepted. There is no consensus that viability is certain at 26 weeks, for the simple reason that the exact moment of conception is never known. There can be differences of one, two, three or four weeks.

Mr. Leigh: The hon. Gentleman is right, but I think that most people accept that 28 weeks as the age of viability is far too late, given the advances that have taken place in medical science. There have been cases of babies being born alive, even though their gestational age is less than 24 weeks.

I do not believe that the sponsors of the original Act wanted to see a close financial link between referral agencies and abortion clinics.

On the conscience question, under English law, a person is innocent until proved guilty, but under the abortion legislation doctors are required to prove conscience. Recently nurses have been sacked for refusing to insert instruments prior to an abortion, for refusing to fill in forms or for refusing to make appointments. There should be an absolute right for doctors and nurses with conscientious objections not to be involved in abortions.

One of the most difficult areas considered in the recent amending Bill was the tightening up of the sections of the 1967 Act. In December 1979, during proceedings in Standing Committee C on the Abortion (Amendment) Bill, the then Solicitor-General dealt with the statistical argument. The Act in general gives the right to carry out abortions if the risk of childbirth to a mother's health is greater than the risk of her having an abortion. Abolitionists claim that the figures prove that fewer women die from abortion than used to die from childbirth. That is true, but the figures are not comparable, because women who die during childbirth tend to be suffering from some gross abnormality, whereas those who die from abortion tend to be healthy young women who would have had a normal pregnancy.

In 1979, the Solicitor-General stressed the lack of yardsticks in determining relative risks. I believe that the statistical argument could be overcome by including in the 1967 Act the words "serious or substantial". It is interesting to note that Sir John Peel, the Queen's gynaecologist, told the Standing Committee in 1979 that between 5 and 10 per cent. of women having abortions suffered sterility; that figure did not include abnormalities.

In my review of the law, I have refrained from taking the absolutist line that all abortions are wrong. I have simply tried to review the law as it stands. Politics being the art of the possible, I do not believe that one can take an absolutist line. There is a case for a step-by-step approach in this immensely important issue. Parliament has a right to discuss it, and I hope that hon. Members will support me for having given Parliament that opportunity.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I remind the House that the debate must end at 7 o'clock, so we have less than two hours left. Many hon. Members wish to speak.

5.3 pm

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): I think that the House would have preferred not to have this debate. In the past 16 to 18 years, some of us have sat through numerous debates following the passing of the 1967 Act, which provided relief for women, and we remember hearing similar arguments to those presented today by the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh).

It is disappointing that so many years after the passing of an Act that has been endorsed by the medical profession an hon. Member should present ad nauseam the same old jejune arguments that the 1967 Act rendered out of date. I shall not bother to respond to those old arguments, though the Minister for Health may feel the need to do so.

As regards the new points raised in the motion of the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle, there are legal restrictions on late abortions. The clinics where terminations are carried out are controlled and inspected; an inspectorate was set up under the 1967 Act.

In 1975, the Department of Health and Social Security laid down that terminations in non-NHS premises should be performed after 20 weeks only if resuscitation equipment was available and staff were present on the premises to use it, thus obviating the danger to the mother. In 1980, the DHSS wrote to all places that are approved to perform terminations saying that in cases of terminations where the stage of gestation was believed to be over 20 weeks or there was a reasonable possibility that it may become 20 weeks and the period of gestation was in doubt, an ultrasound scan should be performed. In the same year, the Department also recommended that scans should be carried out on all women who were 16 weeks to 20 weeks pregnant, in the hope that "the additional assurance of an ultrasound scan will serve both as a safeguard to patients and prove also to be in the best interests of both the operating doctors and the nursing home proprietors against the possibility of subsequent allegations being made that a foetus was viable at the time of termination."

So strong regulations are laid down to control doctors working in private nursing homes.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Is the hon. Lady aware that in 1983 there were 1,747 abortions after the 20th week? Is that not still a matter of great concern?

Mrs. Short: I shall present figures later, but I wish to go through my argument in sequence.

The hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle must have regard to what the BMA says, and the association's handbook of ethics states:

"the doctor should recommend or perform termination after 20 weeks only if he is convinced that the health of the woman is seriously threatened or if the child will be seriously handicapped."

That is a clear instruction to doctors.

The latest figures from the Department—for 1983—were published last year. They show that only 1·19 per cent. of terminations were performed at 20 to 23 weeks, and that only 0·19 per cent. were performed at 24 weeks or later. That puts the matter in perspective.

We should congratulate all those involved and thank the DHSS for what it is doing to control nursing homes. We should also congratulate the medical profession on ensuring that so few terminations take place after 20 weeks. We should be celebrating those facts instead of discussing this sort of motion. Contrary to what the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle seems to think, the medical profession is carrying out its responsibilities.

The other serious ground for late abortion is that there is likely to be permanent injury to the physical or mental health of the mother. It is a serious decision, whatever the hon. Member and some of his supporters say, for both the woman and her doctor to terminate pregnancy at 24 weeks or later. One of the great benefits of the Act is that it has encouraged terminations to take place by a much simpler process and much earlier, so there is much less risk to the mother.

What does the hon. Gentleman suggest should be done when lateness is the responsibility of the NHS and not the patient? The Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, whom the hon. Gentleman quoted twice in his speech, said that only last year—perhaps these are more up-to-date figures than the hon. Gentleman has —over 20 per cent. of women who had terminations between 20 and 23 weeks had been medically referred for termination before the end of the 12th week. It is clear where the delay occurs—in the NHS machinery. Had their terminations been carried out as soon as possible after the end of the 12th week, when they were referred, or as soon as is acceptable or desirable, they would have been terminated before the 14th week instead of at 20 to 23 weeks.

Therefore, I hope that the Minister for Health will discover why the delay occurs between consultation and operation in a small number of cases, which is obviously serious. It does not happen in the private sector where terminations are carried out very early. There is a considerable impetus for the private nursing homes to get their patients in as early as possible, and many of them are run precisely for carrying out that procedure alone. Therefore, I must conclude that either there is poor organisation in the NHS or perhaps some consultants hope that the patients will be diverted into the private sector, where they have an interest in performing terminations in private nursing homes. There could be that profit motive for some of the less scrupulous members of the medical profession. I am certain that they are only a minority, but they exist and delays are caused.

Does the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle give any thought to the problem of the menopausal woman who does not always realise when she is pregnant, or the young girl who is similarly unaware? The latter perhaps does not want to accept the fact that she is pregnant and hopes that if she does nothing about it, it will go away. What about the mentally handicapped woman who becomes pregnant, perhaps because of rape, and who does not realise that she is pregnant? There are many such cases. They can lead to late terminations which, I emphasise, are a tiny proportion of the total number of terminations carried out.

I hope that the Minister will also examine this point. One of the most serious problems that is the responsibility of the NHS is the delay in carrying out amniocentesis. There is a problem for the older woman who is pregnant. Amniocentesis is carried out to establish whether the child is likely to be handicapped. That is crucial to the older woman, who is at greater risk of producing a handicapped child. Does the hon. Gentleman wish to deny her the relief that the law allows?

Professor Eva Alberman, who is well known to the Select Committee because she was our epidemiologist specialist adviser when the Select Committee carried out an inquiry into perinatal mortality, recently published a report in The Lancet which revealed that, in the absence of any other change in medical practice, a reduction in the legal age of foetal viability to 24 weeks would have meant that during 1982 a total of 26 abortions for seriously handicapping conditions could not have been carried out. A reduction to 22 weeks would have stopped 77 such abortions from being performed. Professor Alberman also referred to the importance of early diagnosis of foetal abnormality and yet found that in at least a proportion of the late abortions studied there were delays, some of which, she and others suggest, might have been avoidable both before and after the tests for abnormality.

Therefore, it is clear that the weight of medical opinion supports early terminations. The figures show that over 90 per cent. of terminations are carried out within the time limit prescribed by the Act, and only a tiny proportion —less than 2 per cent. during the past four or five years —have been carried out later than the legal time limit provided for in the Act. They are for serious cases where there is a late discovery of a suspected abnormality.

Mr. Leigh: The hon. Lady has not answered the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels). According to the official statistics for 1983, the figure was 1,509, which is a considerable number. It may be only 2 per cent. but some of us on this side of the argument realise that it is only 2 per cent. because the total number of abortions is so large anyway —and far too large.

Mrs. Short: If one takes the number of terminations that were carried out at that stage of pregnancy and thinks of the enormous number of deaths that occurred when women had terminations before the Act was passed, one finds that there is no comparison. The Act has brought enormous relief to women, and I am only sorry that so few terminations, certainly in my region, are carried out under the NHS. Nearly 5,000 legal abortions were carried out in the west midlands in three months up to December. Of the 4,919 total, the vast majority — that is, 4,225 — were carried out privately in private nursing homes, where the operation is carried out for private profit and gain. Only 694 were carried out under the Health Service in the whole of the west midlands region. Therefore, there can be no argument that terminations, certainly in the west midlands region, are preventing other gynaecological cases from having the treatment that they require. It is much to be regretted that the private nursing homes can make so much money out of carrying out those operations, but the Act provides for that.

The overwhelming majority of terminations should be carried out early, well before the 20th week, many before the 12th and 14th week. There should be proper inspection of the private nursing homes. The House and the country as a whole should be satisfied that the provisions of the Act can be carried out correctly and that there is no need for the present motion, which does not take account of the improvements in technique, in inspection and, above all, of the overwhelming number of cases where terminations are carried out so much earlier even than the limit that the Act now provides.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): I should like to begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) on his good fortune in the ballot and his personal decision to choose what is to all of us a difficult, emotive and distressing subject. He argued his case with good sense and moderation. He is right to ask for a fresh look to be taken at the whole subject.

I should make it clear that I am not—and was not in 1966—opposed to abortion where there is a serious risk —I am using my words carefully—to the life of the pregnant woman, or a risk of grave injury to her physical or mental health, or where there is substantial risk that the child, when born, would suffer from physical or mental abnormalities which would deprive it of any reasonable enjoyment of life.

That, incidentally, was the view of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists in 1966. If that advice had been taken by the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), the Act, which I admit was necessary in the circumstances, might not have led to so much criticism and we should not have needed to debate the subject again today. I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) that in 1966 the law needed to be cleaned up. There is no dispute about that, although I do not think that it is possible to sustain the argument advanced by those who favoured abortion virtually on demand that the figures for criminal abortions were horrendous because, as the Royal College pointed out at the time, the figures it gave were "without any secure factual foundation".

They were guesstimates. Nevertheless, I do not think that any one of us would deny that there was a serious situation in regard to criminal abortions and therefore an urgent need for legislation. The pity of it was that too little attention was paid to the wording of that measure.

I was involved in those early debates and many moments stand out clearly in my mind. On 22 July 1966 the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale told the House that he simply wanted to get rid of back-street abortion. He added that "it is not the intention of the promoters of the Bill to leave a wide open door for abortion on request."—[Official Report, 22 July 1966; Vol. 732, c. 1075.]

I believe that the right hon. Gentleman's intention was indeed as he stated it. That was also the intention of the Standing Committee and indeed of the whole House.

Dr. M. S. Miller: The right hon. Gentleman is widening the scope of the debate, but he must remember that the inclusion of words such as "serious" or "substantial" lead to problems. The legal profession said that such definitions were impossible to make, and the medical profession was not prepared to be put in jeopardy because the circumstances in which abortion was permissible were not clear.

Sir Bernard Braine: That is quite correct. The medical profession was divided, but the leading bodies concerned were not. The Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists gave us very clear guidance, but that guidance was ignored. In addition, I recall that the British Medical Association had carried out an inquiry into the subject. I believe that the present director, Dr. Havard, was a member of that working group, as was Dr. Gullick. They, too, gave clear guidance. But it is the business of Parliament to make up its mind on these matters and nothing that the hon. Gentleman has said weakens my argument that Parliament's failure to realise what was at stake led to serious difficulties.

In those early debates I repeatedly warned that the legislation would lead to abortion on demand, and I was quite right. [HON. MEMBER: "No."] I was indeed right, because the law has allowed abortion on demand. That is how it has been interpreted by a great many doctors. [Interruption.] We shall not make much progress if there is a running commentary on every speech. I listened in silence to the speech of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East because I respect her greatly and wished to hear what she had to say. Constant interruptions merely show a lack of conviction that one knows what it is all about; such chatter does not help parliamentary debate.

Week after week following the enactment of the Bill, anxiety increased at the practices developing. For example, there were taxi touts at London airport picking up foreign women who wished to take advantage of the new law. Those women were driven to abortion clinics which were able to pay the drivers generously out of the fat earnings which they were making from frightened women. I agree entirely that the whole matter should have been under the proper direction of the National Health Service from the start, and I said so at the time. It was not, and racket after racket developed. Taxi touts were even stealing girls from other clinics. One driver took girls to a clinic in Bournemouth although they had been booked for operations at a clinic in London.

Such was the public outrage and the ensuing row in Parliament that the Government were forced to set up the Lane committee. That committee consisted entirely of people who had originally favoured abortion on request, just as the more recent Warnock committee was made up of people who favoured the use of the human embryo as a guinea pig. Such was the weight of evidence, however, that the Lane committee was forced to admit that some doctors were practising abortion on demand. The fact that its members advocated no steps to prevent such practices was simply a measure of their views. They were also forced to admit that there was disappointingly little evidence to suggest that the legislation had stopped criminal abortions. [Interruption.] The report is in the Library if any hon. Member wishes to consult it.

Mrs. Clywd: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Bernard Braine: No, I wish to develop my argument. I am dealing with matters that arose in the House long before the hon. Lady became a Member.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): The right hon. Gentleman will accept that I was here at that time. I hope that he intends to quote the main finding of the Lane committee, which was that the advantage gained from the legislation far outweighed any criticisms that could be levelled against it.

Sir Bernard Braine: If the right hon. Gentleman had been here earlier he would have heard me say that in my view his Bill was necessary and that certain advantages flowed from it for that very reason. The Lane committee said that. Interestingly, however, increasing public disquiet led the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. White) to introduce the Abortion (Amendment) Bill which led in turn to the establishment of the Select Committee on Abortion, of which I was a member. That Select Committee, chaired by a distinguished Labour Member, exposed the fact that abortion on demand was virtually the order of the day. The evidence clearly established the fact.

Mrs. Clywd: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Bernard Braine: I am telling the House what the Select Committee recommended. When I have done that I shall give way, although I know that many of my hon. Friends wish to speak. [Interruption.] This method of conducting the debate does not help us to make progress.

The Select Committee not only exposed the fact that abortion on demand was the order of the day, but suggested a number of amendments to the Act to ease the situation. One involved the severing of financial links between abortion clinics and referral agencies. The Committee also advocated strengthening the conscience clause and urged that Parliament be given ample time to debate and vote on the criteria for abortion to establish whether we wished the law to be changed.

It is to the everlasting shame of the Government of the day that they failed to implement the main recommendations of the Select Committee. Moreover, it is dishonest of the pro-abortion lobby to claim that repeated efforts to change the law in Parliament have failed. They have failed for one reason alone — the perpetual and successful attempts to talk out every private Member's Bill.

We must not declare that the Abortion Act has achieved nothing. However, one of its achievements is nothing to be proud of. It has resulted in the denial of life to some 2 million unborn children. In fact, while this debate is taking place, some 60 babies will be deprived of the right to life.

Ironically, the Warnock committee was set up to deal with the problem of infertility. Infertility has always been with us, but the problem has been thrust into the foreground because the natural and laudable desire of childless couples to adopt has been frustrated as there are no more babies available because, under the law, we are killing them in increasing numbers.

There is another tragedy associated with infertility. It must be a very bitter thing for some women to have to bear. Few of us can claim to have done nothing in life to cause us regrets. I know that I cannot. But comparatively few of us have to live with the fruits of our misdemeanours. What must make infertility hard to bear is the fact that in many cases it is avoidable. Many cases of blockage to the tubes, for example, are avoidable. It is often caused by infection, which can result from previous abortion or sexually transmitted disease. Secondly, while I believe in contraception, I wonder how many women fitted with the coil realise that it can make them barren.

One of the most appalling aspects of women's right to choose, as it is often expressed, is the fact that they are not properly informed about what they are choosing. That is why I have always argued that there should be no connection whatever between abortion referral agencies and abortion clinics, because the one has a financial interest in the other.

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East put her finger on the point long ago. If we are to have proper, therapeutic abortion in this country, it should have been controlled from the beginning under the NHS.

People complain about the way things are going, but refuse to see what is happening under their very eyes. They refuse to see that the cheap and shoddy rarely supplies the answer.

I refer again to the original abortion debates. One of the reasons put forward by the abortionists for liberalising the law was that by doing so they would reduce the number of unwanted children and level off—that was an often-used phrase—the rate of illegitimacy. In vain we said that killing babies in the womb would hardly lead to a more responsible society in which children would receive more love. We were right to say that. The numbers of children in care were not reduced after the abortion law came into operation. On the contrary, the numbers have risen by leaps and bounds. Between 1951 and 1967 the numbers rose by fewer than 7,000, from 62,700 to 69,300. In the 10 years after the Act came into operation, the numbers rose at an unprecedented rate and hit the 100,000 mark, where they remain today.

Pro-abortionists give every possible reason for this rise—and I would agree that our liberal divorce law has something to do with it—but the fact is that every other country which has liberalised its abortion laws has witnessed a similar increase in child tragedies.

Mrs. Clwyd: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Bernard Braine: In so short a debate, I shall not enter into an argument on the causes. However, there is no scrap of evidence from anywhere in the world to support the claim by the pro-abortionists that their policies result in greater love and care for born children and that we are overcoming the tragedy of unwanted children. All the evidence suggests the reverse.

Mrs. Clwyd: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Bernard Braine: I wish to be brief, to give others a chance to speak. I end by asking a simple question: where should we go from here?

Mrs. Clwyd: The right hon. Gentleman said earlier that he would give way when he had developed his argument. If he is interested in evidence, he might like to know that I was a member of the Royal Commission on the National Health Service. We gave evidence to his Government and pointed out that far from abortion being available on demand the reverse was true. It is now more difficult to get an abortion under the NHS. According to the latest figures available, those for 1983, only 49 per cent. of women in this country who had abortions had an abortion on the NHS. How can the right hon. Gentleman say that we have abortion on demand?

Sir Bernard Braine: I am talking about abortion not on the NHS, but in the private sector. The hon. Lady has been so anxious to intervene that she has not listened to what I have been saying.

We started off on the wrong foot. From the beginning, therapeutic abortion based on clear-cut criteria—and the criteria were certainly not as clear-cut as they should have been—should have been performed within the NHS. The whole matter could then have been properly controlled. It was not, and, overnight, abortion clinics sprang up by the score. The racket was so great that the Lane committee had to be set up. Even then the racket failed to disappear. There was then the Bill of the hon. Member for Pollok. There followed the setting-up of the Select Committee. The hon. Lady was not a Member of the House at the time and cannot remember what intense anxiety there was both in the House and the country.

Mrs. Renée Short: The right hon. Gentleman keeps referring to abortion on demand and the need for better services under the NHS. I cannot recall whether, when I introduced a ten-minute Bill in 1981 appealing for an extension of NHS facilities, the right hon. Gentleman voted for it. Can he tell me whether he did or not?

Sir Bernard Braine: I would not like to give an answer off the cuff. However, I once served in the Ministry of Health and have always been a strong supporter of the concept of the National Health Service. In 1966 the leaders of the medical profession were concerned about two things: first, to whom the task was to be entrusted; and, secondly, where it was to be done. They said that there was no need for complicated legislation. If strict rules were laid down on those two points the matter could be left to the medical profession. By that they meant that at least one of the two doctors concerned should be a consultant and also that there should be the strictest possible control over where the operation was done.

If that had been our aim from the outset, we would probably not have been discussing the subject today. However, the decision was made not to entrust the task to two medical practitioners, one of whom would have to be a consultant. And so, presumably because of the fear of strain upon the NHS, the greater part of the demand was met by the mushroom growth of clinics, with all the abuses that I have mentioned.

I should like to recommend a number of courses of action. At the appropriate time the Government should give the House adequate time to debate an amending Bill. That is unlikely to be in the present Session, but the Government should be prepared to help an amending Bill through, so that it cannot be talked out by its opponents. Only in that way shall we see whether or not Parliament wishes to retain the present law unamended.

In my view, the grounds for abortion in the present Act should be more carefully defined to stop abortion on demand. I believe that that result could be achieved by the addition of two words to the Act. We should also put an end to the hypocrisy of allowing the referral agencies to advertise so that they can refer women to clinics in which they have a financial interest. All financial links between referral agencies and clinics should be severed. That should apply equally to those clinics described as charities, from which doctors take home the bulk of the large fees of patients who have abortions.

The conscience clause should be strengthened. In addition, something should be done to help those genuine charities and agencies which offer positive assistance to girls with problem pregnancies. It is scandalous that abortion clinics should be receiving help from local authorities, while agencies which look after girls who wish to keep their babies receive no Government grants.

The Government should also take a positive stand to ensure that under-age girls are not aborted without parental consent. A dentist in this country is not allowed to extract a tooth from a young patient without parental consent, yet the entrepreneurs of the abortion business are allowed to carry out an operation on a young girl which could blight her entire life and leave her sterile. Indeed, if we look at the abortion figures, we cannot fail to realise that those most in need of protection—the young—have become more and more vulnerable. Abortions on girls under 16 increased from 2,619 in 1969 to 10,555 in 1983—8 per cent. of all abortions in England and Wales.

Great play has been made of the fluctuations in the number of abortions on girls in this group since 1978. Frankly, this means nothing at all as the total number of girls aged 13 to 15 has declined, while the number of abortions has remained constant at about four per 1,000 girls in this age bracket. That is a very sad commentary on the state of affairs in this country.

During the last election some of the leaders and spokesmen of my own party made great play of the importance that we attach to the family unit and our concern for the young and unborn——

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman said that he would be brief.

Sir Bernard Braine: Indeed, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that many Opposition Members share my view.

If, in fact, the Government are concerned about the family, children and the unborn, and intend to keep faith on this, they should give Parliament the time fully to debate the abortion law so that any amendments have the opportunity of reaching the statute book.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): There is no point in my disguising my sincerely held belief on this issue, and I hope that the House will bear with me as I attempt to make a number of brief points. I am opposed to abortion and always have been. There is no point in saying that had I been in the House in 1967 I would have supported the legislation of my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), because I would have been in the opposite Lobby. He and I have had many disagreements on this issue, although I respect his sincerity.

The right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) spoke of my right hon. Friend's intention when he introduced the Bill. It was to turn the tide of human misery. I know that my right hon. Friend intended to address himself to the question of back-street abortions. I have no simple, easy answer to that problem and am well aware that because of my position I am open to the argument that without an abortion provision on the statute book there could well be a return to the back-street abortion.

The right hon. Member for Castle Point also referred to the Lane commission. That led me to recall that in 1980 I introduced a ten-minute Bill on the termination of pregnancies and whether, as the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) pointed out, termination should be allowed to occur beyond 24 weeks.

During that debate I quoted Mrs. Justice Lane's committee, which said:

> "Informed opinion is, and the Committee agrees, that a maximum gestational age of 28 weeks for abortion is too high, having regard to modern methods of sustaining prematurely-born infants".

Elsewhere in the committee's recommendations it stated "that the Abortion Act should be amended to authorise abortion up to the twenty-fourth week of pregnancy and not thereafter". In fact, The Guardian commented that two out of every 1,000 abortions which take place do so on developing children between the ages of 24 and 28 weeks. That goes some way towards answering the interjection made in the speech of the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle.

I believe that this is something on which the House could agree, and I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale is very much of a view that at the very minimum there ought to be a reduction from 28 to 24 weeks. It is something on which he and I agree. Indeed, my right hon. Friend was a sponsor of my Bill. The World Health Organisation takes a similar view.

I am conscious that we are going over arguments that have been rehearsed before, but that is inevitable. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) said that she had heard these arguments before, but when 162,000 abortions take place each year it is inevitable that this House should want to continue to discuss the legislation and the way in which it is working. It would be surprising if it did not, given the sincerely held views of hon. Members and their constituents, apart from the fact that our constituents would require us, as their representatives, to raise these important issues.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Does not the hon. Gentleman accept that many operations are performed in this country, yet he is distinguishing between this one and the others? However, the Act has given some consideration to the 162,000 women who would otherwise have been placed in difficulty.

Mr. Alton: I shall come to the hon. Gentleman's latter point in a moment. Like him, if I were concerned that insufficient was being done to help people who needed kidney transplants or those with cardiac complaints, and if I felt that the NHS was not helping them or that the system was not operating as it should, I would want to raise such matters in this House. However, when discussing a sincerely-held view among many people outside this House that too many abortions are taking place, it is legitimate for hon. Members to return to this issue. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept the sincerity of those who seek to raise the matter in this way.

Last week, a group of Liverpool women came to see me about the general problems that women face. I accept that society does not treat women in the dignified way that it should, and that many of the prejudices and taboos about women and their place in society have placed women at a lower level than men. That is something to which we must address our minds.

Those women told me of a recent survey of women at Liverpool university who had undergone abortions. It showed that had a creche been available for under two-year-olds, 14 per cent. of the women would have been happy to go ahead with their pregnancies. Perhaps we can do something about that. If some people genuinely have abortions for such simple reasons, we ought to make adequate provision for women in that position.

To some of my fellow Roman Catholic churchmen I say that attitudes on birth control, which sometimes seem to have more to do with the Middle Ages than with life in contemporary Britain and the centre of places such as Liverpool, are undoubtedly one of the reasons why people have abortions. I hope that they will address themselves to that problem.

Like the right hon. Member for Castle Point, I also believe that there is a desperate need for more counselling facilities. There is also a need for more tolerance among families who reject their pregnant daughters and cast them on to the streets. Up to 30 per cent. of people living in parts of my constituency are single parents with one child, then two, who find themselves on the rackety road to ruin as they get lured into things such as prostitution.

We have already heard about a woman's right to choose, and women will ultimately make that decision whether they come within the system or are forced to use the back-street abortionist. However, many of us also believe that the developing child has rights. For purely philosophical and ideological reasons rather than reasons of religious conviction, I believe that the liberty of the individual is paramount. It is because I place such a high price on the rights of the individual that I take the view that I have just expressed.

There is a strange contrast between this debate and the one which will take place on Friday. That contrast concerns the premium that we place on life, the reflections of the Warnock committee, which has examined the whole question of in vitro fertilisation, and the Bill to be introduced by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell).

A few weeks ago, a child psychologist and a doctor addressed a group of hon. Members at a forum held in one of the Committee rooms. The right hon. Member for Castle Point, who was present, will recall that during that discussion we were told that in London medical students were now paid £12 for sperm which is used to father up to six different children. That is £2 per child. The problems that they may cause to those children later in terms of a possible identity crisis over parentage——

Ms. Clare Short: That is out of order. Why not wait until Friday?

Mr. Alton: It is not out of order. I shall come to the point when I relate it to today's debate.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): The hon. Gentleman's local newspaper probably comes out tomorrow, not Saturday.

Mr. Alton: The hon. Lady is mistaken. I assure her that there are as many people in my constituency who take the same view as she does, whom it would be easier for me to placate by not speaking, as there are those who maintain my view. It is wrong to try to ascribe such motives to hon. Members who have sincerely held views.

In the discussions that took place last week, many hon. Members listened to remarks, which concerned us all, about what would happen as a result of the in vitro fertilisation methods that are to be introduced. On Friday, we shall be having a debate about people bringing children into the world scientifically, as a result of methods that we shall place on the statute book. Today, we are talking about ways in which to remove the rights of children to be born. There is an odd and stark contrast. It is right that the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle has given us a chance to discuss the other side of the equation, and it helps to put into some perspective the debate that we shall be having on Friday.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I declare an interest, in that I am president of the Brook Advisory Centre, which counsels not only on birth control but on whether pregnancy should be terminated. As I did medicine and set up birth control clinics at about the time that the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) was wrecking the law of Scotland in this respect, I have always had a particular interest in these matters. Without attempting to upset him — beautifully groomed as he ever is—I shall tell the House how the Abortion Act 1967 came about.

In Scotland there was a perfectly satisfactory law, the common law. It was exactly the same as the common law that governs every other medical condition. In other words, if I go to my doctor and ask him to cut off my ears, he will advise me that he does not think that it is in my interest to do so if I do not have leprosy, but it is if I do. The decision whether to terminate a pregnancy was, in Scotland, a matter of common law.

Until the week of the wretched 1967 Act, passed for England and Wales and extended to Scotland, there had never been a prosecution of a doctor or medical person in Scotland. I acted for the only person who ever was prosecuted, until he did not turn up for trial. It was quite proper that this person was prosecuted and pled guilty, because he did an unprofessional operation without anaesthetic on a woman to terminate her pregnancy, and sent her home on a tram, and in a condition in which she was still subject to the likelihood of septicaemia. Therefore, it was proper that he should have been prosecuted. However, that was the only prosecution for the termination of a pregnancy in Scotland.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Is the hon. and learned Gentleman implying that no illegal abortions were carried out in Scotland? Does he not realise that there were quite a number of deaths from abortions in Scotland?

Mr. Fairbairn: I am sorry if I did not make myself clear, and I am glad to be able to be able to do so now. That was the only prosecution of a medically trained person for the termination of a pregnancy. Many people were prosecuted in Scotland for improper, non-medical abortions, just as someone would be prosecuted in Scotland if a person came along and asked him to pull out his teeth and he proceeded to do so with a pair of pliers. That would be an assault.

At that time there was a desire for change in England because, under the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929, quite a large number of medically trained people had been prosecuted in England and sentenced to terms of imprisonment. It was to get over that difficulty that, when the then newly born foetus from Roxburgh, Selkirk and Peebles arrived in the House, the midwife stuffed into his hand, when he won the ballot, the Abortion Bill that became the Abortion Act 1967.

Having done that, and realising that it would look a little odd if this new tartan fairy were to cure the law of England, having been elected for a Scottish seat, he applied it to Scotland and ruined a perfectly satisfactory law. Interestingly enough, although Scotland has a much bigger proportion of Roman Catholics than any other part of the United Kingdom, there was never any complaint about the common law of Scotland and its application. If I were to ask my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) to say anything, it would be to say that he would have the words, "This Act does not apply to Scotland" put at the end of the 1967 Act.

Mr. David Steel: As always, the hon. and learned Gentleman is entertaining and inaccurate. He may recall that in 1966-67 Professor Sir Dugald Baird, who was the chief exponent of a liberal abortion law in Scotland, was in the Aberdeen health area, the only one to which the law which the hon. and learned Gentleman is describing applied. Professor Sir Dugald Baird told me that the reason for this was that a Lord Advocate of a few years before had sent round a circular to consultants in Scotland saying that they were liable for prosecution for carrying out abortions. It was because of that threat, arising out of the uncertainty of the common law hanging over doctors, that Sir Dugald Baird was one of those who advised me strongly to include Scotland in the Act.

Mr. Fairbairn: That is a strange recollection. I remember trying to persuade the right hon. Gentleman not to extend the Act to Scotland, and I personally addressed the Royal College of Physicians, with Professor Sir Dugald Baird in the chair, on the law of Scotland and on abortion. He did not take that view then or in any of the correspondence that I had with him afterwards.

Dr. M. S. Miller: My experience in general practice in the years before the Abortion Act was passed totally conflicts with the views expressed by the hon. and learned Gentleman. I was never able to have an abortion terminated for a patient by referring her to any hospital. No gynaecologist in Glasgow would perform abortions except in the most serious circumstances.

Mr. Fairbairn: That may be the hon. Gentleman's recollection of his private practice in Glasgow, and practice varied throughout the country, but, as Professor Sir Dugald Baird demonstrated, the law was satisfactory.

I introduced birth control clinics into Scotland and I am anxious about this matter because of what I have come across in my legal practice. I spent part of my time divorcing people who had married in the first place only because there was an unintentional pregnancy. I spent a great deal of my time in the High Court with children who had been unintentionally conceived and whose parents were not emotionally capable of looking after them. It was never the last child, but always the one in the middle. My practice involving this catalogue of misfortunes arose out of unintended pregnancies.

The difficulty which my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle gets into when he starts talking about the limitation of time period is that of the consistency of those who say that the correction of a mistake is forbidden, that the mistake is hidden or denied until later and later in the pregnancy. People say, "Perhaps I have missed my period, but it may be natural," and they say that about the next one as well, and so on. Unintended conception is a mistake. The parties may have used a contraceptive method which did not work, or they may have made a miscalculation. If a woman becomes pregnant unintentionally, is it right for this House to say that that is a mistake which she is not allowed to correct? That seems to me to be a strange moral judgment.

People talk about the right to life of the unintended foetus. The unintended foetus did not have a choice whether it should be unintendedly conceived in the first place, so why should it have a right not to be intendedly disconceived thereafter?

Mr. Nicholls: No hon. Members have yet said in the debate that they would ban abortion entirely in all circumstances. It is simply that, for a combination of practical politics and personal morality, they are saying that there should be fewer circumstances in which abortion should be allowed—not that it should be abolished.

Mr. Fairbairn: I appreciate that, but what I am trying to stress—it is very important and rarely understood—is the psychological barrier facing a woman who becomes pregnant unintentionally. The barrier is such that she tends to defer the taking of any action. If she were able legitimately, and with public approval, to correct the mistake when it was made, she would not face the difficulty later of getting into the period of gestation before any operation was performed.

I agree with the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) that it is disgraceful that a woman who is referred to a consultant under the National Health Service can be held responsible for the lateness of the proposed abortion. I agree that the later the termination, the more difficult it becomes. I am in favour of very early abortion, but that can be achieved only if the moral climate alters and we move away from the idea that abortion, even if it is permitted by the 1967 Act, is wrong.

In looking round the Chamber—not, of course, this evening—one may well feel that from time to time a good many mistaken conceptions have taken place. There is no other mistake in human activity which we do not think it right to try to correct. What is wrong with correcting that one?

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Before commenting on the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn), I should like first to refer to one or two of the points made by the mover of the motion, the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh). There seemed to be one or two contradictions in his speech.

The hon. Member referred to the sacredness of all human life. In looking round the Chamber, I noted that most of the Conservative Members who accept that view are in favour of capital punishmment. Either human life is sacred or it is not. It cannot be said that it is sacred in some circumstances and not in others.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Will the hon. Member give way?

Mr. Hamilton: In view of the limited time available, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will understand if I do not give way to him.

Another point that the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle made has been mentioned frequently in all the debates on legislation dealing with abortion—that nurses and other people have been persecuted and even dismissed because of the exercise of their conscience. Whenever that has been alleged, we have asked for one such case to be produced. No one, in any circumstances whatever, has been able to produce a case of a nurse or anyone else in the medical profession who has been dismissed for the exercise of conscience under the 1967 Act.

The hon. Gentleman asserted that there is no such thing as an unwanted child. I wish that were so, but we live in the real world and we know that there are unwanted children. There are many women throughout Britain and throughout the world who find that they are pregnant and who, for whatever reason, do not want to bear the child for very good reasons. The ultimate test must be the consultation between the patient and her general practitioner, and the law should be at a minimum in dealing with that relationship.

The right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) laid rather more stress than did the mover of the motion on the development of private clinics. I think that we are all agreed on the undesirability of such a development, but the only possible acceptable alternative is the improvement of facilities within the National Health Service. The answer is not to abolish all such clinics but to improve NHS facilities. I hope that the Minister will give the House some assurance in that respect.

Throughout the country public opinion, no matter what people's political or religious persuasion may be, is massively in support of the way that the 1967 Act is operating. There may be a case for considering a time limit for abortion. I served on Standing Committees which dealt with two abortion Bills. The right hon. Member for Castle Point will remember them vividly. Those Bills were talked out of existence. I think we were right to do that, because public opinion was massively on our side.

It is right that minorities should express their opinion. I understand that a petition containing 1·5 million signatures is to be presented by a Conservative Member. There are another 55 million signatures that are not on the petition. Let us not be under any illusion as to the strength of feeling on abortion. Minorities have a right to be heard but the majority have the right to prevail.

The hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle was right not to lay too much emphasis on the grounds for abortion. I do not think that there is an authoritative body, in the medical profession or anywhere else, in support of any tightening up of that part of the 1967 Act. The main argument relates to a time limit. There may be a case for that. However, even if it is set at 24 weeks, there will always be cases where, for one reason or another, exceptions will have to be made. For that reason, the greater the flexibility in the legislation the better.

The 1967 Act does not lay down a period of 28 weeks or any other period, and that is for a good reason. There is a degree of flexibility to enable the medical profession to examine and treat each case on its merits. The less we do about changing that the better.

We are all against late abortions; indeed, we are all against all abortions. It is a horrible operation. At the weekend I was talking to a doctor who does abortions and he said that there is not a more undesirable operation, because it is an expression of failure. But if we can do anything in this House to eliminate that failure, it will bring happiness to many women and many families who would not otherwise have it. We legislate in this place for the sake of humanity. We legislate to make practices more humane than they would otherwise be. Whatever this House does, women will have abortions. They have had them over the centuries. It is up to us to make the operation more humane by putting on the statute book legislation which is flexible and which recognises the human problems that lie behind abortion.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I shall not take up too much time by going over points that have already been made, especially as some of my comments may be almost identical to those made by my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh).

I should make it clear that I am not against abortion per se. In whatever proposals I might make, I am not working towards a day when abortion will be completely abolished. Whatever my private and personal views may be, other people will hold different views, and on this subject—perhaps more than on any other—one tries to achieve a consensus.

Two points need to be made. First, it concerns me that the word "abortion" seems to be caught up with the concept of contraception and birth control. That is extremely dangerous. Hardly anyone would now argue against contraception, but in talking about abortion we are not talking about contraception. Contraception ensures that human life or conception does not occur. Despite the argument that the spermatozoa and ova are alive, there is no human life until they are fused at conception. Thus, even a hard-line Roman Catholic—if I can use that phrase in a non-pejorative sense—who might be opposed to both abortion and contraception, would probably admit that one of them is much worse than the other.

It must be recognised that abortion is ultimately a form of population control. Whatever the motives may be, it terminates human life. That is not the same as preventing that life from forming in the first place.

Dr. M. S. Miller: The hon. Gentleman argues that human life begins at the moment of conception. But what are sperm and ova if they are not human life? What does he call them?

Mr. Nicholls: I call them on the one hand sperm and on the other ova, but they are not human life. The hon. Gentleman has asked a question so he must listen to the answer. Until they are fused, they are not human life which, unless it is interrupted by nature or some other physical event, will inexorably lead to a birth—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman goes on heckling from a sedentary position, but if he does not like the answer to his question he could at least have the courtesy to listen to it in relative silence.

Secondly, we are used to referring to the 1967 Act and to the fact that it liberalised abortion or allowed it in certain circumstances, as though that Act was the complete source of our abortion law. But it is not. It has to be read in conjunction with the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929. Subsections (1) and (2) of that Act say that if the gestation period is more than 28 weeks, it is assumed that the child is capable of being born alive. In combination, those two Acts form the basis of our abortion law. When the 1929 Act spoke of 28 weeks, it did so because at that time it was not expected that a child could be born alive before then. In law, capable of being born alive was not even taken to mean capable of surviving. I hope that the one common ground uniting us all is that 28 weeks can no longer be considered appropriate.

Ms. Clare Short: The hon. Gentleman has touched on a crucial point that is frequently misunderstood. It is not the case that it would be legal to abort a foetus that was capable of life, even if it was less than 28 weeks old. It is illegal to kill any foetus that is capable of being born alive. That is the law. Therefore, many of the arguments for reducing the 28-week period represent a misunderstanding of the present law.

Mr. Nicholls: I suspect that this will be the first and last time, even in this Parliament, that I say that the hon. Lady and I are in total agreement on a point.

The essence of that Act was the capability of being born alive and not the period of 28 weeks. The difficulty is that in practice the exception becomes the norm. It would be a brave, optimistic and, probably, well-heeled man, who would tell a doctor, who had gone through the procedures under the Act and who had aborted a foetus at 23 weeks, that he was to be subjected to a private prosecution claiming that at that age the child was capable of being born alive. That is the difficulty.

I think that I have correctly identified the source of the abortion law. We have moved a long way since 1929, and it is now obvious that a child is capable of being born alive at 28 weeks. It is not just a question of making a slight advance involving a week here or there. It is now possible for a child to be born alive at 23 weeks and, moreover, for it to survive. In such debates, the evidence inevitably tends to become anecdotal, and is sometimes no worse for that. But here the evidence is better than that.

On 10 March 1984 an article appeared in The Lancet entitled, "Capable of Being Born Alive". Mr. Dunn and Mr. Stirrat of the Bristol maternity hospital reviewed the state of the law as we all understand it to be. A footnote to that article read:

"At the time of writing two infants of 23 weeks gestation are in our care, one now being 2½ weeks old the other 1 week old."

I do not know whether those two children even survived the date of publication, but if they did, there cannot be the slightest doubt that the child who survived two and half weeks was capable not only of being born alive but of surviving.

I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister will make a statement along the following lines. If those two statutes taken in combination are properly the foundation of our abortion law, it cannot be right that that 28-week guideline — I hestitate to use that word for reasons that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) would correct me for — with all the implications that it has, should still be valid. If we are concerned to get our abortion laws right, something must be done, sooner rather than later, to ensure that that time limit is reduced.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central, (Mr. Hamilton) spoke about the sacredness of human life, and that is right. He might have correctly identified me as being one of those who are in favour of capital punishment and in favour of strengthening or, as he might have it, of de-liberalising our abortion laws. We could both argue until we were blue in the face, but neither of us would be convinced that the other was right. But I would argue that a person can forfeit his right to life by a crime so heinous that he should be subject to a capital penalty. But ingenious though the mind of a lawyer is, I cannot begin to conceive of how a foetus that has yet to be born can have committed some crime that requires its extinction. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman's point was no good.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central also spoke about the elimination of unhappiness. Again, that unites us. I am not arguing in favour of the abolition of abortion. With all due respect, however, the hon. Gentleman will have to do better than talk about the elimination of unhappiness. In talking about eliminating unhappiness, we are talking about eliminating human life. To consider the woman's happiness does not mean to say that one can simply ignore the fact that the child will be subject not just to unhappiness but to death.

Where do we go from here? We are entitled to say that the legislaion under which abortions are performed should be tightened up in view of what we now know about foetology. There is also a job to be done in terms of educating the public, and especially the child-bearing public, about exactly what is involved in an abortion. It is not just a question of going into hospital and having an anonymous collection of cells removed. If a woman has an abortion by vacuum aspiration, she is committing herself to allowing the child within her to be dismembered. If that is the sort of thing that abortion involves, the public should know about it. If a woman, knowing that, still goes ahead with an abortion, she has at least done so with her eyes open. I hope that a film such as "The Silent Scream" will be broadcast on ITV and BBC with all the counterbalancing propaganda that I am sure that the hon. Member for Ladywood will be able to provide.

Ms. Clare Short: That film is completely fabricated.

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Lady howls that the film is fabricated. The death of the child certainly is fabricated, but if it is such a monstrous fabrication, I can see no reason why it should not be given air space so that the hon. Lady can produce her arguments to prove that it is fabricated.

Since 1967, 2¼ million babies have been killed before being born but after conception. In only 2 per cent. of the cases were the mothers' lives at risk or the babies seriously deformed. In 98 per cent. of the cases, therefore, the babies were killed because under the Abortion Act 1967 one can have one's child killed for what amounts to little more than the fact that one finds it inconvenient to bear it or because it might be inconvenient to its existing brothers and sisters. In a civilised society, we cannot allow that to continue indefinitely.

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) has just made the most unbelievably, incredibly patronising speech. He talked about educating the child-bearing population. It is about time that he and some of his hon. Friends were educated. The trouble with this House is that it is dominated by males who think that they know what is best for women.

The hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) is one of a string of hon. Members who have said that the Abortion Act brings to the country an air of permissiveness, a lowering of moral standards and a diminution in the sanctity of the family. He and others suggest that the Act allows abortion on demand. That is not true. They say that women frivolously use abortion as a contraceptive. That is not true either. They say that the tightening up of this already limited legislation will ensure a rosy picture of happier and more stable parents and children. Nothing is further from the truth.

As everyone in the House knows, abortion has existed since the beginning of time. Throughout history, wealthy women have always been able to have abortions without problems or questions; they simply had to provide the money. No comfortable place in a private clinic was open to those without money. Poorer women had two options. Their first was to continue the pregnancy and have an unwanted child. It is not true that children are always wanted when they arrive. Their second option was to have a back-street abortion—a messy and dangerous practice which I am glad to say has almost disappeared. However, I fear that it may be on the way back if some Conservative Members have their way.

Many figures have been quoted, and I want to put mine on the record. The number of abortions on residents in England and Wales fell each year between 1980 and 1983. However, in the first half of 1984 the number increased by 3,052—5 per cent.—compared with the first half of 1983. That rise occurred in the 16 to 29 age group. The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys has pointed out that this took place about three to five months after the publication in the previous October of papers associating certain malignant diseases with the long-term use of oral contraceptives. It is obvious that many women were frightened by the pill scares and changed to less reliable means of contraception. The result was more unwanted pregnancies and more abortions.

It is more important to consider the rate of abortions rather than the numbers, because the rate takes account of the increases and decreases in the numbers of women in the fertile age group.

The abortion rate has remained at or under 12 women per thousand for the past 13 years. That is one of the lowest abortion rates in the world, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) said. It is remarkable that it has remained so steady. It shows that women are using contraception in the most effective way possible. There is no foolproof method of contraception. Women are not using abortion as a method of contraception. Abortion is used only in the most dire circumstances — when contraception has failed or when conception is the result of an unplanned act.

Much has been made of the number of abortions performed on young women between the ages of 16 and 29 who are not married and have no children. The implication is that all such women are fit and healthy and that they should have babies or, if they do not want babies, that they should bear them and offer them for adoption. Many hon. Members have said that. It is an odd argument, because many of those who use it are now holding up their hands in horror at the idea of surrogacy. They suggest that everyone should go through with an unplanned pregnancy to term and then offer the child for adoption, but when it comes to surrogacy they say, "No, we cannot have that." I do not understand their argument.

The House should take account of the trends. Women are no longer prepared to put up with a pregnancy that they do not want and with which they cannot cope. Many women want to plan a family. They want to develop their talents, to work and to earn a living before having a family. Few women now feel compelled to marry if they become pregnant. In 1969, about 44·5 per cent. of pregnant women married before the child was born. In most cases, they were shotgun marriages. In 1981 the figure was 19 per cent.—a much healthier figure.

Society no longer condemns a woman for having an illegitimate child. That is another reason why women do not feel that it is necessary to marry. Many women categorised as single live with their partner in a stable relationship. They simply do not think it important to marry. In 1982, 59 per cent. of illegitimate births were jointly registered. Parliament must take account of changes in attitudes and values and in the way in which people live.

Births and abortions to under 16-year-olds since 1974, when contraceptives were made freely available to all, regardless of age, have remained static. At least, they have up to now. Abortions for women in that age group have remained at under 10 in 1,000 since 1974. The rate of live births in that age group has been at or under three in 1,000 since 1974. The number of illegitimate births has risen as young girls have decided to keep their children, because they believe that society will tolerate that decision.

An acute danger to that stable position now hangs over young girls and their doctors. I refer to the recent judgment by the Appeal Court which stops girls under 16 from getting help from their doctors without the express consent of their parents. Lord Justice Parker, one of the Appeal Court judges, said that that might lead to pregnancy, back-street abortion or even death.

On 8 February, The Times reported that the British Medical Association had received information that two young girls were alleged to have committed suicide as a result of not receiving the contraceptive advice that they sought. One was a girl who was sexually assaulted by her father and who learnt that she could not obtain contraceptive advice without her mother knowing of it. The other was a 12-year-old girl who sought advice, but her parents objected. They are reported to have taken their lives. Is that really what Conservative Members want?

Perhaps hon. Members with teenage daughters have a close and understanding relationship with them. I hope so. If so, they are fortunate, because many do not have that relationship. Many daughters do not feel that they can discuss sex with their parents. Family situations vary enormously, and there is often conflict in the home which creates a tense atmosphere in which young girls find it difficult to talk about matters at that time in their development. Therefore, they need access to their doctors.

Under-16s are badly frightened and feel abandoned. I suppose that that fear and sense of isolation is viewed by the moralists on the Conservative Benches as a healthy deterrent to young girls under the age of 16 having sex. Goodness knows how many girls have become pregnant since the Court of Appeal judgment. The moralists have tabled an early-day motion against abortion for girls under 16. I am afraid that that will not stop pregnancies. I hope that the Court of Appeal judgment is changed. Do hon. Members really want no advice, no counselling, no contraception and, if the worst comes to the worst, no abortion, other than illegal or back-street abortion, for girls under 16?

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I want girls under 16 to take advice from their parents and not to obtain contraceptive advice that is not officially allowed because it is against the law. That would help to bring about a decent family life for those girls.

Ms. Richardson: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. Contraceptive advice for under-16s is not against the law. He overlooks the fact that many girls cannot and will not discuss it with their parents. They feel that they cannot talk to them. Of course, it would be preferable if they could, and that is what the counselling service and the doctors advise. If we follow the advice of Conservative Members, the clock will be turned back.

Almost every day during Question Time we urge girls to make the most of education and employment opportunities. We tell them to stay at school, get on with their education and grasp the chances to make something of themselves, yet we deny them the understanding advice and help that would enable them to view sex in a sensible manner at a difficult time in their lives.

There is little support among the public or the medical profession for restricting the grounds for abortion. In 1983, the Gallup Poll found that 74 per cent. of the public thought that the decision whether or not to continue a pregnancy should be left to the woman in consultation with her doctor. Support for that view has been high since 1979 —never lower than 74 per cent., which is three quarters of those sampled. The support is high regardless of the age, sex, political opinion or religion of those polled. There is growing support for a more liberal abortion law that would allow women to make their own decisions on abortion. In 1979, the National Opinion Poll found that 56 per cent. of people thought that abortion should be available legally to those who wanted it. That was confirmed in a later NOP survey in The Sun.

People tend to think that it is easy to obtain an abortion. It is not. Many of my hon. Friends have pointed out the difficulties that face women and girls seeking abortion. We know of the widespread concern about the unevenness of NHS provision—from the disgraceful figures in the west midlands where only 3 to 4 per cent. of women can obtain abortions on the NHS to the 97 per cent. who can do so in the north of England. It would have become the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle more and earned him my respect if part of his motion had referred to the inadequacies of NHS provision for abortion. That would have been a good point to debate, and preferable to the high moral tone that the hon. Gentleman chose to take.

A number of different organisations and bodies have taken a similar view about NHS facilities—for example, the Royal Commission and the Select Committee which considered abortion in 1981, on which both the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) and the Minister's predecessor served. Indeed, the Minister's predecessor expressed his concern that NHS abortion facilities should be improved. However, those facilities are still not good enough. Only last month the Women's National Commission working group on health, chaired by Dame Ann Springman of the Conservative women's national committee, said that where an abortion is permissible, NHS facilities should be made available at the earliest possible stage and that day care facilities should be extended. The Labour party's programme gives priority to improving NHS facilities, including day care, so that choice can be effective wherever the woman lives.

During all the agitation, the pontificating, the attacks on the existing abortion laws and the moralising that we have heard this evening, nothing has been said about the role of the man. Women are blamed for needing abortions. It is represented as their fault if they become pregnant —they have not taken precautions; the precautions have gone wrong so it is bad luck on them; they must bear the agony and the fear of not finding a doctor willing to help; they must bear the main brunt of an abortion and all the difficulties that go with it. Nowhere in the argument is the role and the responsibility of the man pointed out. That was most noticeable in the speech of the hon. Member for Teignbridge. The women are made to feel blameworthy and guilty. If they cannot cope, people look down on them. They are talked about as though they did not exist or work in this place. They are continually put down by less than half the population—the men—who want to decide for them what they should do with their bodies.

Even in the argument about the under-16s and the recent Court of Appeal judgment, it is the daughters' difficulties that are exposed and it is their lives that are being endangered. The law actually protects boys of 14, but they have not been mentioned in our discussion. The House should remember that in our moralising we must understand that women will not for ever be prepared to go on being unable to control their fertility and their bodies. They will continue to demand more rights and more of a say in how they shape their lives.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh), first, on his good fortune in obtaining this allocation of parliamentary time and, secondly, on giving the House the opportunity to consider this subject again. Since the Abortion Act 1967 was passed the House has considered its provisions on several occasions and several attempts have been made to introduce amending legislation, although none has been successful. But it is surprising—it has surprised me during my time as Minister for Health—that the House has not considered the subject since 1981. The previous occasion on which the House considered it was when the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) introduced a Ten-minute Bill, which did not reach the statute book.

Although some hon. Members criticised my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle, and although I do not agree with all of his views on this subject, the way in which he put them forward commanded respect, and I am sure that his reasonable proposition will be supported by many inside and outside the House.

I must make it clear that the Government, like all their predecessors, are neutral on the great issues of principle that are raised by abortion. The Government believe that it is for Parliament to decide the law and to take any opportunity that the majority wishes to change the law. Since Parliament has decided that abortions may lawfully be carried out in the circumstances specified in the Act, the Government have a duty to ensure that the provisions of the law are properly applied. That must remain our view. I have always been a supporter of the 1967 Act and believed that the way in which it has been applied has, on balance, been beneficial to society. But as I speak in this debate, because I happen to be the Minister for Health, I shall not take advantage of the time to discuss at length some of the issues that have been raised, which I might have done were I not on the Front Bench.

Following the examination of the working of the Act by the Lane committee and later by the Select Committee on abortion, we now have a strict system of control over the application of the Act. I assure the House that my Department takes seriously its duties of inspection and control of private clinics. We monitor closely the operation of the Act, and I assure hon. Members that our monitoring machinery does not reveal any abuse of it. The Government are satisfied that they are ensuring, to the best of their ability, that the wishes of Parliament are respected. That means that abortions are being carried out in proper circumstances and only when the provisions of the Act are satisfied. Obviously, we must strive to ensure that that continues to be the case.

I and the Government share my hon. Friend's concern that many abortions are still considered necessary, for the reasons that were expounded by the hon. Member for Barking. The background to most abortions is at least error, but often it is severe emotional crisis. Abortion is often the cause of considerable distress and difficulty. The figures for 1981, 1982 and 1983 showed a slight decrease in the number of abortions. From the best test that can be applied, which is the number of abortions per thousand women between the ages of 15 and 44, we discover that the rate fell from 12·62 in 1980 to 11·94 in 1983.

It is regrettable that the 1984 figures that we have so far show a slight increase in abortions. No one knows what caused that, but I share the theory of the hon. Member for Barking that it almost certainly resulted from the scare that followed last year's reports of possible dangers from the contraceptive pill. When those stories emerged, we did our best to give proper advice to women, which included asking them to ensure that they finished the course of contraceptive treatment upon which they had embarked, and that they took advice about alternative methods of contraception. But it seems likely that some women, in panic, stopped the course of pills that they were taking or made a mistake in changing to other methods. Everyone who has spoken in the debate, with whatever views, must hope that the downward trend which we previously witnessed will soon return and continue.

I agree with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn), who put his views in his usual colourful way, that one of the best things that we can do to reduce the large number of abortions is to encourage the sensible use of family planning. We do that by the provision of a free family planning service, which we believe is an essential preventive measure which contributes to the avoidance of unwanted pregnancy, to the proper spacing and timing of children and, therefore, to better maternal and child health and to a secure and stable family life. For that reason, we support financially those voluntary bodies that work in this area and the family planning information service.

The hon. Member for Barking felt free to express her views about the case that has been brought against the Department by Mrs. Gillick. She will understand that, as the matter is still waiting to go to the House of Lords, I would rather not be drawn into that discussion. But it is important that that Court of Appeal decision is appealed, if only to clarify some of the doubts left unanswered by the way in which the judgment was expressed. This is an important matter for our society, and the highest court in the land must give a clear ruling on whether the guidance issued by the Department was lawful.

In the brief time that I propose to take in the debate, I shall say a few words about the matter which most concerned my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle. He was worried, as were many hon. Members, about the late stage at which some abortions are performed, especially having regard to the advances in medical techniques of helping premature babies to survive. This matter has caused anxiety for many years, and it has been considered from time to time since the Lane committee produced its report. Several hon. Members have accurately described the legal and statistical position, so I shall not repeat everything that has been said about the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929, which was described by my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), and its relationship to the present law. As he said, the Act requires prima facie proof that a foetus is capable of being born alive if a pregnancy is of more than 28 weeks' duration.

As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) made clear, the Infant Life (Preservation) Act protects the life of any foetus capable of being born alive, but in practice the 28-week period has been taken as the usual guideline for the application of that Act. The Lane committee recommended that it should be made illegal for an abortion to be carried out after 24 weeks, but, after repeated attempts, the House has not yet been able to resolve that matter, and the law stands as it was in 1929 and in 1967.

The Government have become concerned about the state of the law because of the changes in medical techniques. In March 1980, my predecessor—my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan) — asked the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists to undertake a review of late abortion practice. Its report was published early in 1984, and I commend it to those hon. Members who have not read it. The Government have been considering how best to follow the eight major recommendations in the report, which examined the causes for late abortions and the way in which unnecessary delays and, therefore, the number of late abortions might be reduced. The report has been helpful in drawing attention to the factors which cause abortion to be carried out later than need otherwise happen. We hope that those who provide abortion services, whether it be the National Health Service or the private sector, will consider its findings carefully.

The Government propose to act in several ways. First, to take the point made by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) among others, we propose to discuss with NHS representatives the report's findings about delays between referrals and operations in the NHS. We shall be having serious discussions with National Health Service representatives to ascertain whether improvements can be made in practice in areas where delays seem to be inexplicably longer than in other parts of the country. We shall try to disseminate the best practice so that the lessons learnt in one place can be applied by authorities elsewhere. I understand that there is a good scheme which appears to be working well in Newcastle. If it is proved that Newcastle has a better method of handling these matters, we shall do our best to commend it to other health authorities and so spread it through the service.

Secondly, the recommendations of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists point to a need for more education, especially for younger women, to make them appreciate the urgency of early consultation and decision making when pregnancy occurs. We shall be consulting our colleagues in the Department of Education and Science about the prospects for more health education and counselling facilities for young people in this sensitive area.

Thirdly, we shall be seeking to reinforce in every other way the importance of early recognition of pregnancy and recourse to advice when anyone faces a crisis of the sort that we are discussing. That message has already been highlighted by the Maternity Services Advisory Committee, which the Government set up and whose report we have already commended to health authorities.

The Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, together with other medical bodies, is considering actively whether to recommend that the 1929 Act should be amended to change the definition of "foetal viability" from 28 to fewer weeks. The hon. Member for East Kilbride (Dr. Miller), the only Member with a medical qualification to speak in the debate, told us that there is not unanimity within the medical profession on this matter. However, I feel that most doctors consider that 28 weeks is too long a period. This important matter needs to be considered at the level at which the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists is now examining it. When the medical bodies produce their advice, I am sure that it will be widely debated and that the House, as well as the Government, will want to consider it and decide what implications it has for abortion law. I suggest that until we have had time to consider the views of the Royal College it will be foolish for the Government to take a view about any alternative to the 28-week provision. It is probably a little premature for anyone to try to introduce a proposal to make changes in the law.

I think that we all expect the Royal College to come out with a shorter period than 28 weeks. Long ago the Lane committee said that 24 weeks should be the maximum for a legal abortion. Practically everyone who has contributed to the debate has suggested that perhaps 28 weeks is too long a period and that it should be reduced.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) and others reminisced about previous Bills. I remember the issues which have been discussed this evening being canvassed when the House considered the Bill that was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Corrie). My hon. Friend tried to introduce a substantial amendment to the 1967 Act. In this debate those with views as opposite as the hon. Members for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) and for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) have supported a reduction from 28 to 24 weeks. I remember that I did when the Corrie Bill was passing through the House. I think that I voted to that effect, although I have not checked to ensure that I was present when the Division took place. However, I recall that I supported a reduction from 28 to 24 weeks. The majority of the House voted in favour of the reduction when the Division took place in the course of our consideration of the Corrie Bill.

It is my recollection that the sponsors of the Corrie Bill insisted on adding many other drastic amendments, with the result that those like the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), for Fife, Central and for Barking and myself, who would otherwise have been happy to see a reduction from 28 to 24 weeks placed on the statute book, found that everyone's wishes were frustrated because the Bill was eventually talked out.

If the Royal College returns with some clear advice, I think that the House will have a duty to recognise that there is an amazingly wide spread of opinion. I hope that I shall be forgiven for referring to the opinions of my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point and of the hon. Member for Barking. Probably 28 weeks is too long a period, and the House must concentrate on making progress on that issue, if on nothing else, if that proves to be the recommendation of the Royal College. It will be for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to decide whether the Government will provide time for these matters to be considered by the introduction of a Bill, if and when this hypothetical situation ever arises. That is not a matter to be decided before the Royal College reports to us.

Mrs. Renée Short: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that only 0·6 per cent. of terminations take place at 28 weeks or later? It is still a tiny percentage and we should not get it out of all proportion when considering this matter.

Mr. Clarke: I accept that the number is tiny, but it is not insignificant. If the Royal College says that 28 weeks is now an unrealistically long period for "foetal viability", to use the jargon, and that medical practice has been transformed during the period from 1929 to 1985, I think that the House will wish to address itself to modern practice and, perhaps, to insert a more realistic limit in the statute book. However, I accept that we must not get this issue out of all proportion.

Mr. Alton: I think that earlier the Minister said that he did not think that this would be the right moment for any hon. Member to introduce amending legislation to reduce the time limit when abortions can be carried out from 28 to 24 weeks. The Lane committee, a long time ago, said that that should be done, the World Health Organisation said that that should be done and the sponsors of earlier legislation took the same view. When does the right hon. and learned Gentleman think will be the right time?

Mr. Clarke: The Government will not produce any legislation of that sort. I was expressing a personal view. As the Royal College is considering the issue at this moment, I take the view that we might as well await its report. It may be that the Royal College will not say that 24 weeks is the right time. It is possible that it will opt for some other period. As I have said, I do not think that it will be long before it reports.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle addressed himself to nurses and whether the so-called conscience clause needed to be strengthened. When the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North was being considered, it received a great deal of support from all sections of the House as it contained provisions that suggested that the conscience clause might be rewritten. I have no evidence that the clause is not being applied properly now. I am not aware that any nurses have been dismissed for refusing to take part in abortion operations. I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle that we would wish to intervene to ensure that something was done if we found that any nurse had been so ill-treated.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I have been told that when doctors have applied for posts in certain hospitals they have been denied appointments because they said that they would refuse to terminate pregnancies. Will the Minister corroborate or reject that allegation?

Mr. Clarke: I am not aware of any such cases. We have no evidence that such cases have arisen. The allegation has been made repeatedly, but no cases of that sort have been brought to me as Minister. That applies to nurses and to doctors seeking appointments. If anything of that sort has happened, it should not have done.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Let us suppose that there are two gynaecologists at a hospital, one of whom performs abortions and the other does not because of his conscience. Let us suppose also that the one who performs the abortions leaves. The post would have to be filled, and the board would be within its rights to insist that at least one gynaecologist at the hospital should fulfil his obligations to the Health Service.

Mr. Clarke: I cannot say what considerations a hypothetical board might take into account in the hypothetical situation that the hon. Gentleman has postulated. However, nurses are protected. We insist that they have a conscience clause. A doctor's prospects should not be adversely affected if, for some religious scruple, he does not want to take part in abortions.

I have considerable sympathy with the two basic issues that my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle raised. I do not believe that he had a fierce opponent or critic on the proposal to shorten the period during which abortions can take place or on his remarks about a conscience clause. I am grateful to him for raising these matters. I assure him that the Government will maintain their neutrality while seeking to ensure that all the safeguards in the present Act are applied in practice from now on.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): To pregnant women, especially those in an advanced stage of pregnancy, the decision whether to have an abortion is agonising. I do not believe that abortions are lightly entered into. I am convinced that the decision whether to have a late abortion is not taken without a great deal of heart searching. Because it is a difficult decision, I very much deplore the attitude of those who talk about abortion in terms of numbers or as though it were entered into flippantly. That attitude is particularly deplorable when it comes from men.

The hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) will never have to struggle with the problems of contraception which, despite recent advances, can not only make a person ill, but be painful and unreliable. He will never have to face the shock of a pregnancy that has not been diagnosed until it is well advanced. The hon. Gentleman will never have to face the agony of deciding whether to carry to term an abnormal foetus and bring into the world to lead a short life a child who might be severely handicapped.

It being Seven o'clock, the proceedings lapsed, pursuant to Standing Order No. 6 (Arrangement of Public Business).

Local Government Bill (Allocation of Time)

7 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I beg to move, That the following provisions shall apply to the remaining proceedings on the Bill:—

Committee

1. The Standing Committee to which the Bill (except Clause 1) is allocated shall report the Bill (except Clause 1) to the House on or before 7th March 1985.

Report and Third Reading

2. — (1) The proceedings on Consideration and Third Reading of the Bill shall be completed in two allotted days and shall be brought to a conclusion at Ten o'clock on the second of those days; and for the purposes of Standing Order No. 45 (Business Committee) this Order shall be taken to allot to the proceedings on Consideration such part of those days as the Resolution of the Business Committee may determine.

(2) The Business Committee shall report to the House its Resolutions as to the proceedings on Consideration of the Bill, and as to the allocation of time between those proceedings and proceedings on Third Reading, not later than the fourth day on which the House sits after the day on which the Chairman of the Standing Committee reports the Bill to the House.

(3) The Resolutions in any Report made under Standing Order No. 45 may be varied by a further Report so made, whether or not within the time specified in sub-paragraph (2) above, and whether or not the Resolutions have been agreed to by the House.

(4) The Resolutions of the Business Committee may include alterations in the order in which proceedings on Consideration of the Bill are taken.

Procedure in Standing Committee

3.—(1) At a sitting of the Standing Committee at which any proceedings on the Bill are to be brought to a conclusion under a Resolution of the Business Sub-Committee the Chairman shall not adjourn the Committee under any Order relating to the sittings of the Committee until the proceedings have been brought to a conclusion.

(2) No Motion shall be moved in the Standing Committee relating to the sitting of the Committee except by a member of the Government, and the Chairman shall permit a brief explanatory statement from the Member who moves, and from a Member who opposes, the Motion, and shall then put the Question thereon.

4. No Motion shall be moved to alter the order in which Clauses, Schedules, new Clauses and new Schedules are taken in the Standing Committee but the Resolutions of the Business Sub-Committee may include alterations in that order.

Conclusion of proceedings in Committee

5. On the conclusion of the proceedings in any Committee on the Bill the Chairman shall report the Bill (or such of its provisions as were committed or re-committed to that Committee) to the House without putting any Question.

Dilatory Motions

6. No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, proceedings on the Bill shall be moved in the Standing Committee or on an allotted day except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

Extra time on first allotted day

7.—(1) On the first allotted day paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings on the Bill for two hours after Ten o'clock.

(2) Any period during which proceedings on the Bill may be proceeded with after Ten o'clock under paragraph (7) of Standing Order No. 10 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) shall be in addition to the said period of two hours.

(3) If the first allotted day is one to which a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 stands over from an earlier day, a period of time equal to the duration of the proceedings upon that Motion shall be added to the said period of two hours.

Private business

8. Any private business which has been set down for consideration at Seven o'clock on an allotted day shall, instead of being considered as provided by Standing Orders, be considered at the conclusion of the proceedings on the Bill on that day, and paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the private business for a period of three hours from the conclusion of the proceedings on the Bill or, if those proceedings are concluded before Ten o'clock, for a period equal to the time elapsing between Seven o'clock and the conclusion of those proceedings.

Conclusion of proceedings

9. — (1) For the purpose of bringing to a conclusion any proceedings which are to be brought to a conclusion at a time appointed by this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee or the Business Sub-Committee and which have not previously been brought to a conclusion, the Chairman or Mr. Speaker shall forthwith put the following Questions (but no others)—

(a) any Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) any Question necessary to bring to a decision a Question so proposed (including, in the case of a new Clause or new Schedule which has been read a second time, the Question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill);

(c) the Question on any amendment or Motion standing on the Order Paper in the name of any Member, if that amendment or Motion is moved by a Member of the Government; and on a Motion so moved for a new Clause or a new Schedule, the Chairman or Mr. Speaker shall put only the Question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill.

(d) any other Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded;

(2) Proceedings under sub-paragraph (1) above shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

(3) If an allotted day is one on which a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) would, apart from this Order, stand over to Seven o'clock—

(a) that Motion shall stand over until the conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which, under this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee, are to be brought to a conclusion at or before that time;

(b) the bringing to a conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which, under this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee, are to be brought to a conclusion after that time shall be postponed for a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on that Motion.

(4) If an allotted day is one to which a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 9 stands over from an earlier day, the bringing to a conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which, under this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee, are to be brought to a conclusion on that day shall be postponed for a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on that Motion.

Supplemental orders

10. — (1) The proceedings on any Motion moved in the House by a member of the Government for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order (including anything which might have been the subject of a report of the Business Committee or Business Sub-Committee) shall, if not previously concluded, be brought to a conclusion one hour after they have been commenced, and paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(2) If on an allotted day on which any proceedings on the Bill are to be brought to a conclusion at a time appointed by this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee the House is adjourned, or the sitting is suspended, before that time no notice shall be required of a Motion moved at the next sitting by a member of the Government for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order.

Saving

11. Nothing in this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee or Business Sub-Committee shall—

(a) prevent any proceedings to which the Order or Resolution applies from being taken or completed earlier than is required by the Order or Resolution, or

[Mr. John Biffen]

(b) prevent any business (whether on the Bill or not) from being proceeded with on any day after the completion of all such proceedings on the Bill as are to be taken on that day.

Re-committal

12.—(1) References in this Order to proceedings on Consideration or proceedings on Third Reading include references to proceedings, at those stages respectively, for, on or in consequence of re-committal.

(2) On an allotted day no debate shall be permitted on any Motion to re-commit the Bill (whether as a whole or otherwise), and Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith any Question necessary to dispose of the Motion, including the Question on any amendment moved to the Question.

Interpretation

13. In this Order—

"allotted day" means any day (other than a Friday) on which the Bill is put down as first Government Order of the Day provided that a Motion for allotting time to the proceedings on the Bill to be taken on that day either has been agreed on a previous day or is set down for consideration on that day;

"the Bill" means the Local Government Bill;

"Resolution of the Business Sub-Committee" means a Resolution of the Business Sub-Committee as agreed to by the Standing Committee;

"Resolution of the Business Committee" means a Resolution of the Business Committee as agreed to by the House.

As the whole House is only too well aware, this motion sets out a timetable for the Bill designed to abolish the Greater London and metropolitan county councils. This is a major piece of legislation. The Government have been committed to it since before the general election in June 1983. The case for the Bill will be dealt with in greater detail by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government at the conclusion of the debate, but let me say at once that I believe that case to be formidable and to have been fully made out during the prolonged debate which has taken place on the issue, both in Parliament and outside.

The Bill had its origins in the White Paper "Streamlining the Cities" which was published in October 1983 together with a series of consultation papers. These documents gave rise to a lengthy period of consultation and discussion. In addition, there were long and probing debates in Parliament during the last Session on the Bill which became the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984. I do not believe, therefore, that anyone can claim that the policy that lies behind the Bill has not been thoroughly examined.

The Bill is substantial. It has to make arrangements for the transfer of functions to the successor authorities, including police, fire, passenger transport and the newly constituted Inner London education authority. The Bill has to deal also with the implications for staff and to settle the financial arrangements. It is therefore right that a substantial amount of parliamentary time should be provided for it to be debated, and the Government have recognised this.

In addition to two full days on Second Reading, clause 1 was committed to a Committee of the whole House. The remainder has now been under discussion in Standing Committee for over 100 hours.

In referring to the proceedings in Standing Committee I recognise that the Opposition have demonstrated their developing expertise in these matters. I congratulate them on the fact that they have not on this occasion chosen to rely solely on the tactics immortalised by the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding). There has been no repeat of the marathon filibusters which were such a lamentable feature of the Telecommunications Bill in the last two Sessions of Parliament. None the less, progress has been slow.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): To backup the right hon. Gentleman's point, will he recognise that one of the longest speeches made in Standing Committee — 72 minutes — was made by the Minister of State, Department of Transport? If the guillotine motion is implemented, hon. Members will have less than 40 minutes to discuss each remaining clause. It is a matter not of filibustering but of the Government trying to curtail debate.

Mr. Biffen: That statistic shows the generosity of my hon. Friend the Minister in giving way to the many interruptions that marked her speech.

In its first sitting the Committee discussed the three lines that make up clause 2 for two and a half hours, despite the fact that no amendments to that clause had been selected. Thirty eight hours were then devoted to clauses 3 and 4 and schedule 1. At that rate of progress the Bill would have spent well over 400 hours in Committee— [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] The Opposition's cheers indicate that that was their aspiration.

After more than 100 hours, there are more than 80 clauses and nine schedules still to be debated.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The right hon. Gentleman seems to be surprised that the Opposition should say, "Hear, hear" to the idea of the Bill being discussed for more than 400 hours. He will recall that the London Government Act 1963 at least had the benefit of three years of a Royal Commission to consider all the proposals for reorganisation. If we had had a similar amount of time to consider these proposals for reorganisation, the right hon. Gentleman would not now be moving the guillotine motion.

Mr. Biffen: I am happy that the hon. Gentleman referred to a measure which, in its day, was also guillotined.

Furthermore, the debate has to be concluded to enable the other place to carry out its own measured consideration of these major local government reforms. It is therefore clear that the imposition of a timetable is required to secure proper consideration of the very important provisions still outstanding. That timetable is realistically drawn and will not be unreasonable. The motion will allow the Committee a further 16 sessions if the Business Sub-Committee decides to continue morning and afternoon sittings. Sensibly allocated, that will allow all the significant issues to be discussed. In addition, two full days—one lasting until midnight — will be provided on the Floor of the House for Report and Third Reading.

Mr. Tony Banks: We will all turn into pumpkins.

Mr. Biffen: That fate overtakes a great many Opposition Members as they run out of reasoned arguments and resort to a level of contribution that is barely above a reading of the London telephone directory.

I think it appropriate that at this point I should say a few words on the subject of timetabling in general.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Before my right hon. Friend goes on to discuss timetabling in general, will he state whether he is aware that, under the timetable he is setting out—ending in Committee on 7 March—hon. Members will be allowed a maximum of 40 minutes per item to discuss the 56 clauses and schedules left? Is that a reasonable amount of time in which to consider such a complicated measure?

Mr. Biffen: I believe that it is a reasonable amount in the light of my hon. Friend's known quality to present his arguments succinctly and persuasively.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): All the metropolitan counties and the GLC will be affected. The electorate in those areas expect the person representing them to contribute in Committee to a debate on the major issues. If we have only 40 minutes for each clause, it will not be possible for Opposition Members, let alone Government Members, to speak for more than two minutes on major issues such as the police. I would be able to contribute for only two minutes to the debate on the consequences for the police force in the whole of Merseyside.

Mr. Biffen: That is just an argument for debate sharing. I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman, who has a reputation for putting his arguments with accuracy and effect, will put his case even more accurately and effectively if it is allied with the quality of brevity.

As the House knows, the Select Committee on Procedure is now engaged on an inquiry into public Bill procedure, and timetabling figures in that inquiry. My own evidence to the Committee is a matter of public record and I do not wish to rehearse the arguments now. At business questions last week I was made aware by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) of the continuing desire in some parts of the House for automatic timetabling. I still believe that adequate and balanced debate on matters of great interest can generally be better secured by negotiation and agreement than by the imposition of a prejudged timetable from the outset. Agreement is, unfortunately, not always possible. My reluctance to abandon the system of negotiation and agreement is, I hope, a testimony to my personal instinct for unfettered debate.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Does my right hon. Friend know how many times after discussions with the Opposition there has been agreement to have reasonable discussions on a Bill without having to timetable it? Secondly, has he sought such an arrangement over this Bill, and if so what was the answer?

Mr. Biffen: On my hon. Friend's first point, without notice I cannot give him a statistical answer, but most Bills go through the House with an overt or tacit agreement as to their broad time schedule. His second point can more appropriately be dealt with by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government.

I make those comments notwithstanding the scepticism of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), contained in an article in The Times last Monday. In that article, and again at business questions last week, he alleged that the statistics demonstrate this Treasury Bench to be the most enthusiastic guillotiners since Robespierre.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): I did not say that.

Mr. Biffen: The implication was even more dreadful. As we are all aware, an innocent reliance on global statistics can mislead. The House may benefit from a rather more detached, if not desiccated, analysis of recent history.

The Labour party was in power for five years and two months from February 1974. During that period it introduced a timetable on 12 occasions. This Government took office in May 1979, and five years and nine months have elapsed. This is the 16th guillotine motion that we have introduced. One must also bear in mind, however, the fact that two of those timetables were introduced on the same Telecommunications Bill because of the fortuitous circumstances of the 1983 general election. In addition, on one occasion in 1982 I had the irksome task of introducing a guillotine against some of the Government's supporters. The incident left me with the clearest impression that it was no ordinary guillotine occasion. I do not include it in the tally. Thus, a true reading of the score would be 12 to the Labour Government, 14 to the Conservative Government — [Interruption.] I have not finished. This is just the beginning of this in-depth analysis.

We must also consider the fact that the Labour Government were effectively in a minority in the House from March 1977 onwards. Thereafter, the Government could only guillotine by courtesy of the Liberal party. Thus, it is fairer to say that an autonomous Labour Government introduced nine guillotines in three years and this Treasury Bench, on a comparable basis, 14 guillotines in five years nine months. I believe, therefore, that a dispassionate analysis of the facts——

Mr. Harry Cowans (Tyne Bridge): While the Leader of the House is reading out those statistics, will he tell the House how many of those guillotines were of a constitutional nature, as on this Bill, and how many of them the Government recognised as a constitutional issue by allowing two days to discuss clause 1 on the Floor of the House? If he were to allow two days for the rest of the clauses, that would make sense.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman belongs to a party which during its last term of office forced through guillotines to support devolution—the Wales Bill, the Scotland Bill and a Bill for the establishment of a British contingent to a directly elected European Assembly. The Government need no instruction from him about the constitutional proprieties in these matters.

A dispassionate analysis of the facts does not support the argument of the hon. Member for Blackburn. If there is any lesson to be learnt, it is that over a period of many years Governments of different persuasions have found the use of the timetable motion to be occasionally necessary to ensure the passage of their legislation. The timetable is as necessary to a legislative programme as sewerage is to civilisation.

Mr. Straw: We have all been entertained by the speech of the Leader of the House, especially his dispassionate analysis of the the facts, which reflect his Treasury background. He will not deny that a dispassionate analysis of the facts in the Clerks' evidence to the Select Committee on Procedure clearly showed that in five years the Government guillotined more Bills in Standing Committee than previous Governments guillotined in 20 years.

Mr. Biffen: Yes, but they were the same basic raw statistics in respect of this Government and the previous Labour Government. [Interruption.] They are raw statistics, as I believe I have demonstrated to the general satisfaction of the House. On a more refined consideration, it is clear that there is no preponderance of a disposition for the guillotine on one side of the House rather than on the other.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that if sewerage is important for civilisation it should not be taxed? On the subject of a guillotine motion, following his arguments a few moments ago, does he agree that on both sides of the House guillotines have been used where constitutional arguments and perhaps constitutional propriety have been at stake, and that therefore that is a just criticism of the Bill which he now wishes to guillotine?

Mr. Biffen: I do not believe that the character of the Local Government Bill is any more a constitutional measure than the three propositions of the Labour Governments which I read out a few moments ago. Any attempt to divert argument in that direction would merely lead one to a cul-de-sac.

I do not wish to delay the House further. The Local Government Bill is an important part of the Government's programme. Its passage is awaited by millions of ratepayers and by all those in local government whose decisions will reflect the Bill's contents. This motion will facilitate that passage and do so in a way that allows sensible debate of the issues. I commend the motion to the House.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I have taken part, as has the Leader of the House, in a number of guillotine debates during this Parliament, but I cannot recall one where so great a folly and so much damage will ensue from foreclosing and limiting debate as in the case before us today.

I found the right hon. Gentleman's speech to be completely unconvincing, and not merely in the content and the raw or refined statistics that he put before us which sought to justify or ensure his reputation as a liberal in the matter of guillotines. It was generally delivered in what can only be described as blazing insincerity.

The Government's reasons for stifling debate are all too clear. When the Second Reading of the Local Government Bill came to an end on 4 December, the Opposition's reasoned amendment was defeated and the Government's proposition for the Second Reading was carried by majorities of about 135. It has been remarkable how the Government's majorities have faded since that initial event.

When clause 1, which contains the principle of the Bill —the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils — was taken on the Floor of the House on Wednesday 12 December, the Government's majority on the Opposition's amendment not to proceed until the House had received a report by a Royal Commission on those proposals was only 51 votes. The next amendment by the Opposition which asked for a prior report by the parliamentary committee of inquiry was defeated by only 44 votes, and on the third amendment calling for an independent inquiry into the cost implications for local services the Government had a majority of only 45. In the last vote of that day, an amendment calling for the replacement of the GLC by another directly elected authority was defeated by a mere 23 votes.

The strongest argument against the Bill, though not the only powerful argument against it, was put by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath).

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): The right hon. Gentleman says that majorities fell during the discussion of clause 1 in two days' consideration on the Floor of the House. That clause abolishes the GLC and the six metropolitan counties, but the right hon. Gentleman did not say what majority we had in the Division on clause 1 stand part. How many over 100 was our majority?

Mr. Shore: It was about 100, but there was a super three-line Whip to recover from the humiliation of the 23 majority that reflected the sentiments of Conservative Members at the end of the previous debate.

The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said:

> "The Bill contains proposals for a major constitutional change and it comes without precedent because no public inquiry has been carried out as the basis for it. What is more, the case against the GLC and the metropolitan counties remains unproven. No substantial evidence has been produced for abolishing the GLC or the metropolitan counties."

That is the heart of the matter.

The Bill is, indeed, a constitutional measure. It marks a major shift in the distribution of powers between central and local government. It greatly diminishes the power of local government and local democracy. Indeed, how could it be otherwise when elected local authorities in the metropolitan counties and London, providing services for 18 million people, are to be abolished from 31 March 1986 and no new elected authorities are to be put in their place?

The Secretary of State has disingenuously argued that the overwhelming majority of services taken away from the metropolitan authorities and the GLC will be exercised in future by the lower tier elected authorities in those areas. But he arrives at that conclusion only by listing the trivial with the major functions of the local authorities. Surely what really matters is that services involving 82 per cent. of the spending of metropolitan areas will be removed from directly elected bodies to statutory boards and quangos and that only 18 per cent. will go to the district councils. That conclusion was reached by PA Management Consultants, which carried out a major study of what the Government have proposed.

We have no written constitution, but it has been the practice of successive Governments for a century or more to extend the scope of local democracy. The Bill, along with measures that have preceded it, including the Rates Act, which enables the Secretary of State to determine the rates levied by local authorities, the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act, which abolishes for London and the metropolitan counties the elections that were to have been held on 2 May this year, and the earlier powers that enable the Secretary of State to impose an elaborate system of targets on local authorities, have halted and reversed the long-established trend towards greater local democracy.

Indeed, more powers are now exercised at the centre, by the Secretary of State and, through him, by nominated boards and bodies, than were at any time in the past 100 years. As the right hon. Member for Bexley and Sidcup stressed, all that has been done without an independent inquiry. Not only has there not been an independent inquiry, but there has been no serious thinking in Government Departments about the implications of the policy that they are pursuing and the future arrangements for the services that are affected.

How the Government landed in this miserable state was revealed by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup when he told us — and his words matter enormously:

"The last sad part of the saga is being justified on the ground that the proposals were set out in the Conservative party's manifesto. They were put in nine days after the election was called against the wishes of the party policy committee. They were inserted without the general agreement of those who had been London Conservative Members." — [Official Report, 4 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 190-1.]

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): When we had an independent inquiry—the Redcliffe-Maud inquiry —my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) not only rejected its recommendations, but produced the present hopeless arrangements. In addition, the Labour Government did not accept the Redcliffe-Maud recommendations. They produced different proposals. The met counties had education, and that was not proposed by Redcliffe-Maud.

Mr. Shore: The hon. Gentleman's memory has let him down. There was a minority and a majority report in the Redcliffe-Maud inquiry. The Labour Government had no difficulty in going for the large unitary authorities which were then proposed. Following the 1970 election, a botched-up scheme was put forward, but at least it had some relevance to a recent independent inquiry.

The difficulties facing the Government were predictable. Local government structures and services form a complex jigsaw. By removing the GLC and the six metropolitan county councils, the Government have removed seven major pieces from the board, without any thought-out strategy for redesigning the remaining structure or filling in the gaping holes. That was bound to lead to chaos, improvisation and muddle—and we have had all three.

It is the plain duty of the House and its Standing Committee fully to explore the ramifications of this ill-prepared measure. I reject—though I hardly need to do so, because the Leader of the House has conceded our claim—any suggestion that there has been filibustering in the 100 hours of Committee consideration that the Bill has so far received. Indeed, the longest speech — 72 minutes—was made by a Minister.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: If the right hon. Gentleman looks at the progress made on the Bill in Committee, he will see that, at that rate of progress, there was no chance of the measure coming back to the House in time to become law in this Session. If the Opposition really wanted a full discussion on this important subject—I accept that they do not want the Bill—would it not have been helpful and wise if they had volunteered a timetable for the Bill?

Mr. Shore: No proposals were made by the Government for handling the Bill by agreement. The Government simply reached whatever bench mark of progress they had in mind and came forward with the guillotine motion.

During that period, the Committee has considered the complex questions of town and country planning, development plans, listed buildings, national parks, highways and road traffic functions, waste regulation and waste disposal, land drainage and flood prevention, the administration of justice—including magistrates courts and the coroners service — valuation panels and the probation service.

No one in his senses would argue that those are small or trivial matters. They are of vital concern to people in communities throughout the metropolitan areas and our capital city. The new arrangements for the reallocation of those services, mainly to the London boroughs and the metropolitan district councils, needed the most careful scrutiny.

What is really appalling is the vast areas of the Bill that have not even been reached. Not a word has been spoken yet in Committee on the future of our largest education authority, the Inner London education authority, nor has there been any opportunity to discuss such major matters as the fire service, the police and passenger transport, all of which are to be transferred to non-elected joint authorities. Yet, in the case of the metropolitan counties, those services account for no less than 67 per cent. of their current expenditure. Those joint authorities will at least be comprised of members appointed by the borough or district councils in their areas. However, that will not be the case in part V of the Bill, which transfers such major facilities as the historic house museums in London to the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission. Collections of national importance belonging to the metropolitan county councils will be transferred to new trustee bodies. The South Bank arts complex is to pass to the Arts Council.

Those are all transfers to non-elected bodies, but even that will not do the job. Part VII of the Bill provides for the establishment in each area of the body to be known as the residuary body, consisting of members appointed by the Secretary of State to deal with all those difficult and inconvenient matters for which no other body can be made responsible. To add insult to injury, all those new authorities—the joint authorities, the non-elected bodies and the appointed residuary bodies—will be empowered to issue a precept and will, from day one and at least the following three years, be rate capped by the Secretary of State. Along with the named authorities, they are to be brought within part I of the Rates Act 1984 at the moment of their existence.

Those are very complex arrangements, and it is intolerable that there should no longer be the opportunity seriously to debate, amend and discuss them in what is now left of the Committee stage. Of course, the Leader of the House says that the timetable motion allows for further debate. It does. But since the Bill has to be reported to the House on or before 7 March, that will leave time for no more than seven further Committee sittings. So far the Committee has debated 16 clauses of the Local Government Bill, clauses that are linked with no fewer than eight schedules running to 62 pages of text. That is what the Committee has done already. In the seven remaining Committee sittings that we are now allowed under the guillotine, a further 81 clauses fall to be considered together with another eight schedules comprising 52 additional pages of text. Of one thing we can be certain: much the larger part of this most controversial and ill-thought-out Bill will go to the other place undiscussed and unamended.

While the Government have persistently refused to subject their proposals to any sort of independent scrutiny, the authorities affected have called in consultants of repute. The report published by PA Management Consultants, after an intensive study of the new structures proposed, concludes with these words:

[Mr. Shore]

"the multiplicity of compulsory and voluntary joint working between Metropolitan District Councils is an unsound basis for an effective lasting structure".

The report goes on to say:

"overall we have been unable to find a single service where the quality of service to the local elector is likely to be improved as a result of the change in structure. In many cases we believe there will be a marked decline in quality".

The only justification that the Government have attempted to advance during the discussions of their proposals is that there will be some cost savings. In the explanatory and financial memorandum to the Bill they say:

"The government's current estimate . . . is that, subject to decisions yet to be taken by successor authorities, a saving of the order of £100 million annually will be achievable by removing a tier of government and eliminating duplication of functions.".

No evidence has been presented by the Government to justify that claim. Against it, the councils themselves have commissioned Coopers and Lybrand to give its own independent estimate. In its second report, it concluded as follows:

"the proposed changes cannot be expected to lead to savings in themselves . . . savings therefore can only be sought as a result of policy changes about the levels of services and hence expenditure in an area."

One can get savings only if one cuts the services. That is nothing to do with changing the structure of local government. On the very claim that the Government make of a £100 million saving by abolition of the GLC and the six metropolitan counties, Coopers and Lybrand concludes not only that the Government's claims cannot be supported but that likely additional annual costs at least in the six areas of the metropolitan counties will be up to £69 million per year.

The plain truth is that the Bill is part, perhaps the crowning achievement, of the Government's campaign against local democracy, the hard-hit inner cities and conurbation areas of the country, and areas where their political opponents, the Labour party, are in local control.

Mr. Nellist: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Shore: I shall not give way to my hon. Friend as I must conclude.

Not content with fining and penalising local councils that maintain their services, not content even with taking powers to limit their ability to raise and set their own rates, the Government have now reached the ultimate stage of abolishing the offenders altogether. That reflects all too clearly the authoritarian temperament of the Government, particularly of the Prime Minister. The new arrangements are not only an affront to democracy, but are illogical, cumbersome and unworkable. The guillotine at this stage of the Bill that gives legislative authority to the proposals adds insult to injury, and we shall oppose it in the Lobby tonight.

Mr. Martin Stevens (Fulham): Those of us who have the pleasure and delight of serving on the Standing Committee on the Bill that we are discussing will have heard the remarks by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House with the greatest possible pleasure, first, because of the felicity and charm that graced their utterance, but no less because his speech spelt out for us not the end of debate on the Bill, but the beginning. As we know, the Select Committee on Procedure is now examining this matter. Many of us feel that there would be benefit in Standing Committees always working to time from day one. First and, in my submission, not least, that would give the Government's supporters on the Committee a fair chance to participate in the debate. Second, and perhaps more important, it would tie down the Committee to debating the realities that are at stake and to forgetting, or at least passing over with relative speed, the emotional frivolities that we have been forced to hear throughout the past eight weeks.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): If we thought that the guillotine would assist Conservative Members to take part in the debate, my hon. Friends and I on the Committee would welcome that because so far we have heard almost nothing in justification of the measures on which Conservative Members regularly vote. The hon. Gentleman said that timetabling the Committee would allow adequate participation in debates. Does he include Ministers in that? Once the guillotine is passed, does he expect real answers from Ministers, rather than the casual reading of briefs which we have had so far?

Mr. Stevens: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not expect me to answer for my ministerial colleagues. It is up to them what they say and do. I have no doubt that they will continue to give a good account of themselves.

When I said that there had been a certain amount of emotional frivolity, I go along with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, in that on this occasion I do not accuse the Opposition of filibustering. They have, however, concentrated their whole line of argument on a series of propositions which are false. For example, they have told us ad nauseam that no Government since Boadicea have ever denied people the democratic right to vote for an outgoing local authority. Yet that is exactly what the Labour party did in London in 1964 and in the rest of the country in 1975 when forms of local administration were being phased out.

I do not say that this action was our first choice, but the House knows the reasons for it and there is ample precedent for it in the history of Labour Governments. If the Opposition keep repeating what everyone knows to be rubbish, I think that I am entitled to describe that as emotional frivolity.

Mr. Tony Banks: As the hon. Gentleman well knows, far from repeating emotional rubbish, the Opposition have cited reams of evidence submitted to all members of the Committee from learned bodies, royal institutions and impartial sources to the effect that the Government have got it completely wrong. Meanwhile, the Government have been unable to produce even one substantial piece of evidence to support their proposals. Finally, why have 10 Conservative Members sat in the Committee and said absolutely nothing throughout the proceedings?

Mr. Stevens: It is always a pleasure to hear interventions from the hon. Gentleman. The reams of evidence from more or less interested outside bodies to which he refers do not relate to the point that I was making, from which he was careful to divert attention. As for the allegation that 10 Government supporters have not yet spoken, the timetable motion will give them the opportunity to break forth into compelling words. I look forward not just to hearing them but to joining them in weeks to come.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I am not here to defend either Tory or Labour Governments, but the hon. Gentleman is wrong about a Labour Government having set a precedent, as both the GLC and the metropolitan counties were set up by Tory legislation. Moreover, neither occasion was a precedent for what the Government are now doing, because on both occasions the life of an elected authority was continued pending the replacement of higher-tier authorities. In this case, however, the life of an authority is continued for one year by the abolition of elections, but no interim authority is to come into existence. In this case the authority is to be dissolved. There is no precedent for that from any Government.

Mr. Stevens: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting technicality and in so doing draws attention to another Opposition argument — the wilful assertion that less government means less democracy. I should have thought that the fewer tiers of government the people of this country have to find their way through, the greater the presumption should be that there will be more rather than less democracy.

Mr. Tony Banks: Why not scrap the whole lot then?

Mr. Stevens: Surely no one would argue that the abolition of the area health authorities has undermined the conduct of the National Health Service.

Mr. Tony Banks: They should never have been set up in the first place.

Mr. Stevens: My party set up the GLC and no one could be sadder than I at what has happened to it. I played a small part in that, as Chris Chataway and I put to the Royal Commission the evidence that came closest to its final proposition. That being so, I should have liked the GLC to operate successfully as a strategic authority. From the first GLC election in 1965, however, the GLC triggered off its reserve powers on a daily basis, and instead of being the strategic authority that it was set up to be it became a very slow and expensive duplicating authority, duplicating the functions of the boroughs which both parties had agreed should be, and now will be, the primary instruments of local government.

Dr. Hampson: I understand that the Liberal party favours abolishing the metropolitan counties and not replacing them. It apparently wants an even more distant tier in the shape of some colossal regional government system.

Mr. Stevens: That is a helpful intervention and I see some nods from across the way.

Mr. Simon Hughes: At least we are consistent.

Mr. Stevens: It is interesting that the right hon. Gentleman who leads the Opposition in Committee—I am sorry, the hon. Gentleman who leads the Opposition in Committee——

Mr. Tony Banks: It is only a matter of time.

Mr. Stevens: I am sure that that is so. The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) has made it clear that an incoming Labour Government would not replace the six metropolitan counties, but he has not yet said whether an incoming Labour Government would reinstate the GLC. At Labour party local government conferences up to and including 1981 the speeches made by Labour Members now passionately committed to the opposite view show that there is a twist of hypocrisy in the outrage and condemnation to which they now subject us.

One very unpleasant feature of the Standing Committee on the Bill is the presence round the clock in the Public Gallery of a group of agents, presumably paid for by the ratepayers—some have assessed the number as being as high as 26, although it is difficult to identify them accurately——

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman can do better than that. As he well knows, GLC officers have been present, but at no time have there been more than four paid officers present. They are there to advise not just the Opposition but Conservative Members. I have made it clear to the Committee that if Government supporters need information—from the paucity of their arguments it is clear that they do—they are welcome to consult those officers. The hon. Gentleman should not continue to mislead the House. He should take it from me as a GLC councillor that there have never been more than four paid officers present.

Mr. Stevens: May we also take it from the hon. Gentleman, as a member of the GLC, that at least some of the people who, day and night, accompany the Committee in the Public Gallery are not concealing their identity by means of false names or code names? Can he repeat——

Mr. Allan Roberts: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stevens: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) after giving way to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks).

Mr. Banks: It does not take much persuasion to make me rise to answer the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Stevens) or any other Government Member. Yes, there have never been more than four paid officials there. From time to time there have been a number of elected members who have a close interest in the matter and a more detailed knowledge of what the Government are trying to do.

Mr. Stevens: That was not the answer that I had hoped for. I had thought that my question was precise, but clearly it has been avoided.

Mr. Allan Roberts: There have been visits from officers and elected members of Merseyside county council. Not many officers have been present, but one or two elected members have come here under their own steam, paying their own expenses. The chief officer responsible for the waste disposal services took unpaid leave in order to attend the Committee.

Mr. Stevens: The idea of ladies and gentlemen from Merseyside county council undertaking such work gratis in their own time is an inspiring vision. The House is grateful to the hon. Gentleman for telling us about it.

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) was careful to say that at any one time no more than four GLC officers were present in the Committee. He did not say that only four had ever been present. Is it not possible that, through the long hours, relays of four different people at different times have been involved in the argument?

Mr. Stevens: That is what is called playing the numbers game. I do no more than thank my hon. Friend for his kind intervention.

Mr. Cowans: I am following the hon. Gentleman's arguments closely, which is more than I have had a chance to do in Committee. He should remember, first, that there is a bevy of talent in the Committee sitting by the Chairman, all of it presumably paid for by the taxpayer. Secondly, if the hon. Gentleman's argument is so substantial and his case so good, why should he worry even if there are 30,000 people in the Public Gallery?

Mr. Stevens: I would not go so far as to say that I am worried. My modest comment—I have referred to only what is on the Committee's record—has attracted so many excited interventions from the Opposition Benches that it has consumed more time than I had in mind.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): It was offensive.

Mr. Stevens: I do not know that it was offensive. It is a fact.

Mr. Soley: I can tell the hon. Gentleman why his comments were offensive. He has launched an attack upon people who have a proper interest in servicing that Committee in the same way as it is done by the civil servants, whom the hon. Gentleman has not attacked. He knows that they cannot answer back. He even says that they appear under false names. That is offensive to many people who work hard and properly.

Mr. Stevens: The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) has uttered a clear denial of my point. Hon. Members will no doubt take account of his intervention when judging the veracity of what I said.

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) referred to a remark that he said had come from the lips of my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), whose seat in the Chamber I have momentarily usurped. My right hon. Friend is alleged to have said that the question of abolition was introduced into the Conservative party manifesto without any considerable discussion with Greater London Conservative Members.

Since 1979 I have continuously been the secretary of the Greater London group of Conservative Members—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]. The position is indeed not without honour. My right hon. Friend is a member of that group but has never attended a meeting.

Mr. Tony Banks: The right hon. Gentleman is no fool.

Mr. Stevens: Tempting nets are laid before our feet in these debates. I shall resist the temptation to dance on that trampoline.

Mr. Banks: What an awesome thought.

Mr. Stevens: In the two years leading up to the 1983 general election it sometimes seemed that there was not a weekly meeting of the Greater London Conservative Members at which the issue of the GLC and its abolition was not discussed ad nauseam. By the time of the election there was no doubt at all—pace my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) — that the overwhelming majority of Conservative Greater London Members—who then as now exceeded in number the Labour Members for Greater London—were in favour of abolition. On a number of occasions we sought interviews with the leader of the party, including my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, to make them aware of our views.

That may well be the only topic on which I speak with greater authority than my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup. Since I can outspeak him on that one point, this may be a suitable moment for me to resume my seat.

Mr. Banks: The right hon. Gentleman's seat.

Mr. Stevens: My right hon. Friend's seat. Before I do so, I must assure my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House of my full support.

7.57 pm

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Stevens) on a speech today that was longer than the total sum of his utterances in Committee. I shall not take up all the points made by the hon. Gentleman. I was fascinated by his fantasies of sinister GLC officers, giving false names and no doubt sporting false beards, controlling the affairs of the Committee.

I was impressed by the use of creative accounting—as it is now called—by the Leader of the House in order to prove that the Government's record on guillotining is no worse than that of their Labour predecessors. However, though entertaining, the argument was not persuasive.

I still believe that there is a powerful case for timetabling Bills from the start. However, whether Bills are timetabled by agreement or whether, as in this case, a guillotine is imposed, there should be adequate time for proper debate. The Leader of the House was not persuasive on that point in relation to this Bill. It is a complex piece of legislation. Those who believed that removing one tier of metropolitan government would be an easy operation have learnt the hard way that it is far from easy. This is not just a Local Government Bill. For the seven largest conurbations in the country, it is also an education, transport, police and fire authorities Bill.

As the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) correctly reminded us, many important issues remain to be examined in Committee, and, on the basis of the timetable now before us, they will have to be rushed. Part III sets up a completely new body to oversee London's education. That will be a free-standing, one service authority. Modern local government has no experience of that sort of organisation—not since the days of the London School Board. This issue needs proper scrutiny, as does the method of electing the ILEA.

Part IV introduces the joint boards. That has aroused considerable controversy and detailed criticism.

Part V restructures the funding of voluntary organisations. Here again, there has been considerable criticism. Among the critics is the London Churches Group, which wrote to the Prime Minister on 9 November detailing its criticism of that part of the Government's proposals. That letter was signed by some distinguished churchmen, no less than the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Southwark, the Methodist Chairman of London, south-eastern district, the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster and the Archbishop of Southwark. I should have thought that even this Government would have taken seriously a letter signed by so many distinguished churchmen. However, I do not believe that we shall have adequate time to debate that important part of the Bill.

Part VI contains all the complex arrangements for staff. The future allocation of staff as a result of the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties will be anything but straightforward. Staff will have to be slotted in to successor authorities, be they joint boards or borough or district councils. That will be a complex operation. The staff involved are entitled to see that this part of the Bill is examined in detail and is treated with the seriousness that it deserves.

Part VII sets up the residuary authority. Here again, there is more than one view. Some Conservative Members are clearly anxious to use the residuary body to take over many of the GLC's existing powers. They are surely entitled to have adequate time to develop their arguments, but that will not be available on the basis of the timetabling that is now proposed.

Mr. Dykes: As time goes on, is it not becoming clearer that the only way to get out of the dilemma that the Government have created for themselves is to allow this residuary body to take over those functions and to become an elected successor authority?

Mr. Cartwright: I do not believe that that is the ideal solution, but it is one solution. It is certainly more attractive than the one that the Government are putting forward. I am simply arguing that, given some measure of support for that idea among Conservative Members, that alone should have persuaded the Government to give ample time to enable it to be properly examined and discussed. I do not believe that that time will be available on the basis of the timetable before us.

Part VIII deals with the principles of rate levying and precepting, the complexities of reorganising grant-related expenditure assessments, and all the other myriad complexities of local government financing which will result from abolition. Therefore, major elements in the Bill will not be properly examined on the basis of the timetabling that has been proposed.

The Leader of the House was happy to remind us of the precedent established by the London Government Bill in 1963. That was timetabled almost from the very start. Clause 1 and schedule 1 were taken on the Floor of the House, but a timetable applied to the remainder. It was a similar timetable to the one now before us. About seven weeks were allowed for Committee stage and only two days for Report. Two arguments put forward by the Government in support of that timetable do not apply today. The late Iain Macleod argued that the Bill implemented the unanimous recommendation of a Royal Commission and that as a result the Government were entitled to timetable it. That does not apply to this Bill, which is the result of a manifesto commitment but no serious independent examination.

Secondly, in arguing the case for a timetable based on the London Government Bill, the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) said:

> "We have the support of the bulk of our hon. Friends on every part of the Bill. We have the support of all our hon. Friends, except, I think, for one, on the principles of the Bill as a whole". —[Official Report, 29 January 1963; Vol. 670, c. 893-94.]

It is clear that that argument cannot be used in relation to this legislation, in respect of which there are considerable doubts among many Conservative Members.

When we look at the 1972 legislation which reorganised local government outside Greater London and set up the metropolitan counties, we find a more generous allocation of time. Second Reading took place on 16 and 17 November 1971. There was a lengthy Committee stage; the Bill did not come back on Report until 13 April 1972; and it did not complete Report and Third Reading until 21 July 1972. Debate on the Floor of the House totalled 67 hours, covering seven days, including two all-night sittings. That is a much more generous allocation of time than the two days which have been allotted for this Local Government Bill.

I also endorse the view put forward by the Opposition, and I think accepted by Conservative Members, that the conduct of the Committee thus far produces no evidence of undue delay on the part of the Opposition. Those of us who have had experience of other local government measures have enjoyed the contributions of the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans). So far we have been disappointed in Committee because the hon. Member has substantially restricted his contributions. That is a great loss to the Committee and to us all. Indeed, as other hon. Members have pointed out, the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge has been eclipsed by some of the speeches from the Government Front Bench. I do not criticise the fact that Ministers have made lengthy contributions. This legislation is complex, and Ministers are right to seek to explain it in detail. They are right to react to our criticisms, because the Bill requires that sort of examination.

So far there have been no concessions from the Government. No amendments have been accepted and no concessions have been even faintly suggested. This timetable is unappealing because, as well as getting no concessions, even the Opposition's argument will be cut short, despite the fact that, day after day and night after night, we have been able to refer to an overwhelming body of expert opinion which demonstrates that the Government's case is not supported by those who work in and are most intimately associated with the services concerned. We have not had from the Government any serious, persuasive evidence of expert opinion in support of what they are proposing.

This Bill will have a tremendous impact on many institutions and organisations in the metropolitan areas. It will also have a tremendous impact on millions of people in our seven greatest conurbations. Its effects will be felt for many years to come. It needs the most rigorous and careful scrutiny. It should not be railroaded through the House by sheer force of numbers. Therefore, my hon. Friends and I will vote against the timetable motion tonight.

8.8 pm

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): I am one of the most junior Members of the House of Commons, although I am as proud to be an hon. Member as anybody else. I have always believed in the traditions of the House and its historial precedents. The speeches that opened this debate followed the traditions of the House and there are many precedents for them. I suspect that those speeches could relate to all of the other measures that have had a timetable motion, whether it be by Labour or Conservative Governments.

It may be presumptuous of a fairly new Member to suggest, with great respect and in all sincerity, that there must be a better way to conduct our business. I do not pretend to know what is going on in the Business Sub-Committee or in the higher echelons of Government, but a way should be found for the House to conduct its business without us going through a ritual for controversial measures, and most of them are controversial. We have a fairly heated debate on Second Reading, and the Bill is referred to a Standing Committee. The first 100 to 130 hours of the Committee are taken up by speeches from the Opposition Members in support of amendments, while the Government Benches rightly resist those amendments until the Government, duty bound to get legislation through, because that is what the Government are about, decide that a timetable motion must be sought. We come to the appointed day and there are ritual speeches in the House, and the Government, again rightly—I shall be supporting the motion—get the timetable motion. That is put into force and the Bill goes through Committee to the Report stage, Third Reading and then to the other place. That process could be applied to almost every controversial measure that has had to be guillotined. There must be a better way.

Mr. Dykes: My hon. Friend is saying things that will strike a chord in the hearts and minds of many hon. Members. Does he agree that there is another central problem of our parliamentary system? It is an increasing problem that causes increasing dismay and despair in the public. Governments can legislate too easily on the basis of a minority popular vote and get that legislation too easily through the House. There is not sufficient examination, and that problem will not be solved even by the latest proposals of the Procedure Committee.

Mr. Powley: I do not accept that this is a minority measure. I think that it has a great deal of widespread support, but I suspect that my hon. Friend and I are agreed that there must be a better way.

We have rightly found—again this is a bit of a ritual—that there is traditional obstruction to the Bill. That is what Oppositions are for. We recognise that, and if roles were reversed we would be doing the same. However, I suspect that never before have the Opposition taken their case to the lengths we have seen in respect of this measure. As my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Stevens) said, we have witnessed the spectacle of GLC officials giving Opposition Members their briefs. I have not seen that before, although it may have happened.

Mr. Cartwright: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the first Standing Committee on which I sat, on the Petroleum Revenue Tax Bill, was dominated by Government spokesmen reading Treasury briefs and Opposition spokesmen reading oil company briefs? There is nothing wrong with briefs.

Mr. Powley: I shall not dispute that, nor that it has happened before, but whether it has happened to this extent, I cannot say.

Briefs have been prepared for the Opposition, and Opposition Members have used them with their traditional eloquence. Although I served on the Rates Bill Standing Committee, I have never experienced as much lobbying through my postbag as I have on this subject. There has been tremendous correspondence by those opposed to the measure. I suspect that those opposing the Bill have given a number of misleading facts and figures about the Bill. My correspondence shows that the public have the wrong end of the stick on a number of issues. Only this weekend, I received a hand-written letter from someone within the GLC area about the ILEA proposals. The correspondent was under the impression that education was being taken over solely by an appointed body of officials. We all know that that is not the case. I wonder where such misleading information arose.

I was interested to note that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) volunteered that any of his officials would be pleased to give Conservative Members any information that they desired. In one of the metropolitan countries, I was talking to an official of one of the councils. He told me—this is not secondhand information—that he had been prohibited from speaking to hon. Members about the abolition of the metropolitan councils.

Mr. Cowans: Which council?

Mr. Powley: I shall not give the name of the gentleman, nor the authority for which he worked, but he assured me that he had been prohibited from speaking to Members of Parliament. I found that sad, and I suspect that that action would not receive the support of Opposition Members.

It has been said that this policy was a last-minute addition to the Conservative party's manifesto. I do not know when it was written into the Conservative party manifesto because I was not privileged to have such information, but those of us who have been involved in local government for a considerable time—there are Opposition Members with a longer service than mine of 12 or 14 years—have been unhappy. I was unhappy with the GLC and metropolitan county councils arrangement when it was set up, and I became increasingly unhappy with it as the years went by. Finally, in the three or four years before the 1983 general election it became patently obvious that there were a number of abuses in local government, and that the GLC and metropolitan county councils should be abolished. Many of us were suggesting that well before the Conservative party manifesto was written in 1983, or whenever it was written. The Conservative party has had this policy for a long time.

I also support the motion because, the longer this issue drags on, undoubtedly the more waste there will be and the more irresponsible actions will be committed by the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. I can give an example of the irresponsible behaviour. It is clear that this is the Government's policy, and one would have thought that under such a premise there would not have been any recruitment of staff. I do not read The Guardian, but somebody showed it to me because he was appalled at what was happening. In the public appointments section of the issue of 30 January 1985——

Mr. Tony Banks: Tell us what is in The Sun.

Mr. Powley: I do not read The Sun either. I am only kidding the House that I can actually read. I was shown the public appointments section of The Guardian in which the GLC, in January 1985, knowing that it was the Government's policy to abolish it, was advertising for an officer for "The Women's Committee—A Voice for Women in London", for a "Grants Monitoring Adviser", for "Equalities Officers", and for a part-time research assistant in the "Police Committee Support Unit". If anyone is interested, that latter post carries a salary of £12,000 to £14,700 a year.

The GLC was also advertising for an officer for the "Ethnic Minorities Unit", for a "Race Relations Adviser", for an "Outreach and Liaison Worker for Youth", and for a "Joint Deputy Head of Grants Division". Those posts were advertised by the GLC at salaries of £13,000 and more a year, when we all know that in one way or another the GLC will be abolished—and good riddance to it.

The House of Lords may make some amendments to the Bill—I hope that there will be none—but we all know that at the end of the day the GLC will be abolished, as will the metropolitan counties. In those circumstances, no responsible organisation should be appointing officers at large salaries. The longer we leave it, the more abuses there will be. More staff will be appointed and more redundancy payments will be needed.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I am finding it difficult to follow the hon. Gentleman's argument. The logic of his argument is that there is no point in having debates in this House on any measures whatever because the Government will use their large majority to secure whatever they want. The logic of the hon. Gentleman's argument is that we should abolish not only the GLC and the metropolitan counties but this place, too.

Mr. Powley: That is not the logic of my argument. My argument is that there is no need at the present time for the authorities to make additional staff appointments. They already have more than sufficient staff to do their work. The local authorities are deliberately attempting to appoint as many staff as they possibly can in the time left at their disposal. That is irresponsible behaviour.

I suggest that the House should approve the motion, because the country cannot afford the GLC or the six metropolitan counties.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): I should like to comment on some of the general arguments just made by the hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley).

The hon. Gentleman put the worrying argument for all of us who believe in democracy and local government—it was brought up on many occasions by Conservative Members in the Standing Committee and it is the essence of Conservative party propaganda — that because Conservatives disagree with certain aspects of GLC and metropolitan counties' policy, and as those policies cannot be overturned through the ballot box, it is necessary to use the Conservative party's parliamentary majority to abolish a tier of local government. That is an argument which the hon. Gentleman has used——

Mr. Powley rose——

Mr. Fatchett: The hon. Gentleman has used that argument in regard to policy but not in regard to the structure of local government.

It is very worrying that throughout the debates so far Conservative Members have been very keen to talk about policy—there are genuine disagreements about policy, and that is the essence of democracy—but they have not been prepared to talk about the structure of local government. The hon. Gentleman fell into that trap in his speech.

Mr. Powley: If I remember my words correctly, I said that I was unhappy with the GLC and the six metropolitan counties when they were first set up, and that I became increasingly concerned about their activities as the years went by. I am not arguing that the GLC and the six metropolitan counties should be abolished because of their present policies. I said that I had misgivings about them when they were originally set up. If the hon. Gentleman reads the Official Report tomorrow, he will see that that is what I said.

Mr. Fatchett: The evidence which the hon. Gentleman produced to support his assumption was in relation not to structure but to policy. I believe that the Official Report will show that I am correct in that respect.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that there must be a better way to process the legislation. That better way is not through the passing of a timetable motion or the use of the Government's large majority, but through a proper preparation for the legislation.

We strongly object to the timetable motion because the Government have not prepared the ground for a major change in local government structure. The Government are afraid of having any sort of independent inquiry such as a Royal Commission or a Select Committee. There should have been a report from a Royal Commission or a Select Committee so that we could study the arguments and conclusions. Instead of proceeding in that way, the Government rushed into legislation without getting the professional advice of local government officers or of professional bodies. They have proceeded without the support of the electorate in the areas covered by the GLC and the metropolitan counties. I suspect that if this legislation were put to a referendum in the GLC area it would be heavily defeated, and that the same would happen in the metropolitan counties. All the available evidence supports that contention.

I repeat that there should have been proper preparation before legislation was introduced. There should have been an independent inquiry, together with some test of opinion in the metropolitan counties and the GLC. The only conclusion that one can possibly draw is that the Government avoided those avenues of approach because they were afraid of independent opinion and afraid of the ballot box.

Mr. Powley rose——

Mr. Fatchett: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman, who made a lengthy speech.

If the Government were not afraid, we would not be discussing a timetable motion tonight. Only a small part of the Bill has been debated in Standing Committee. The Bill has in no way been subject to public scrutiny or to any sort of democratic accountability. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that there should have been a better way. It should have been through proper preparation rather than by introducing a timetable motion at this early stage.

The proceedings of the Committee have been very important in exposing the threadbare nature of the Government's argument. The threadbare nature of their argument has been shown in three areas.

Mr. Boyes: Does my hon. Friend find it surprising that the Secretary of State for the Environment has taken no part whatever in the work of the Committee? Does he find it surprising that he has played no part in the debate this evening, not even staying to listen to the arguments? Does my hon. Friend think that it is because the right hon. Gentleman does not understand what the Bill is about that he does not support it, or is it that he has no satisfactory argument against the points that we have raised repeatedly in Committee?

Mr. Fatchett: I am not surprised that the Secretary of State has taken no part in this debate or in the proceedings in Committee. If I were responsible for the legislation, I would also do my best to avoid any debate on it. My hon. Friend shows yet again that he has great faith in human nature. His hope that the Secretary of State would want to be present and put his argument is sincere but, I suspect, sadly misplaced in this context.

The Committee has exposed the Government on three major points. I shall run through them briefly, because yet again they argue for more time, debate and investigation of the clauses in Committee.

The Government told us that they estimate that £50 million will be saved by abolishing the six metropolitan counties. A similar figure has been given for the GLC. When we have asked written parliamentary questions and raised this issue in Committee, the Minister has been unable to provide us with any detailed breakdown of that figure. If the Government have a figure, they have a responsibility to the House and to the ratepayers in the areas involved to tell us how they arrived at it. The Government cannot say that they have a figure of £50 million for the metropolitan counties and yet be unable to tell us the figure for West Yorkshire and the other five metropolitan counties. The only possible conclusion is that the Government do not have figures, and that they have pulled that figure of £50 million out of a hat in much the same way as they pulled the legislation out of a hat in the first place.

The same argument can be made about jobs. The Government say that there will be job losses. In Committee we have asked in which areas those jobs will be lost and what services will be involved, yet the Government have again given us no answers. We can only conclude once again that the Government do not have any hard evidence to support the assertions in the financial memorandum to the Bill. Therefore, on the grounds of cost and jobs alone, the Government's case is threadbare and falls apart.

Another worry was expressed in Committee which I think also concerned Conservative Members. On occasion, Conservative Members have made very telling and useful interventions, asking whether the Minister can guarantee that certain services will be maintained in West Yorkshire, the other metropolitan counties or perhaps even in the Greater London area. Of course, they do not obtain any such guarantees from the Minister, because he cannot give them. I suspect that the reason is that he is not prepared to say, at this stage, that rate support grant will be available for the services when they are devolved to joint boards or committees, to the London boroughs and to the metropolitan districts. The Government cannot show that we shall not lose in terms of quality of service as a result of the Bill. Indeed, the fact that the Minister cannot give his hon. Friends any assurances leads only to the conclusion that he exects to make savings, not from abolishing a tier of local government or from a structural change, but from reducing services and the quality of services available to ratepayers in those areas.

Dr. Hampson: Surely the hon. Gentleman is not saying that the cities and towns of West Yorkshire are incapable of operating without the West Yorkshire metropolitan county. Since he places such faith in grand commissions and inquiries, I should tell him that Redcliffe-Maud, which sat for six years, specifically said that West Yorkshire would be best served by five separate authorities and not by a metropolitan county. The hon. Gentleman knows full well that there is no logic in a small town such as Wakefield running its own education when cities such as Bristol, Leicester and Nottingham cannot do so.

Mr. Fatchett: If the hon. Gentleman had read the report of our debates in Committee he would have been interested in the comments of the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler). Bradford metropolitan district council is considering taking legal action on the rate support grant settlement which the Government have given it and against that background the hon. Gentleman asked for certain assurances. The Government could not give those assurances because they are not in a position to say that the necessary RSG will in future by devolved to the districts. Again, the only conclusion is that the Government can reach that figure for savings only by reducing the number and quality of services available to ratepayers and the public in the metropolitan areas.

We need more debate on the Bill in Committee, because it poses constitutional issues and is directly relevant to every one of the 13 million people living in the metropolitan counties. If we are not allowed to scrutinise and question the Bill in greater detail, the House will probably vote for a reduction in services and in the number of jobs in those areas without even being given the necessary information by the Government.

This is a threadbare Bill, and it is an insult to the House to push through such a Bill on a timetable motion, because we have not been provided with the necessary information, and the Committee has not been provided with it either. The Bill is also an insult to all those elected members in the metropolitan areas and the GLC and to all those who work for those councils. If the Government had a case to make they would have made it in Committee and in the House, and they would have published the available evidence. They have not done so and have gone to the last resort of any Government defeated in argument and used their majority to stifle debate and to push through a Bill which has nothing to do with local government but much to do with the Prime Minister's vanity and, as someone has said, with the 10 years in which the Conservative party has been hijacked from the Right. That is what the Bill is about, and it has nothing to do with local government.

8.35 pm

Mr. Timothy Wood (Stevenage): During many hours in Committee we often heard the argument that the Bill does not have sufficient support, has not received careful examination, and so on. That argument is nonsense. The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) commented on the absence of an inquiry. During the past 20 years there have been a multitude of inquiries into local government. Consequently, we have had an opportunity to see the results of some of the experiments that have followed them. The results of those experiments demonstrate all too clearly that the metropolitan counties and the GLC lead to duplication and extravagance that can and should be avoided. In the light of that experience, the Bill was rightly introduced.

Mr. Nellist: If the hon. Gentleman thinks that the Bill is so worthy as to justify his presence here tonight, why did he not make such speeches in Committee? Why is it that 10 out of 19 Tory Back Benchers in Committee have not said a single word about the implications for jobs or for ratepayers' services and so on? Why has the hon. Gentleman been so silent for the past four or five weeks?

Mr. Wood: I have listened to the wealth of argument put forward by Conservative Members and to the paucity of argument by the Opposition. Frankly, I found that the Opposition's repetition did not go anywhere towards presenting a case. As my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) has said, there is a need to examine the detail of the Bill, but the Committee has been going through an absurd ritual——

Mr. Tony Banks: It is called democracy.

Mr. Wood: If only democracy were being served by the Opposition's actions and if only we were examining the minutiae of the Bill and considering the arguments in order to see how best to make the Bill effective. That is not what we have been doing. On every clause the Opposition have been reiterating a series of particular contentions.

Mr. Dykes: Surely my right hon. Friend must be aware that several Conservative Members have repeatedly tabled very thoughtful amendments which are designed not only to improve the Bill but to provide for a successor structure. Those amendments will be tabled again at later stages in Committee and perhaps in the other place. The Bill is intrinsically far too controversial for people to accept because there has not been examination by any expert outside body beforehand. That was offered by the then Conservative leader of the GLC in 1976, but it was rejected at that stage by the party, which said that no such inquiry was necessary because the GLC was the jewel in the crown and it had been created in 1963 by the then Conservative Government.

Mr. Wood: Some of the more lucid arguments and constructive suggestions in Committee were put forward by my hon. Friends. I regret that the arguments have tended to be somewhat repetitious. They have concentrated on the belief that the residuary body should be elected, and points following from that, but our argument has been expressed with more lucidity than the Opposition's.

One of the Opposition's arguments is that big is beautiful. They say that the metropolitan counties and the GLC are better than boroughs and districts. An argument that has been repeated time and again is that districts and boroughs cannot and will not co-operate and that on the borders between the local authorities chaos will reign. It is said, for example, that roads and cycle tracks will not meet. Already throughout the country there are a multitude of boundaries between local authorities. Of course, some accommodation has to be and is made between the different authorities every day of the week.

Mr. Fatchett: With the exception of the metropolitan areas, under the Bill there will be two-tier local government in the shire counties and shire districts.

Mr. Wood: The hon. Gentleman is right. The shire counties have much smaller districts than the metropolitan and GLC areas. The districts in the shire counties do not cover education and various other aspects of local government which can adequately be covered by the metropolitan districts and London boroughs.

Dr. Hampson: The Redcliffe-Maud report specifically prefers a variation, only it says that the shire counties should be single-tier and the metropolitan counties two-tier.

Mr. Wood: That is right. There is no reason why different areas of the country should not be administered in modified ways.

A further argument that has been expressed repeatedly is that money available to the metropolitan counties and to the GLC will not be available to the lower tiers. We want less money to be spent, but for it to be spent more effectively when it is. I am sure that the lower tier authorities will be as able as the met counties and the GLC to provide necessary services.

I have been involved with a lower tier authority and I found it objectionable that only metropolitan authorities and the GLC are regarded as having the expertise to carry out a variety of tasks. The truth is that lower tier authorities can combine to gain the expertise when that is necessary.

The Opposition have used the same arguments again and again in discussions on one clause after another. If we do not constrain the debate, they will use the same arguments ad nauseam in future hours in Committee. We should resist that. We should also resist the hope expressed by the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) that we should sit for hour after hour in the Committee for the next few weeks. There is no need to sit in Committee night after night, week after week, to examine the Bill. The Bill can be examined well in the time proposed in the motion. We might then avoid some unnecessary repetition and get on with the task of preparing for more effective local government, administered by the districts and boroughs, instead of accepting the duplication and waste caused by the metropolitan counties and the GLC.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I am pleased that the hon. Member for Stevenage (Mr. Wood) paid me the compliment of saying that I wanted to delve into detail on the Bill. I should be prepared to sit day and night, week after week to put the case for Tyne and Wear, the other met counties and the GLC. Our case is overwhelming.

An important emphasis has been made tonight which I have suspected for some time. I regret that the hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) is not here, because he provided the key to the Government's attitude towards local democracy, and, I believe, to democracy itself. He said that there was no point in appointing people to positions in the metropolitan counties or the GLC because, since the Government have a majority, the decision has already been made, despite the fact that the Committee is still sitting, and that the Bill has to return to the House and be considered in another place. The Government's assumption is that the Bill will be passed, and that it will be implemented. The democratic process will become meaningless because of the diktat of No. 10.

[Mr. Roland Boyes]

I am pleased that the hon. Member put on record what many of us have accused Government Members of in the past few months.

Mr. Wood: By giving the Bill a Second Reading the House accepted the principle of abolishing the GLC and the metropolitan counties. The Committee is considering the details of that Bill, not the principle. It is irresponsible to appoint further people to those bodies when their time, according to the principle agreed by the House, is limited.

Mr. Boyes: We dug a hole and the hon. Member for Stevenage (Mr. Wood) has fallen into it. The principle of my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) is that if one is in a hole one should stop digging. Earlier today we dug a hole and several Government Members were chucked into it. The hon. Member for Stevenage is now burying himself in that hole.

My constituency is in the Tyne and Wear area. My constituents believe that the principle behind the Bill is a wicked act of political vindictiveness. Discussions in Committee have done nothing to allay my fears. It will be clear to the people whom I represent that Government Members do not want to hear the arguments. They do not want to know about the problems in the Tyne and Wear area. I warn the Minister that he will hear in Committee about the unemployment problems in the area.

The Government are acting in an underhand manner. They cancelled elections to a body which has not yet been abolished. That is without precedent. The Secretary of State has tried to disclaim our accusation that it is without precedent, but he has not been able to produce an example in local government of elections to a body being cancelled before Parliament has agreed to the abolition of that body. I believe that democracy is about people and people expressing their wishes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) referred to inquiries and opinion polls. An opinion poll about the abolition proposals conducted in the Prime Minister's constituency showed that the overwhelming majority were not in favour. It would be better to judge people's opinions through the ballot box, which is what the Opposition would have done.

Mr. Fatchett: Why did the Prime Minister not do that?

Mr. Boyes: The right hon. Lady does not believe in the ballot box. Indeed, there was an opportunity to hold an election this year, when the question of abolition would have been a major issue and the people could have made their decision. Surely such an election would have been a godsend to the Government—they would have had their answer through the ballot box.

I have always believed that those whom the people elect are accountable for their actions. If the electorate is not happy with what they do, it can replace them. If the people of Tyne and Wear had not been happy with the services being provided, undoubtedly they would have expressed that through the ballot box. But they did not have an opportunity to do so because the Government are not interested in the democratic process.

Not only have the Government cancelled the elections, they are now trying to cancel the discussions. We have dealt with only 17 clauses, but we are to be allowed only 40 minutes for each of the remaining clauses. That is not sufficient to deal with six metropolitan counties and the GLC and hear the arguments of the Opposition and the Government on issues of vital importance to those whom each and every one of us represent in this House. If that is not a negation of democracy. I do not know what is.

I am worried that we appear to be moving down the road towards dictatorship from No. 10—No. 10 decides and the Conservative troops, like little lackeys, do as they are told. When democracy is being threatened and destroyed, there is danger that this House will go down the same road.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My hon. Friend has correctly referred to the sad retreat from democracy, where the Government are not prepared even to debate the issues. He said that there would be only 40 minutes discussion on each of the remaining clauses, which means 5 minutes discussion for each of the great county areas such as the Tyne and Wear and my area of Greater Manchester.

When the Under-Secretary spoke for an hour in Committee last Thursday, he mentioned Greater Manchester not once. That was despite repeated questions. If, during such lengthy and important debates, Ministers are not prepared to answer substantive questions, what chance is there to obtain answers when the debate is cut to 40 minutes?

Mr. Boyes: I agree with my hon. Friend, who made an important intervention. From a different viewpoint he has illustrated the way in which our questions have been treated in Committee——

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Contemptuously.

Mr. Boyes: I agree with my hon. Friend—indeed the word "contemptuous" would apply equally to this evening's debate. The Leader of the House made a flippant speech on a most serious issue. The hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Stevens) made a long filibuster. Conservative Members accuse us of filibustering, but the House has had an opportunity tonight to decide which side of the House is taking the proposals seriously.

Conservative Members do not have the support of Conservatives in my area. When the Tyne and Wear county council debated the issue of elections, one clause in the resolution called on the Government to "hold an immediate comprehensive and impartial inquiry before any re-organisation of local government takes place and this County Council pledges to abide by the findings of such an inquiry."

That clause was passed by 59 votes to one—and the vote against was not from a Conservative member. That shows that the vast majority of Tyne and Wear Conservatives are worried for democracy.

The Financial Times on 28 October quotes the leader of the Conservative group on the Tyne and Wear county council as saying that the Tyne and Wear county council could be run on much more streamlined lines and confine itself to broad strategic functions. That is something that the hon. Member for Stevenage has not understood. He has sat in Committee hour after hour and has obviously not listened to a word that has been said. Not one Opposition Member has said that district and borough councillors are any less able than county councillors. We have never said that district and borough council officers are any less able than county officers. We have said that there are certain aspects of the county councils' strategic functions that are essential. Even the leader of the Tyne and Wear Conservative group has recognised that.

The Local Councils Association for Yorkshire and Cleveland has made its views clear in a letter. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) is not present. He is always telling us about the attitude in Cleveland. Mr. Ian Strong, the secretary of the association, said in the letter:

"This Association representing 430 member Parish and Town Councils in North, South and West Yorkshire and Cleveland is very much opposed to the present legislation to abolish the Metropolitan County Councils. In this it is strongly supported by the National Association of Local Councils who represent 8000 Parish and Town Councils.

The Association feels that the legislation is ill-conceived and unlikely to achieve any of the objects declared by the Government."

The evidence against the proposals is overwhelming.

I have said time and again in Committee that it is important that the Tyne and Wear authority is not demolished. One of the losses to Tyne and Wear will be section 137 and the twopenny rate. I have not received any answers to my questions on that point, but I ask Conservative Members to reflect on it. The £2 million involved for Tyne and Wear is used to protect jobs and to create further jobs in a region that consistently has the highest level of unemployment. Even if the grant is phased out over a period of time, will the Government allow the borough councils to raise an additional twopenny rate to enable Tyne and Wear to counter the massive levels of unemployment that it is facing?

Perhaps I may give some figures to illustrate my remarks. Anyone who reads the Committee debates will know that I have quoted many figures during the past few weeks. Since 1979, 85,000 jobs have been lost in the Tyne and Wear area, and there have been nearly 65,000 redundancies. More than 100,000 people are without work in the area, and the figure has doubled during the past five years. Unemployment at 20 per cent. is the third highest in mainland Britain. We believe that it is essential to have a strategic authority to help to counter the Government's monetarist policies, although it is extremely difficult to do so. We are running backwards, but at least we are trying to protect some jobs. We must have a strategic authority for economic development, job creation and the fight against unemployment.

Before I conclude, I wish to ask some questions that I hope will be answered tonight. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) and other hon. Members have talked about costs. I have asked Ministers several times, but have never received an answer, for their estimate of the cost savings or losses to be made from the abolition to Tyne and Wear metropolitan council. What will be the cost advantages? I am prepared to listen carefully to what Ministers say, but the only evidence that I have, from reports carried out by independent consultants, is that it will cost the ratepayers of Tyne and Wear money if the council is abolished. I am talking not only about direct costs, but about the tremendous social costs. I cannot understand how the Government arrived at a figure of £50 million. I should have thought that the way to discover the cost of abolition of the six metropolitan counties would be to discover the cost of abolition of each one and then to add them together. But the Minister has no figures that he can substantiate. It is about time that the Government instituted a proper independent inquiry.

What are the manpower implications of abolition? Will there be fewer or more people working? We have said all along that abolition will lead to massive unemployment. Is that true? Again, the Government have not determined what the manpower implications will be.

What will happen to the effectiveness of services? We believe that our councillors should be answerable to the electorate for the services that they provide, but we know that only 20 per cent. of the services provided by the metropolitan counties will be transferred to the boroughs. Therefore, 80 per cent. of services will be determined by the most centralised Government in western Europe—probably the most centralised in Western capitalism. The Government want less and less accountability whereas the Opposition—the true democrats—want more and more accountability.

May I emphasise my point with the independent voice of Peter Hall, the respected professor of geography at the university of Reading. He says:

"First, most of Europe is tending to move in the opposite direction to us: in the direction of greater autonomy and greater accountability for top-level metropolitan—regional authorities . . . There is overwhelming evidence that most of our neighbours have found it necessary to create metropolitan planning authorities for their capital city regions and for some other big urban areas . . . What they"—

the Government—

"should not be discussing at all, unless our European neighbours have collectively taken leave of their senses, is the need for some form of co-ordinated metropolitan government for our great urban areas. The issue is not whether, but how."

We want to argue the issue, and we are prepared to sit there day and night to do so. We want to argue the Bill line by line, but the Government, being barren of argument, want to curtail discussion by using this timetable motion.

9.3 pm

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): It is useful to follow the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) because the existence of Tyne and Wear metropolitan council makes nonsense of the argument on which the Opposition rest their case—the importance of having inquiries or commissions before this sort of thing is done. No inquiry or commission recommended the creation of something called the Tyne and Wear metropolitan council. Since the creation of the councils by a Conservative Government in the 1970s, I have believed strongly—I put forward my views on it when I was a parliamentary private secretary at the Department of the Environment — that we created bodies which did not have a valid range of functions or a valid use of resources.

I have obtained from the Library a background paper on local government inquiries. It states that there were reports on local government in the conurbations in 1947. The exercise was repeated in 1956 and a commission was set up in 1958 which reported in 1961. The Labour Government of Lord Wilson of Rievaulx, as he now is, set up the Redcliffe-Maud commission in 1966, which reported in 1972. That was followed by the Layfield inquiry. Unfortunately, the commissions and inquiries never agree. Indeed, they have not often agreed within themselves, and the Redcliffe-Maud commission was a notable example. Nor was there a consensus after it had reported. There is no unanimity merely because of an inquiry. The Government usually change a good proportion of the proposals that are contained in the reports.

Nobody could have crawled over the area of local government with greater thoroughness, in more depth or for a longer period than the Redcliffe-Maud commission.

[Dr. Keith Hampson]

In the end, it proposed establishing only three metropolitan counties, with different functions from those of the present metropolitan counties. The commission proposed Greater Manchester, which for some strange reason it called SELNEC, Merseyside and Greater Birmingham. The Labour Government, including the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), considered the proposals and, in effect, said, "No, we do not agree with this." To the three proposed metropolitan counties they added West Yorkshire and South Hampshire. They said that they wanted that level of authority to be the primary tier in local government and they wanted the metropolitan counties to have responsibility for education. The Redcliffe-Maud commission did not want that to happen.

Labour Members call for commissions of inquiry but they seem not to have read the Redcliffe-Maud report. It was not proposed in the Redcliffe-Maud report that responsibility for education should go to the metropolitan counties. However, the Labour Government in 1969-70 proposed that it should. The succeeding Tory Government changed the proposals once again and added South Yorkshire and, for some unknown reason, Tyne and Wear. They removed South Hampshire from the proposals and changed the powers of the metropolitan counties. They ended up without education and housing responsibilities. Indeed, they ended up with very little. Only a quarter of the resources which are spent to the benefit of the people, the customers, is spent by the metropolitan counties. That is to be contrasted with the shire counties' 80 per cent., and the GLC spends only one sixth. The metropolitan counties do not have a valid range of functions.

We have heard many arguments about whether it is more or less democratic to have joint boards composed of district councillors to run transport. Are joint boards more democratic than passenger transport executives? No one in my constituency thinks that the passenger transport executive is especially democratic. Equally, no one knows how to get at or control it. That probably applies also to the police authority. The substance in the argument for democracy is marginal.

Why should Wakefield, which is so far from Otley, decide which streets in Otley should have double yellow lines, which should have no yellow lines and which should have single yellow lines? Leeds could be responsible for most functions of that sort with joint boards of district councillors responsible for the other functions.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Greater Manchester area was called SELNEC because the initials represent South East Lancashire and North East Cheshire. It is a term that I do not like, but it is much better than "joint board". All historical precedent and all considered judgment led to the conclusion that there should be an authority covering the Greater Manchester area. Only the Government have failed to learn from the experience and reports of the early 1970s or from the debates that ensued. Reports do not provide definitive answers, but they engage the nation in debate, and it is to be hoped that that allows the Government of the day to legislate with some credibility. Unfortunately, the present Government have proved unable to do so.

Dr. Hampson: I think that the most recent exercise was a cock-up. Should a town such as Wakefield, or a small part of Greater Manchester such as Tameside, have authority for education, when education is not in the control of Bristol, Leicester or Nottingham, for example?

The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney as Secretary of State proposed "organic change." He recognised that certain things were not right. He did not embark on a great debate or set up a commission of inquiry before he submitted his proposals. The system that should be in place is certainly not the one that we have now. Therefore, the case for abolition is overwhelming. I am not aware of the position taken by the Labour party in Tyne and Wear, but until the Government announced their proposals the Labour party in every other metropolitan county was against the continuation of the metropolitan counties. All the Labour-controlled metropolitan districts knew only too well of the irritation of dealing with the metropolitan counties and they did not believe that they should continue, just as Mr. Livingstone took the view that the GLC should not exist.

We are not having just a ritualistic dance. This sort of debate is a farce. The Committee stage of this type of legislation cannot continue in the way that it has during the time I have been a Member. We have all played this game. We have all run on through the night debating smaller and smaller points line after line. I spent 85 hours in Committee debating the Education Bill.

The House must change its procedures. I believe that the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) recommended in The Times that, from Second Reading onwards, all Bills should be timetabled. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman is present. I hope that he will confirm that point. I would like other Opposition Members to agree that we cannot continue with this type of debate, using hackneyed arguments time and again. I should like the Opposition to agree that we shall change our way of running this business.

Mr. Straw rose——

Dr. Hampson: I have finished.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought that the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) was giving way.

Dr. Hampson: That was my last point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the Front Benchers wish the winding-up to start at 9.40 pm. A number of hon. Members want to take part in the debate. I hope that hon. Members will have consideration for the claims of others.

9.11 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The Leader of the House treated hon. Members to a light-hearted trek through the timetabling motion. He suggested that a large number of people outside are waiting to throw their caps into the air when the GLC and metropolitan county councils are abolished. If the right hon. Gentleman peers out of the House and looks over to county hall on the other side of the river, he will see that valid statistic showing that 74 per cent. of Londoners are opposed to the GLC's abolition. Whatever the Government's support in the House, there is not the same support outside in the big, wide world.

The guillotine motion is symptomatic of the Government's approach to the issue of the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. No one has said that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) has misled the House in telling us that the abolition pledge was written into the 1983 Tory election manifesto personally by the Prime Minister and against the advice of the Conservative party policy committee. That pledge was certainly written in without the Prime Minister showing the courtesy of consulting the Conservative party GLC members. They were as surprised by that manifesto pledge as was the Conservative party policy committee.

The White Paper "Streamlining the Cities" attracted, as far as we know, more than 2,500 submissions, the overwhelming majority of which were totally opposed to the Government's proposals. Yet the Government have steadfastly refused to put those submissions in the Library. The Government have said, "If you want to find out what people have said, write to them to find out." How on earth can hon. Members do a proper job if they are denied access to the information sent in by a large number of organisations?

We have had the measures to abolish the GLC and metropolitan county council elections, and now we have the guillotine when only 16 of the 98 clauses have been debated. The Opposition have not filibustered in Committee. We make no apology for debating in some detail and at some length the intricate proposals raised in the Bill. We must be clear that the Bill was based on the Prime Minister's party political spite. It will now be bulldozed through the House using what can be described only as the "zombie" vote of Members of Parliament. Most Conservative Members cannot even be bothered to equate themselves with the arguments involved in the abolition. Most of them absent themselves from the Chamber, probably because they cannot take the sight of the Secretary of State being butchered more than he has already been in the short Session until now.

The Secretary of State has been staggering around like some sort of punch-drunk fighter. To bring some relief to the right hon. Gentleman, the Government have brought in the Minister for Local Government, who has scarcely done much better than the Secretary of State. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who knows the Minister for Local Government quite well, tells me that the Minister has aged 10 years since he has been in charge of the Bill. I do not know whether that is true, but I believe that all the Environment Ministers who are now associated with the Bill are likely to find themselves politically dead—never mind aged about 10 years—as Conservative Members of Parliament realise the electoral consequences of the Government's actions and realise that they will lose council seats and, at the next general election, parliamentary seats. That does not worry me; it encourages me greatly to persuade the Government to carry on with their crazy, suicidal course. However, it worries right hon. and hon. Conservative Members, particularly the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who at least has some foresight and can understand what is going on and what problems the Conservative party will face in future elections.

The Opposition have tried to point out the implications of the Government's proposals for London and the metropolitan areas. We have heard nothing about the savings that the Government hope will accrue, about the level of likely redundancies, or about the joint boards and quangos. We have not reached any of those clauses, and now we shall be prevented from giving those important matters the consideration that they deserve.

The Minister commented a little while ago that "inquiries do not allay controversy." That comment was made in the context of Redcliffe-Maud and the Royal Commission, but the Minister must know that Royal Commissions and inquiries at least give some intellectual justification for the case that is being put by the Government. It does not mean that the Opposition will go away. Even if the proposal had been based upon the recommendations of a Royal Commission, there is no doubt that many Opposition Members would have opposed the Government. That is the Opposition's duty, but at least the Government's intellectual position would have been considerably stronger.

I am trying to throw the Minister a lifeline, because when the compromise comes, and it will, and he knows it, perhaps in another place, that is the type of argument that he should be using. If the Government's proposals were based upon the recommendations of a Royal Commission or an inquiry, there would be a degree of intellectual justification for them even though there would still be disagreement, but there is no intellectual justification for what the Government are putting forward.

It is no good Conservative Members "rubbishing" the great weight of information that has come to the Committee saying that the Government's proposals are wrong. How many authorities can the Government quote in defence of their proposals? How many independent bodies can the Government quote to say that they have it right? The only people on whom the Government have been so far able to rely have been a number of local authority Conservative leaders; and they would support the Government, would they not? No one from outside who has any standing, objectivity or impartiality has supported the Government. How can Conservative Members persist in arguing that the Government's case is proper, just and right in defiance of all opinion — electoral, professional and academic — coming from outside? It is nonsense. The Government know that. Ministers are in many ways prejudicing their political futures by supporting the Bill. It should be thrown out, as should this timetable motion.

Dr. Ian Twinn (Edmonton): The Committee has sat through over 100 hours of repetitious speeches. Most of the speeches that we have heard from Opposition members of the Committee have been Second Reading speeches. One or two of them this evening have been Queen's Speech speeches because they have become so general and have ranged so widely and so often off the point of the Bill.

On a number of occasions we have listened word for word to the same speech from different members of the Committee, and even from the same members. This evening the debate has been dropped even lower by the speech by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who has reduced the debate to a political jibe without any substance. To be fair to him, he has been one of the members of the Committee whose argument has been more detailed. He has had plenty of people to help him write his speeches. There has been a galaxy of 27 of them. On occasions he has been effective in putting over his point of view, but alas not this evening.

Progress in Committee has been resisted by Opposition Members who have made speeches for the sake of making them or for the sake of the local press.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): What is the hon. Gentleman's speech about?

Dr. Twinn: My speech is about what I thought the debate was about — the progress of the Bill in Committee and whether we should have a timetable motion. It is not a speech in which I shall make cheap political jibes or go over the principle of the Bill, which was voted on at Second Reading.

The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) suggested that there should be a timetable for all Bills.

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. He is more courteous than his hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson).

I believe in timetables for all Bills, but with the important proviso that the time taken should be under the control, not of the Government, but of a Committee appointed by the House and that there should be provision for the Standing Committee to seek more time if that became necessary.

Dr. Twinn: I read the hon. Gentleman's article, which has much to commend it. I go along with him. However, it would be a pity if, for the sake of being a purist in these matters, we allowed the Bill to drift on in the aimless way in which it has been progressing. We can make a start, albeit in a small way, with this timetable motion. It is not perfect, and it is controlled by the Government, but let us hope that in future timetables will be controlled by a Committee of the House and that we can have sensible debates on all Bills. I would welcome that.

It has been suggested that there has been no thought or discussion about the proposals in the Bill. That is an astounding statement. One expects Opposition Members to state that view as a political point, but the astounding aspect is that they appear to say it with a sincerity which I can hardly believe they feel.

There have been countless debates in the past 20 years about the nature of local government. Virtually every possible combination of authorities has been proposed and discussed over the years. The House and the country have had plenty of time to consider the best form of local government. When the commitment to abolish the GLC and the metropolitan counties appeared in our election manifesto, the electorate had the good sense to see that it was a good idea. It was certainly extremely popular in Edmonton.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: In all these many debates over the years, where were joint boards at the strategic level first suggested, outside the White Paper and the Bill?

Dr. Twinn: I shall not be tempted down that path, because other hon. Members wish to take part in the debate. Joint boards are expedients, but I believe that the rest of the proposals are worth those expedients. Politics are partly about compromise and pragmatism.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Is not one of the great advantages of joint boards the fact that every metropolitan district will be represented on those boards? At present there is no guarantee that each district will be represented on a county council committee.

Dr. Twinn: My hon. Friend is right. The Bill brings democracy down to a smaller geographical and electoral area and will be widely welcomed for that.

I am not surprised that the GLC is able to quote the figure that it got from somewhere of 74 per cent. of Londoners supporting the council. If I spent millions of pounds on advertising, I would expect that sort of support. Otherwise, I would not spend the money. I am not surprised that there is some small support in the opinion polls. However, when the GLC and the metropolitan counties have gone, there will be widespread support for the new authorities and the old councils will not be missed.

In fact, in London we have had electoral tests of the popularity of the GLC's proposals. In my seat in Edmonton, we had a GLC by-election, when the turnout halved. The arguments were ravaged by the electorate, who did not turn up. It was a spurious and cynical move on behalf of the GLC to use taxpayers' money for a test of its own opinion, and I am only pleased that it failed.

I hope that hon. Members will support the timetable motion so that my constituents in Edmonton have a chance to be rid of the GLC and so that they can have elections and a local authority in Enfield which is at a closer level, where they will appreciate it and be able to influence it.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Today's debate has been characterised by being less lighthearted than many of the Committee sittings. We have also heard for the first time from some Tory Members who said nothing in Committee but who seem happy to come to the Chamber and say why its deliberations should be shortened.

The context of my arguments against the guillotine motion is narrow. In the explanatory and financial memorandum of the Bill, the Secretary of State says that the aim of the Bill is to save about £100 million by the abolition of the metropolitan counties and estimates a reduction in public service manpower in those areas by about 7,100. Setting aside the argument that the Bill will deny 18 million people the right to vote, that first point alone justifies continuing the debate, but not at the level that the Leader of the House proposes in his guillotine motion of 40 minutes per clause over the next three and a half weeks. Not only have the central claims on manpower and services not been proven by the Government, but on many occasions when I have put questions to Ministers about the so-called savings from manpower changes or changes in specific services, I have been told to wait until debates on later clauses in the Bill in the expectation that those debates would be of a similar character to those on the first 16 clauses, with 56 hours of debate.

The Bill proposes that responsibility for services be returned to the district councils, for example in the west midlands. Last year the Secretary of State said that most of the services would go back to the districts, but we now know that fewer than 20 per cent. will. We have yet to debate some of them fully in the Bill. One fact that has not yet come out of the debate, which of itself would justify extending the time for debate, is that the services that are presently provided by the West Midlands county council, according to the Secretary of State's grant-related expenditure assessment, are supposed to cost £270 million this year. However, the target for the county council is set at £254 million. Therefore, through abolition the right hon. Gentleman expects the same services to be carried out by district bodies, joint boards, residuary bodies, and so on, yet he has already cut the amount of money that will go towards those services by £16 million. How will we have answers to questions on whether it is the same service costing the ratepayer more or the same amount of money paid by the ratepayer for a substantially lower service unless we are allowed more than a paltry 40 minutes for each clause remaining in the Bill?

On many occasions in Committee we have asked what financial savings will be made on each service area. We have had no real answers from the Government. We have asked what manpower savings there will be in each service area, and we have had no real figures from the Government. In at least three service areas—I played a part in the debates on each one of them—the Secretary of State has acknowledged that there will be no savings. Those three areas are waste disposal, probation and archives. He has acknowledged that costs will rise in two service areas — coroners and trading standards. Each time he says such things he also reflects on the fact that we shall go into those matters in detail on later clauses. However, the fact remains that the six clauses designed to deal with the so-called savings from staff transfers are likely to occupy about 280 minutes if the motion is passed. Over 150,000 people work for the metropolitan county councils and the GLC. The Government will dispose of about 534 jobs a minute in the later debates in Committee. People's lives and jobs are worth more consideration than that.

There is not time to go into detail, so I shall give just a few brief examples. As reported at column 862, when I asked the Minister in Committee about the waste disposal arrangements he said that the answers would be given later in the debate. I asked about the cost involved for district councils in setting up several different waste disposal plants and I pointed out that splitting waste disposal among seven authorities in the west midlands would mean at least 9,000 extra pieces of paper relating to the transport of hazardous waste across district boundaries, but the Minister had not costed it and had no facts or figures to give. We need to go into those details.

We also asked how the Minister arrived at the figure of 7,100 lost jobs. Did he take the cuts planned for each service and aggregate them across the county councils or did he set targets for each council and then add them all together? Again, we received no answers. When I asked about planning, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State specifically said, as reported at column 293, that he would reply to my points later in the debate. On 22 January I asked about environment and land reclamation and the impact on jobs. I was told to come back to that when we reached part VI of the Bill. Ministers have constantly said that we shall come to these things later, but if the guillotine motion goes through there will be no time for the answers to be given.

Perhaps those Tory Members for whom one job is insufficient to tax their energies or support their lifestyles and who therefore need between two and 13 jobs can afford to be callous when discussing the jobs of thousands of metropolitan county council employees, but in my area one third of a million people are on the dole, there are 30 people chasing every vacancy and in one ward unemployment is more than 32 per cent. In those circumstances, there will be no jobs for the hundreds or thousands made redundant by the Bill. Yet the Government dismiss those people and their future at 40 minutes per clause. The Bill is not about saving money and improving services. It is about abolishing Labour councils because the Tories cannot defeat us at the ballot box. That needs to be exposed in full debate in Committee. The jobs of 7,100 workers deserve more than execution by the guillotine.

9.32 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Every time the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) speaks in the Committee he makes the same speech about job losses, a speech which should be made in an unemployment debate, not in a debate about the future of local government.

The whole House agrees that this is an important measure. It was set out clearly in the Conservative manifesto. Indeed, the leader of the GLC, Mr. Ken Livingstone, at one stage supported the idea. The Bill is absolutely right. It will lead to less government and to more, not less, accountability because local people will be involved. I know from experience as a member of a London borough council that on planning matters one always has to wait for the GLC's comments, which turn out not to be worth listening to, so we proceed to deal with the matter locally.

The Bill will also lead ultimately to reduced expenditure. That is vital if we are to provide the assistance that we genuinely wish to give to industry. The Opposition say that jobs will be lost as a result of the Bill, but jobs have already been lost as a result of high rates caused by an unnecessary tier of government. So far the Committee has dealt with 16 clauses out of 98, during 19 sittings covering 1,200 columns of the Official Report. We have had to endure sitting until 5 o'clock in the morning. I know that Opposition Members feel strongly about the Bill. However, they know the procedures of the House. They know that they are responsible for making progress. During every debate on every specific clause, the whole team is wheeled out to repeat the same old arguments.

The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East says that there will be only 40 minutes to debate each clause. I have no sympathy for the hon. Gentleman. If the Opposition had speeded up consideration of the clauses, we could have been well on our way through the Bill. We could have considered the ILEA, the police and transport—major subjects that the Opposition have prevented us from debating.

I share the view of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) and my hon. Friends that we are going through a ritual. There is the indignation of the Opposition and the self-justification of the Government. I should like to quote from a speech by Robert Mellish, the former right hon. Member for Bermondsey — a source I would not normally quote. During the debate on the timetable motion on the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Bill, he said:

"Oppositions must be allowed to oppose, but Oppositions must be denied the complete freedom to do exactly what they want by filibustering, for example, in their attempts to stop Bills. Governments must have the right to govern and Oppositions must have the right to oppose. That is what democracy is all about. But when Oppositions have had their fun and games, the Government must be free to move in."—[Official Report, 20 July 1976; Vol. 915, c. 1554.]

I wholeheartedly endorse what Mr. Mellish said then, which was that each Bill should have a timetable motion at the start. I hope that the procedures of the House will soon be changed.

9.37 pm

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): I am horrified not just by the fact that the Government are guillotining the Bill but by the manner in which they are doing it. They could have brought in a guillotine—I would still have opposed it—that allowed more time for debate than 40 minutes a clause. Each clause that remains to be debated covers a major service. We shall have 40 minutes in which to debate the police. On Merseyside, the rate capping legislation will deprive the police service of £14·4 million. Proposals in the Bill do not help. There will be a police authority controlled by magistrates and nominees of the districts. There will be no directly elected representatives to account for the police service.

We were just beginning to convince Conservative Members in Committee that the Bill gives more power not to the districts, but to quangos, joint boards and ministerial reserve powers. However, the present debate proves that we have not yet convinced them. They keep repeating the myths. We need more time in which to convince them.

The arts have still to be debated. We need answers on each metropolitan county council area, and on GLC matters. What will happen to specific areas of the arts? On Merseyside, what will happen to Croxted hall, Speke hall and the Philharmonic hall? The people of the area want to know.

The voluntary bodies are still bombarding us with questions that the Minister has not answered about the future of the voluntary sector. Government Members do nothing but reiterate their prejudices against blacks and women. They attack the voluntary sector to which authorities such as Merseyside county council and the GLC have given grants.

The whole question of costs has yet to be fully discussed. There is a clause on redundancy payments. The Government say that the Bill will save money. However, there is a clause on compensation for loss of office and diminution of emoluments. It appears that the Government mean to pension everyone off and that the pensions will cost more than it costs to run the Merseyside county council.

There are the financial arrangements for the future, the block grant situation and the fact that the joint bodies and quangos will be rate capped before their lives begin. We also have to debate transport and such questions as the future of the bus pass on Merseyside. The Government appear to want to return to the voucher system operated in Tory Sefton before the Labour council gave a bus pass to the elderly of Merseyside.

We have not yet debated the clause on airports. We have to debate the future of Manchester and Speke airports. I suggest that if Merseyside county council is abolished, Speke airport will be closed. How will that affect jobs on Merseyside?

We need time for the Government to make their own case. So far, they have failed to do so. We have continually pressed the Government for clear evidence about costs and have asked them what expert support exists for their proposals, but no such evidence has been forthcoming. We have also asked about the financial saving in each service area. Instead of producing evidence of such saving, the Government have admitted that there will be no savings among the services that we have so far debated. In at least three areas — waste disposal, probation services and archives — Ministers have admitted that there will be no savings. In two others—the coroners service and the trading standards service—they have actually acknowledged that costs will rise. We therefore need time to debate these matters.

The Government have made no case for their proposals. We have debated each clause fully because so far each has covered a major service area. The same can be said of the remaining 56 hours. We shall need that time to debate the remaining clauses and schedules, to put our case for each service area and to get some answers from the Government.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will forgive me if I do not reply to their speeches in detail in the 10 minutes available to me. However, I wish to make two general observations.

First, the first few Conservative Members who spoke seemed more concerned with the contents of the Strangers Gallery than with the contents of the Bill. We then had a series of repetitious speeches complaining about repetition in Committee, but, as the Leader of the House made clear, there has been no repetition in Committee and no attempts to filibuster.

If ever a Bill needed proper Committee scrutiny, this one certainly does. It was never based on any proper inquiry into the proposals. The proposals have not been subjected to any thorough public examination, and they will now not receive thorough parliamentary scrutiny.

Far from being involved in repetition, the Committee has expeditiously discussed a number of important matters, such as technical services, strategic planning, conservation, highways, traffic management, economic development, waste disposal, trading standards, judicial services, support for the arts, promotion of equal opportunities and support for black and ethnic minority communities.

During our deliberations the Committee has clearly demonstrated that the Government have no identified support for their proposals outside the Conservative party. They have been unable to identify any service area in which financial and manpower savings will result from abolition; nor have they identified an area which will be more effectively managed as a result of the Bill. That is the reality of what the Committee has been doing, and the Opposition demand the right and the opportunity to continue to discuss these issues.

I agree with a number of hon. Members who have said that as presently organised the House of Commons cannot possibly deal with Bills such as this. This is a mammoth piece of legislation containing 98 clauses and 17 schedules. It was obvious from the beginning that it would be the subject of a timetable motion. Indeed, I have no doubt in my own mind that in planning its introduction and passage through the House the Government intended to have a guillotine at this stage of its parliamentary consideration.

That decision means that a number of major policy issues in the seven authorities concerned—education, the police and fire services, transport, airports, museums, art galleries, the South Bank, and so on — will be desperately short of time for proper consideration. For example, part IV sets up 19 new joint boards. Clause 40 enables the Secretary of State, without inquiry, to break up police, fire or transport authorities. Clauses 41 to 45 transfer the London and metropolitan museums and the South Bank to Government appointees. One can go on listing major policies in the Bill which will not be given anything like adequate consideration.

It seems from the timetable that the Committee will have between 50 and 60 hours to deal with the remaining 82 clauses and nine schedules dealing with the policies which I have set out. No Committee can, in that time, deal properly and adequately with the issues involved, and I defy any Conservative Members, particularly those serving on the Committee who have sat throughout its proceedings without uttering a word, to say that in the remaining time the Committee will have the opportunity to scrutinise the Bill as it needs and deserves to be examined.

We are here predictably. I share the view, expressed in particular by Conservative Members, that the House of Commons should reform the way in which it examines legislation, particularly legislation such as this. The hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson), among others, asked about the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw). My hon. Friend and I share identical views on this subject, and they are that the present procedures are demonstrably inadequate, but so are the arrangements whereby only the Government have any real say about the timetable of legislation. We feel—and the House should address itself to this—that we should reform our procedures so that Bills can be timetabled, but not on the basis of a decision made by the Executive, whichever party is forming the Executive.

The Opposition are said to have the power to delay and have been using it in this instance, as on previous examinations of Government legislation. That is not true. It is clearly the case that the Government can override, as they are doing with this timetable motion, even the limited power of Opposition parties simply to delay progress on a Bill. It is also increasingly seen outside the House, by members of the authorities concerned, by the officers serving those authorities and by the general public that our procedures are not just inadequate but frankly barmy. I do not think that those who observe our proceedings in Committee think it sensible, leads to good legislation or good government, for close on 50 hon. Members to be sitting up all day and night two days a week considering legislation.

I guess that it is no accident that the Secretary of State decided to opt out of this procedure, and in some senses I do not blame him. It cannot be sensible for a Cabinet Minister to be kept out of bed day and night for two days and nights a week and thus not be able to attend effectively to the affairs of state. The right hon. Gentleman does a pretty bad job of it when he gets to bed, so if he were kept up two nights a week, goodness knows what difficulties he would be getting into.

The reality is that reform of the House of Commons would be far more in the interests of the taxpayers than will the Government's proposed reforms of local councils. Taxpayers — and, indeed, ratepayers — would get far more benefit, a far better deal and far better legislation from the reform of Parliament, and the way that this kind of legislation is dealt with, than they will from any plans to abolish the metropolitan counties or the Greater London council. It is clear that those authorities so order and conduct their business that they are able to operate in a far more sane, sensible and logical way than we are able to here. That is the reality. In consequence, they give their ratepayers a better deal.

There is no case for the guillotine — at least in its present form—nor was there ever any case for the Bill. In the absence of the reforms that I have mentioned, I have no hesitation in urging everyone to oppose the motion.

9.50 pm

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): One of the words that have been used a great deal this evening has been the word "ritual". The noises made against the measure by the Opposition have been ritualistic. They have expressed shock and horror at our attempting to curtail the debate, because they have said that they wanted to improve the Bill. They have never had that intention. Their whole purpose has been to delay and destroy the Bill and to overturn the convincing vote on Second Reading, when the House accepted the principle of the Bill and the Government had a majority of 135.

The word "ritual" has been used to describe the way that we conduct ourselves in examining legislation in Standing Committee. I have been involved in three guillotined measures in the past three years. [Interruption.] I am not as expert as some, as I shall show later. They have all been very controversial Bills—the first two Telecommunications Bills and this Bill.

As one of the prime players, it seems to me that this is how a ritual develops. First, the Government publish the Bill, and then some Opposition spokesman says that they will fight it line by line and clause by clause. That pleases their supporters in the country. But it immediately impales the Opposition on a hook, because it is not then possible for them to come to any sort of reasonable arrangement about the length of debate. They feel—I understand it—that they would be letting down their supporters in the country if they made such a deal.

The failure of such an arrangement means that the Government are also impaled on a hook, because they then have to make a reasonable amount of time available for the measure to be debated—and so it goes on. The House knows the result — very late sittings. A tradition has been established that a timetable motion cannot be moved until a Committee has sat for 100 hours. This time the figure is about 105 hours. It is a sort of new parliamentary virility symbol.

I listened carefully to the words of the Leader of the House this afternoon. He said that he was not persuaded of a need to change the procedures of the House and that he would prefer voluntary arrangements to prevail. I agree that for the great bulk of parliamentary business we would all welcome the idea that reasonable arrangements should prevail, but in regard to very controversial Bills it is expecting too much to think that that will occur. If the Leader of the House is not willing to consider a more fundamental change, perhaps he could lower the level of the virility symbol that is required before guillotine motions are moved from 100 hours to, say, 50 hours. I believe that that was the figure once agreed upon by a former Leader of the House, Mr. Chuter Ede.

I readily agree that the Bill has not been delayed as a result of filibustering upstairs. Indeed, the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans) has hardly ever got into second gear. But that did not prevent him from accusing the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State of filibustering when he introduced an amendment in 12 seconds flat. Upstairs in Committee we have seen a sort of filibuster by amendment. About 600 amendments have been tabled. I would not mind that if those amendments were designed to improve the Bill in any detail, but instead they have all provided opportunities for Second Reading speeches to be made on the same principle.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Baker: I am sorry, but I cannot give way.

In Committee there has really only been one debate and that has been on the question of whether the boroughs and districts can fulfil the duties, or whether we need county-wide authorities. The amendments have been directed to that. If we had not introduced this guillotine motion, the debate would have been very prolonged. One night, when I had little else to do, I calculated how much longer our debates would have taken—incidentally, I was gambling that we might just pass this motion—if the Committee took as long on the next lot of clauses and schedules as it had taken on the first grouping. I discovered that we would have come out of the Committee on 1 August. I see that the hon. Members for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) think that that is a good idea.

If it took us as long to debate the rest of the Bill as it took us to debate clause 2—a three-line clause that took us an hour a line to debate—we would not have come out of Committee until 1993.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Baker: I have even better news for the Opposition. If it took as long to debate the rest of the Bill as it took us to debate clause 8—when it took us 10 hours to debate only six lines—the Bill would not have emerged from Committee until the end of the century.

The guillotine motion contains one of the most generous allocations of time for more than 15 years. So far, we have had 118 hours in Committee and, if one includes the time spent on Second Reading, we have spent 133½ hours debating the Bill. After the guillotine motion is passed, another 72 hours will be provided. There will be 14 hours on Report and Third Reading. Thus, in all, 220 hours will have been provided. No Bill has had such a long debate since the Housing Finance Bill in 1971.

That debate will allow the House and the Committee to examine in considerable detail the various matters that we have not yet touched upon. My hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) and the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said that we had not yet debated ILEA, the police authorities, the fire authorities, the passenger transport authorities, our policy on airports or the future of the South Bank. But our failure to reach those parts of the Bill is due entirely to the tactics developed and used by the Opposition.

As I have made clear to the Opposition Front Bench, we have been willing to make progress. But instead there have been prolonged debates—all on the basic principle of the Bill. There has been a series of Second Reading speeches. That cannot be the right or appropriate way to deal with legislation.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Baker: I hope that the Bill will be debated exhaustively. I am sure that Opposition Members will be able to debate it now in a more measured way and will not have to sit up until 1 am, 3 am or 5 am. The only people to gain from a delay are the authorities. They are seeking to subvert Parliament's intention as clearly expressed on Second Reading, because if they can delay the Bill, the whole process of legislation and of devolution will come to an end. That is why we must speed the Bill on its way to the House of Lords. We want it on the statute book in the summer so that the process of abolition can continue in the following nine months.

The other word that has been used tonight is democracy. It has been said that the Bill is not democratic. I remember a former Labour Leader of the House standing at this Dispatch Box and moving five guillotine motions in one day. The tumbrils were queuing up at the scaffold as the Bills were wheeled on and guillotined. I am not prepared to take lectures on democracy from a Labour party that will not even have one man one vote for the selection of its Members of Parliament. Therefore, I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will support the motion.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That the following provisions shall apply to the remaining proceedings on the Bill:—

Committee

1. The Standing Committee to which the Bill (except Clause 1) is allocated shall report the Bill (except Clause 1) to the House on or before 7th March 1985.

Report and Third Reading

2.—(1) The proceedings on Consideration and Third Reading of the Bill shall be completed in two allotted days and shall be brought to a conclusion at Ten o'clock on the second of those days; and for the purposes of Standing Order No. 45 (Business Committee) this Order shall be taken to allot to the proceedings on Consideration such part of those days as the Resolution of the Business Committee may determine.

(2) The Business Committee shall report to the House its Resolutions as to the proceedings on Consideration of the Bill, and as to the allocation of time between those proceedings and proceedings on Third Reading, not later than the fourth day on which the House sits after the day on which the Chairman of the Standing Committee reports the Bill to the House.

(3) The Resolutions in any Report made under Standing Order No. 45 may be varied by a further Report so made, whether or not within the time specified in sub-paragraph (2) above, and whether or not the Resolutions have been agreed to by the House.

(4) The Resolutions of the Business Committee may include alterations in the order in which proceedings on Consideration of the Bill are taken.

Procedure in Standing Committee

3.—(1) At a sitting of the Standing Committee at which any proceedings on the Bill are to be brought to a conclusion under a Resolution of the Business Sub-Committee the Chairman shall not adjourn the Committee under any Order relating to the sittings of the Committee until the proceedings have been brought to a conclusion.

(2) No Motion shall be moved in the Standing Committee relating to the sitting of the Committee except by a member of the Government, and the Chairman shall permit a brief explanatory statement from the Member who moves, and from a Member who opposes, the Motion, and shall then put the Question thereon.

4. No Motion shall be moved to alter the order in which Clauses, Schedules, new Clauses and new Schedules are taken in the Standing Committee but the Resolutions of the Business Sub-Committee may include alterations in that order.

Conclusion of proceedings in Committee

5. On the conclusion of the proceedings in any Committee on the Bill the Chairman shall report the Bill (or such of its provisions as were committed or re-committed to that Committee) to the House without putting any Question.

Dilatory Motions

6. No dilatory Motion with respect to, or in the course of, proceedings on the Bill shall be moved in the Standing Committee or on an allotted day except by a member of the Government, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith.

Extra time on first allotted day

7.—(1) On the first allotted day paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings on the Bill for two hours after Ten o'clock.

(2) Any period during which proceedings on the Bill may be proceeded with after Ten o'clock under paragraph (7) of Standing Order No. 10 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) shall be in addition to the said period of two hours.

(3) If the first allotted day is one to which a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 stands over from an earlier day, a period of time equal to the duration of the proceedings upon that Motion shall be added to the said period of two hours.

Private business

8. Any private business which has been set down for consideration at Seven o'clock on an allotted day shall, instead of being considered as provided by Standing Orders, be considered at the conclusion of the proceedings on the Bill on that day, and paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the private business for a period of three hours from the conclusion of the proceedings on the Bill or, if those proceedings are concluded before Ten o'clock, for a period equal to the time elapsing between Seven o'clock and the conclusion of those proceedings.

Conclusion of proceedings

9.—(1) For the purpose of bringing to a conclusion any proceedings which are to be brought to a conclusion at a time appointed by this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee or the Business Sub-Committee and which have not previously been brought to a conclusion, the Chairman or Mr. Speaker shall forthwith put the following Questions (but no others)—

(a) any Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) any Question necessary to bring to a decision a Question so proposed (including, in the case of a new Clause or new Schedule which has been read a second time, the Question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill);

(c) the Question on any amendment or Motion standing on the Order Paper in the name of any Member, if that amendment or Motion is moved by a Member of the Government; and on a Motion so moved for a new Clause or a new Schedule, the Chairman or Mr. Speaker shall put only the Question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill.

(d) any other Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded;

(2) Proceedings under sub-paragraph (1) above shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

(3) If an allotted day is one on which a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 (Adjournment on specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration) would, apart from this Order, stand over to Seven o'clock—

(a) that Motion shall stand over until the conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which, under this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee, are to be brought to a conclusion at or before that time;

(b) the bringing to a conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which, under this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee, are to be brought to a conclusion after that time shall be postponed for a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on that Motion.

(4) If an allotted day is one to which a Motion for the adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 stands over from an earlier day, the bringing to a conclusion of any proceedings on the Bill which, under this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee, are to be brought to a conclusion on that day shall be postponed for a period equal to the duration of the proceedings on that Motion.

10.—(1) The proceedings on any Motion moved in the House by a member of the Government for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order (including anything which might have been the subject of a report of the Business Committee or Business Sub-Committee) shall, if not previously concluded, be brought to a conclusion one hour after they have been commenced, and paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall apply to the proceedings.

(2) If on an allotted day on which any proceedings on the Bill are to be brought to a conclusion at a time appointed by this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee the House is adjourned, or the sitting is suspended, before that time no notice shall be required of a Motion moved at the next sitting by a member of the Government for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order.

Saving

11. Nothing in this Order or a Resolution of the Business Committee or Business Sub-Committee shall—

(a) prevent any proceedings to which the Order or Resolution applies from being taken or completed earlier than is required by the Order or Resolution, or

(b) prevent any business (whether on the Bill or not) from being proceeded with on any day after the completion of all such proceedings on the Bill as are to be taken on that day.

Re-committal

12.—(1) References in this Order to proceedings on Consideration or proceedings on Third Reading include references to proceedings, at those stages respectively, for, on or in consequence of re-committal.

(2) On an allotted day no debate shall be permitted on any Motion to re-commit the Bill (whether as a whole or otherwise), and Mr. Speaker shall put forthwith any Question necessary to dispose of the Motion, including the Question on any amendment moved to the Question.

Interpretation

13. In this Order—

"allotted day" means any day (other than a Friday) on which the Bill is put down as first Government Order of the Day provided that a Motion for allotting time to the proceedings on the Bill to be taken on that day either has been agreed on a previous day or is set down for consideration on that day;

"the Bill" means the Local Government Bill;

"Resolution of the Business Sub-Committee" means a Resolution of the Business Sub-Committee as agreed to by the Standing Committee;

"Resolution of the Business Committee" means a Resolution of the Business Committee as agreed to by the House.

Health and Safety

10.13 pm

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984 (S.I., 1984, No. 1902), dated 4th December 1984, a copy of which was laid before this House on 18th December, be annulled.

This important regulation deals with major issues in many parts of the country. However, before I comment on it, I wish to say at the outset that we received two statutory instruments from the Vote Office — one printed in December and the other printed in January. Some corrections have been made to the statutory instrument, one of which extends the period during which organisations must co-operate with the regulation. The Department has been especially sloppy in that respect. This should not have been allowed to happen and I want to hear from the Minister why it did. Was there pressure from the industry to extend the period after which the regulations will become applicable? One of our major criticisms of the regulations is that they do not go far enough in meeting our anxieties.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene at such an early stage. The copy of the regulations that was signed and laid before Parliament contained no errors. However, there was a misprint in the explanatory memorandum and the memorandum has been reprinted for the convenience of the House. It contains the same date as the consultative document which, no doubt, the hon. Gentleman will have read. No doubt he will forgive us for any attempt to move the final date of implementation backwards.

Mr. Prescott: Yes. I notice that an extra six months is allowed before it is necessary to comply with the regulations. The change to which the Minister has referred means that there will be four and a half years before it is necessary to comply with the regulations, instead of four years. That will not go down very well in many areas where there is extreme concern about the concentration of hazardous materials. Many incidents are still fresh in our minds. The terrible Bhopal tragedy is especially clear in our minds. As I come from Humberside, I recall the night of the explosion at Flixborough. Most of those living on the north or the south bank of the Humber heard that terrible and tragic explosion. Much of the plant was blown across the river on to the north bank. The Flixborough disaster led to the establishment of committees to consider the regulations that were required for explosive chemicals.

Since the Flixborough disaster of 1974, there have been fires and explosions at Barking, Stalybridge, Manchester and Sheffield. There is the controversy in Livingston about whether Union Carbide should be allowed to develop a plant in that area. I am sure that every hon. Member will be increasingly concerned, as will their constituents, about the growing problems arising from the concentration of hazardous materials and substances.

The regulations before us stem from the terrible accident and tragedy at Seveso in Italy, which led the Community to develop regulations. The delay in the implementation of the regulations arising from the Seveso incident has caused delay in action being taken in Britain. More than three reports have come from the advisory committee since the Flixborough explosion in 1974.

I am sure that the House will welcome any regulations that seek to improve safety and to reduce the repetition of the tragic incidents to which I have referred. Any extra-statutory controls that are envisaged in the regulations requiring notification, safety plans, on and off-site emergency plans and the provision of information for local authorities, however limited, are to be welcomed. However, these improvements represent a step forward and two steps backwards. The Opposition's criticisms of the regulations are considerable. We are in considerable doubt whether they should be given full support. I am eager to hear what the Minister has to say in their defence.

First, the regulations are limited in application. They do not apply to all the areas of concern where incidents are likely to occur. Secondly, the requirement on manufacturers to provide information does not go far enough. Thirdly, the resources required for the implementation of the regulations will not be met adequately.

After the Flixborough incident, a study was undertaken of the advisory bodies to ascertain how many plants should be covered by the controls as envisaged. The first report, which appeared in the mid-1970s, showed that 5,000 such places should be subject to some form of control. It was an identification of all the areas of concern. In 1982, the regulations which were introduced identified 1,600 plants and areas of concern. The regulations before us identify only 250 such plants, which is only 5 per cent. of the 5,000 which were identified in 1976. That is a tremendous climb-down from the areas which were first identified following the concern about the Flixborough incident which itself would not have been covered by these regulations.

Under the regulations, the Health and Safety Executive has identified large inventory plants and it believes that 250 should be required to co-operate with the regulations by providing safety plans and taking other action. The Health and Safety Executive designates small inventory areas — those plants and areas where the chemical concentrations are less than the minimum criteria laid down in the legislation. There are more than 1,000 of them.

I understand that there is some controversy in one regard. The EEC Commission believes that these regulations should apply to all large and small plants. The Opposition agree, because most of the explosions have occurred in small plant areas. Those areas will not be covered by these regulations if the large inventory areas interpretation is taken into account. Do the Government intend to make it clear to the Health and Safety Executive that these requirements should apply to the 1,250 areas as a whole and not just to the 250 plants of particular concern?

We criticise also the measures relating to accountability and information. The regulations require safety plans to be provided by 1989, but that is a long way off. This is not satisfactory. Our criticisms relate also to other aspects of the regulations. First, the requirements to provide information to the different authorities — county and district — differ. I believe that that will lead to confusion. The authorities have complained about that aspect. Secondly, there is no requirement to report to the safety committee at the plant—to the shop stewards and the workers — about dangerous chemicals and areas. Thirdly, the on-site manufacturer can prepare a plan, but, under these regulations, he is required only to consult the person whom he thinks is appropriate. The regulations do not specifically make it clear that, if the manufacturer cannot agree with the local authority about the actions he wishes to take in his plant, he cannot just go to someone whom he thinks is appropriate and fulfil his obligations under the regulations. That is not satisfactory.

Fourthly, the information to be given to the public is not required to be given directly to the public, and that is unsatisfactory. The information may be given to the local authority and will be given to the Health and Safety Executive but the executive is not under an obligation, according to the legislation, to give confidential information to the public. Complaints have been made that these regulations do not enable such essential information to be made available to anyone who inquires.

In the February 1985 edition of Health and Safety at Work Alex Crawford states in the editorial:

"those liable to be affected by a major accident have no right, under these new regulations, to challenge the manufacturer's description of the nature of the hazard to which he is exposing them, the safety measures he proposes, nor the behaviour he lays down for them to adopt in the event of a major accident."

The same editorial contains a complaint by a consultant who said that the secrecy surrounding this information should not be allowed.

Members of Parliament are asking for information on the plants in their areas that will be identified under the regulations as containing hazardous materials. I have acquired a Health and Safety Executive document which makes it clear that, under the old 1982 regulations, 42 plants were designated in my area of Humberside—one of the most dangerous areas for chemical plants in the United Kingdom — as places to be identified to the authorities as possible dangerous locations. Under the new regulations only 12 of those 42 plants have to be identified. That is the scale of the reduction in the requirements. Are Members of Parliament and the public entitled to know whether the areas in which they live are designated as dangerous?

The Health and Safety Executive cannot make that information available, therefore the Government should change the health and safety legislation so that people may obtain it, and allow Members of Parliament to have access to it. In the Humberside region 12 plants can be identified as needing consideration. One of them is the Ciba-Geigy chemical plant in Grimsby, which is the only plant using the same chemicals as those at Bhopal. The House can imagine how worried are the people living in that area, especially as the Health and Safety Executive has removed the only health and safety inspector form that plant.

My final criticism of the regulations relates to the resources available for their implementation. The Health and Safety Executive, which provides the factory inspectors, will have its work load increased fivefold by the requirements of the legislation. In 1979, 964 inspectors were employed by the Health and Safety Executive. The Labour Government's plans provided for that number to increase to 1,150. By 1984, the number had fallen to 824 —a 16 per cent. fall. The greatest drop has been in the number of field inspectors. There has been a 19 per cent., fall from 644 inspectors to 537. They are the people who should check what manufacturers are saying and whether there is a threat to surrounding communities. Their number has been reduced because of the Government's cut in resources to the Health and Safety Executive.

When the Government have to decide between tax cuts or factory inspectors, they should opt for the latter so as to assure people living around the plants.

There is considerable criticism of the resources available and the accountability provided under the regulations. We hope that the Minister will say whether he is satisfied with the regulations, whether he intends to introduce further changes under the planning regulations and whether the Government can improve the position and reduce the growing anxiety felt in areas such as Barking, Sheffield and Livingston. The public will begin to demand action. I predict that explosions and other incidents will occur in plants that are not covered by the regulations. For the House to vote on regulations that may improve the position in 250 plants but ignore a further 1,000 plants and warehouses is to ignore the types of places where explosions and fires have taken place.

The measure is perhaps motivated by the best of intentions within the EEC, but its implementation is conditioned by a lack of adequate resources. It omits hazardous areas from the full effects of the controls and leaves the Opposition in serious doubt as to whether to support the regulations. We shall listen carefully to what assurances the Minister can give us.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): I listened to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) with great interest. He spoke forcefully. He was somewhat critical of the regulations introduced by the Government on this important subject. I sense that he was critical of the fact that we were dealing with the issue late at night. Many hon. Members are worried that we are dealing with the subject of major hazards and possible major disasters late at night. We have recently seen the horrific disaster at Bhopal. It should never have happened. The process was well known. We are considering something which has been delivered to us by the Commission in Brussels.

This country has always been interested in preventing major industrial disasters and hazards, whether in the factory, through explosion, fire, or the dispersal of toxic and dangerous substances from a factory to affect the surrounding community.

I should declare an interest. I have a long-standing interest as a director of a chemical company and I am an adviser to the principal distributor in this country of liquefied petroleum gas, which is a hazardous product. I am also chairman of the all-party group on the chemical industry which has, appropriately, shown an all-party interest in the problems of an industry which deals in danger and hazards.

Our industry has a remarkably fine record. The Flixborough disaster happened at a weekend and the BBC rang me at home before contacting any Government spokesmen. I suppose that I was asked for an immediate comment because of my long interest in the industry.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) said that the regulations were not demanding enough. That is a matter for debate, but they set out a great deal with which manufacturers must comply. I am pleased that a comprehensive guide to the regulations has been issued by the Government and the Health and Safety Executive to help manufacturers to comply with the regulations.

The guide takes us through the regulations. That is helpful, because regulations are often written for Parliament and sometimes have to be interpreted subsequently by lawyers. The guide will help employers and employees in the industry to understand the regulations.

Regulation 7 sets out the safety case and requires manufacturers to ensure that the production, handling and storage of hazardous products ore safe. Manufacturers also have to identify any potential danger and confirm that they have provided appropriate safety controls at all stages, not only for those working in a plant, but for those in the immediate vicinity who could be put in danger if anything went wrong.

Regulation 8 is equally important, because it requires the Government and the HSE to ensure that safety measures are kept up to date. They also have to ensure that manufacturers are kept informed of the latest developments and information on products and manufacturing processes.

Regulation 9 gives the HSE the Dickensian opportunity of being able to ask for more if necessary. That is belt and braces, but, heaven knows, we should be asking for belt and braces when considering any major hazards in industry, whether inside or outside the factory. It is right that the regulations should be tough in that regard.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Is the hon. Gentleman confident that the regulations will dispel the real anxieties felt by communities within which such plants are situated? The people of Livingston, despite the high unemployment in the area, have rejected overwhelmingly Union Carbide's plans to set up a plant there. They have made their objections felt by way of the Livingston development corporation, which, in turn, has said that those developments will go no further.

Mr. Crouch: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. I shall develop a matter that he touched on — whether people outside the professional area of knowledge have a right to say that they are concerned. I believe that they have a right. That is why Parliament has that right this evening. That is why there is a continuing obligation on the Government and the Health and Safety Executive to continue that right of investigation and query. Through local authorities and Members of Parliament in the Chamber itself, the public must constantly inquire as to the wisdom of allowing an operation to continue in any place. We must be sure; we cannot take risks. I should like to refer to how I believe risks have sometimes been created by mistake on the part of not only manufacturers but local authorities.

Therefore, I can say, "So far, so good" about the three regulations that I have described. I accept them. We can be satisfied that we have satisfied Brussels, but that is not enough. Regulations, rules and codes of practice are fine in writing; fine for the lawyers, insurance agents and assessors after the event. They know where they stand. They are fine for the local authorities that will know whether they have made a mistake in controlling something. They are fine even for the manufacturers who will know whether they have abided by the regulations when there is a disaster or an accident. But are they good enough for us in Parliament? Are they good enough for the public outside? Are they good enough for the press as they watch for what might happen after any major accident and consider whether we could have been wiser?

I say to the Minister and the whole House that it is not so much what is written in these detailed regulations that matters, but it is how the regulations are operated and implemented that counts. We know in the chemical industry that all the fine rules about safety are only as good as the way in which they are operated—accurately and absolutely correctly. We know that danger exists in industry sometimes through human error, human laxity or carelessness. We must ensure that we do not allow laxity or carelessness to occur.

There is mention in the regulations of local authorities at both county and district level. They all have a responsibility to ensure that the manufacturing and storage operations that take place within their areas are satisfactory to them. Responsibility is laid on them. One responsibility is to ensure that in their planning they do not allow the wrong type of development to occur around the manufacture of certain products. That has happened in the past. There was housing development close to the border of Flixborough. That was obviously a mistake. We have had such problems. In Bhopal, for example, we saw how a great number of people were allowed to live right up to the factory perimeter, which was a tragic mistake in planning. Therefore, the local authority, as well as the manufacturer, has responsibility for observing the codes and regulations.

In a quite different area of activity, local authorities have allowed housing development up to the perimeter of major airports such as Heathrow. That must not continue. The danger is not so much the real risk of aircraft crashing as the noise and pollution caused by so much aircraft activity. There is also the cost of double glazing to diminish the effect of what is really an industrial activity. The local authority has a responsibility not to permit domestic housing development right up to the perimeter of industrial operations where there is any question of a hazard of the type described in the regulations.

I promised to be brief and this is my last word. I believe that these are good regulations. They satisfy Brussels, but for the House to be satisfied we must be sure that the Department and the Health and Safety Executive will be constantly vigilant to ensure that they are operated at the highest level of efficiency.

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): Like the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch), I must declare an interest as an official of the all-party group on the chemical industry. I also spent 20 years with ICI at the sharp end of industrial production in the chemical industry, so I know of the risks involved, whether the substance be toxic or non-toxic, inflammable or non-inflammable, explosive or non-explosive.

The regulations go as far as one can expect in the circumstances. The existing regulations have been built up over the years, and I assure the House that they are applied with as strict a discipline as they would be in the Armed Forces. That discipline is instilled into every employee of ICI and other large companies. If a person fails to accept that discipline, he will not last in the chemical industry.

He will do no good for himself or for the employer. With the current scale of industrial production in this country and chemical manufacture in Europe, it is essential to keep a sense of balance and to remember the human factor. We shall never entirely eliminate the risk of explosion or poisoning by chemical waste.

What disturbs me about the present regulations and also the proposed regulations is the somewhat blasé approach to cost. It costs the chemical industry a great deal of money to train people to the present high standards. That training continues relentlessly virtually every day of the year and it applies to all ranks, from the humble process worker to senior management. As I have said, anyone who does not accept that strict principle should not be in the chemical industry. Nevertheless, there is the possibility that the proposed regulations will be implemented without the necessary skills of inspection to ensure that they are effective and are carried out to the required standards. A financial commitment is to be imposed on an industry some sections of which are not making vast profits, on the Health and Safety Executive and on the local authorities.

How can we expect the local authorities to monitor the implementation of the regulations when the number of people employed in local authorities is being cut? I am thinking in particular of the fire services. The fire services are stretched to the limit now, and there are moves to cut them further. Yet it is the fire service in the main that will have to take the first emergency action if there is an incident. I know that the fire service is trained to the limit, in co-operation with the companies, to deal with any emergency at a plant. The House should not underestimate the superb quality of the training process or the skill of the fire officers in knowing how to react in an emergency.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): That point is of real importance and relevant to south Yorkshire, where there was recently a serious fire in consequence of which many firemen are still unwell and large quantities of asbestos were blown over my constituency and that of Rotherham.

If an industrial establishment is inadequately supervised and inspected in the first place, the hazards facing the fire service will be even greater.

Mr. Garrett: Of course I agree with my hon. Friend. I pay tribute to the south Yorkshire fire services, which in the past have been to the fore in co-operating with chemical plants in the area in joint training exercises.

I hope that the Minister will accept that, before the regulations are implemented, there must be adequate education of all parties involved to ensure that they fully understand them.

The large companies that run chemical plants tend to spend a great deal of money on education, and to get results. The same is true of medium-sized companies. However, I have some reservations about companies lower down the scale, especially where the storage of hazardous substances is concerned. I would not wish to stifle initiative or to frustrate the wish of any entrepreneur to establish a business in chemical manufacture or distribution. I believe, however, that the small operator in this sector of the industry should be given some financial encouragement to train his staff or to enable them to acquire the necessary knowledge of how to act in an emergency.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) is no longer in his place. [Interruption.] I am sorry. I see that my hon. Friend has merely shifted his position, as it were, somewhat to the right. My hon. Friend expressed some concern about the shop stewards. The trade unions in the larger companies of which I have knowledge, through the shop stewards, are fully informed about, and fully participate in, all training matters and in the exercises and emergency drills that take place almost every day.

The regulations are an improvement. When they are implemented, let us make sure that the three main parties concerned are determined that they will work and that the training and education takes place. If we do so, the British people will retain their confidence in the chemical industry.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): I wish to make five brief points. First, these regulations have been commended to Parliament by the Health and Safety Commission, which includes not only representatives of British industry through the CBI but also the TUC and local authorities.

Secondly, these regulations are not, as the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) seemed to imply, limited to only 250 sites. They relate to many more sites because they require the manufacturers of certain dangerous, explosive, flammable or toxic substances to provide evidence at any time that they have identified hazards, have taken adequate precautions to minimise their occurrence and have plans to reduce the consequences of any accidents. Therefore, the activating factor is not the site but the manufacture of certain dangerous substances. It is right that under the regulations certain sites with large inventories of dangerous substances have higher duties placed upon them, but to suggest that they relate to only 250 sites is to mislead the House.

Mr. Prescott: Of course not. This is a hand-out.

Mr. Baldry: It is not a hand-out. The hon. Gentleman and I both read the same magazines because we study this subject assiduously. If he turns to page 9 of this month's Health and Safety at Work, magazine, he will see that I am exactly right.

Thirdly, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) that no amount of regulation, however strict, will ever surpass self-regulation. It is clear that at all times those involved in the manufacture of chemicals have the highest possible self-regulation, both at company level and, as the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) said, among individual workers.

Fourthly, one must find a balance. It is inevitable that if further regulations are imposed on industry, a cost will have to be borne. There will be additional paperwork, and extra expenses will have to be met for emergency planning. Resources will consequently be diverted from other more productive activity, and at the end of the day the additional costs will be borne by the consumer. That is perfectly proper, but a balance must be found between that and the danger which one seeks to minimise or control. These regulations balance the sensible needs of good practice in industry in relation to on-site emergency plans, close liaison with the local emergency authority and emergency services, the control of major hazards and regular consultation with the local authority both on planning applications for new products and generally.

Fifthly, it may be suggested that these regulations should be taken in isolation. That is not so. These regulations and the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations, together with the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act itself, constitute a substantial code of law for the control of major hazard installations. Recent amendments to planning law have also meant that development projects involving a dangerous substance now require planning permission.

Further regulations — the Dangerous Substances (Notification and Marking of Premises) Regulations — are now under consideration. Taken as a whole they will ensure that any factory with more than 25 tonnes of a dangerous substance will have to notify that fact to the Health and Safety Executive. They afford substantial protection, and it is misleading to suggest that the regulations we are now discussing must be taken in isolation.

I notice that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East is now back in his place. If he looks at page 9 of this month's edition of Health and Safety at Work, he will see that it confirms my point that these regulations apply to considerably more than 250 sites.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): The regulations have the wrong title. They should be called "The Enormous Hazards Regulations" as there are no regulations for major hazards. The vast majority of hazardous plants in urban areas will not be affected by them.

Considerable disquiet is being expressed by the emergency services at the small amount of legislation to deal with these potentially dangerous hazards. The fire in Sheffield has already been mentioned, and this is an example of what can be considered as a hazard to the community in and around Sheffield. On the 14 December last year, a fire broke out in the National Carriers depot in Brightside lane, where 70 tonnes of chemcials were stored. It took 26 appliances and over 400 firemen to put the fire out. Over £10 million worth of damage was done. The hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) talked about the cost of these regulations, but the cost of the damage done in that fire, which lasted for six days, must also be taken into consideration.

I received a letter from the chief fire officer, and I shall quote it to show that the professional people are extremely concerned about the problems that they face with the lack of regulations. He says:

"The main causes for the amount of damage by the fire and the hazards to personnel undertaking necessary fire fighting operations are readily identified as follows.

1. (a) A delay in detection of the fire and subsequent call to the Fire Service occurred which allowed an uncontrolled fire to develop for at least 30 minutes.

(b) The fire separation between the various units within the building could not be assessed and could be regarded as nothing better than providing physical division between occupancies with the exception only of a single wall beyond which the fire was prevented from spreading.

(c) The undivided area between the roof lining and the structural roof which allowed ready passage of flames throughout the roofed area which caused its early collapse."

His next point is extremely important. He said:

"The building and the stored contents have not caused any existing legislation to be transgressed which suggests that fires and the problems created by them are considered reasonable."

He then set out a number of details that should be legislated on.

Similarly, the Sheffield council department of land and planning said:

"This building complied with the requirements of the Building Regulations and many of the elements of the structure stood up well to a fire of this severity. However, the rapid spread of flames created a situation which could only be controlled with great difficulty. An additional complicating factor was that chemicals were stored throughout the building in various areas."

There were about 70 tonnes of chemicals. These regulations would not have been effective in the case of that fire. It continues:

"In addition high risk chemicals should be stored in specially protected areas using materials with a fire resistance of at least two hours. External signs should be provided stating the nature of the chemicals stored in each area. These recommendations would allow for easier access to the source of the fire, contain the spread of flame, and provide time for the Fire Service to tackle the outbreak."

The effects of the fire have not yet been fully assessed, and we are still waiting for two further reports. The immediate effect was the closure of 31 schools in the area, because of the spread of asbestos, which was carried five miles downwind of the fire. The flakes of asbestos were in the main hand-sized, but in many cases were three to four times that size.

Great problems were experienced by the firemen because of the difficulty of identifying the stored materials. There was no inventory available to the fire service.

So far 100 firemen have been taken ill, and about 60 are still ill today. They have suffered from sore throats, headaches, chest pains and breathing difficulties. Doctors have already told two of the firemen that the mucus lining of their lungs has been stripped away.

Injuries have also been sustained by the public unit and planning staff. The principal building surveyor suffered from blisters on his arms and face. The senior building supervisor complained of chest pains and is now away from work with bronchial pneumonia. Those were the effects on the people involved in the fire.

With regard to the effects on the community, I quote from an article in the Morning Telegraph of 8 February:

"The number of patients visiting the doctor's surgery with throat and chest complaints increased by 50 per cent. after the £10 million warehouse fire at the nearby Brightside lane. The doctor who has his surgery in Upwell Street, off Brightside lane, reported up to 30 people at each of his surgeries compared to a normal maximum of 20. He said the visits lasted for a three-week period after the fire and patients said that the complaints were caused by the December fire in which chemicals stored at the warehouse were swept around the area in a massive smoke cloud. The effects of the fire have caused widespread concern, with people reporting cases of sickness, headaches and vomiting".

I do not know what is the definition of a major hazard. But in the light of case involving £10 million worth of damage, with 65 people still ill, and with 50 per cent. more people in the surrounding community reporting sick than would normally be expected in the period, I wonder what a major hazard is supposed to be. It is clear that the regulations now before the House would not have affected that situation.

Often the storage of chemicals in urban areas cannot be avoided, but where they are stored in densely populated areas, as in Sheffield, surely some precautions must be introduced. The regulations before the House would not cover those circumstances. I have spoken to the chief fire officer and the planning department in Sheffield about them. They have scrutinised the regulations and their professional advice is that the regulations would not affect such a warehouse as the one that I have mentioned. I hope that the Minister will clear up the matter, in view of what is being said by the chief fire officer and the planning department. The regulations do not, according to them, cover such a building as the National Carriers' warehouse in Sheffield, where the damage occurred.

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): Would my hon. Friend agree that what emerges from the regulations is a glaring anomaly in primary legislation? Under the Town and Country Planning Act 1971, planning permission is not needed when a warehouse that stores, for example, milk powder, is used for the storage of hazardous chemicals.

Mr. Caborn: That is absolutely clear. It is confirmed by the land and planning officer in Sheffield and by the chief fire officer and the other services.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) said, the regulations will cover only about 250 establishments, and many places within areas of high density population where dangerous chemicals are being stored will not be covered. On 6 February I asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he had any information "on the number of people downwind whose health was affected by asbestos or chemicals—or in any other way as a result of the fire on 14 December at a warehouse in Sheffield."

The Minister replied:

"This Department does not hold this information." —[Official Report, 6 February 1985; Vol. 72, c. 586.]

Thus, the Department apparently has no information about the biggest fire to occur in south Yorkshire for many years.

The Government have missed an opportunity to introduce legislation which could have allayed the genuine fears about the storage not only of chemicals but of other dangerous substances. The fire service can have difficulties in dealing with the cocktail of chemicals that are involved in a fire. That problem is not easy to resolve, but it would have been nice, and it would have removed some of the anxiety, if the Government had at least consulted those affected. If they had taken their advice, they might have proposed a much more all-embracing piece of legislation than that before us. I hope that the Opposition Front Bench will seriously consider voting against the regulations, because unless we do so, we shall not do justice to our people.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Until 1983 I was a health and safety at work officer and company secretary to BP Minerals, and I had to deal at first hand with the sort of problems that have been outlined in this interesting debate. It is unusual for me to thank the European Assembly for any directive, but these regulations appear to be helpful and accordingly I welcome them.

My own interest is with liquefied petroleum gas. In 1984, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State took part in a debate with me about the installation with regard to the Trocadero Shell service station in my constituency. Since then there have been additional fears, with a calor gas explosion at Desford, where several people lost their lives, and a leakage at Stoney Stanton. Therefore, the problem does not seem to be going away, and that is a matter of great concern to me.

Regulation 5 provides an excellent way of reporting exactly what has happened. Regulation 5(2) provides an ideal way of reporting on a major accident, and no one can be critical of that. Obviously any industrial installation will worry people. Consequently, the regulations, and particularly regulation 4, must be helpful. We know that industrial installations always involve risks. Things can go wrong with them. The wrong people may have been consulted prior to installation. But these regulations will encourage people to consult fully beforehand.

Contrary to what the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) said, the regulations will apply to more than 250 sites. For example, it must always be ensured that the site location is safe. Is it ideal, is it warranted, and is there a risk of a serious chemical leakage? Of course the storage of any hazardous substances must be a matter of concern, and the question of whether it is a serious danger to the surrounding community must be answered. Indeed, under these regulations it will be answered. The plans will have to be carefully drawn up. We shall have to ensure that the operation is both viable and safe. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister will confirm that that is the purpose of the regulations. Regulation 5 itemises what to do after an emergency, and that is very important and useful.

I pay tribute to the role of the Health and Safety Executive, which works hard to protect the community. One hon. Member doubted whether the local authorities would be able to handle conducting the executive if rate capping were introduced in parts of the country. That is an important matter. Allegations that rate capping will affect the Health and Safety Executive and its co-operation with local authorities is nonsense. We are talking about a priority and about hundreds of thousands of people in local communities. Scare tactics are unacceptable.

Mr. Garrett: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is referring to my speech or that by my hon. Friend on the Front Bench.

Mr. Bruinvels: I am referring to the speech by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn).

Mr. Garrett: In that case, my hon. Friend can answer for himself.

Mr. Bruinvels: I noticed that the hon. Gentleman was not doing that. The idea in the local authorities' plan about how such emergencies should be handled is helpful. I am reminded of the way in which the police operate at county level. The emergency rooms are always prepared, with telephone numbers and routing, to deal with an emergency. Close co-operation should be established with the police.

Dr. Godman: The people of Livingston have demonstrated definitively that we are dealing with a more critical public following Flixborough and the dreadful events there. The fears expressed in rejecting Union Carbide's plans to set up a plant are genuine. Does the hon. Gentleman believe that such fears will be dispelled by the implementation of the regulations.

Mr. Bruinvels: I am grateful for that intervention. If the hon. Gentleman had been here during my Adjournment debate on petroleum gas, he would have heard what I highlighted then. Serious anxiety existed at that time and the public need reassurance. The Flixborough experience was another anxiety and these regulations will quell, to an extent, those natural worries. I should not like to live beside the site decided for my constituency because of the element of risk. That is of great concern to me. The guidelines will cut out that risk—at long last. I hope that Opposition Members will join us in welcoming the regulations.

Local authorities must always be prepared. That is important. They must always consider the possibility of a major accident. I pray that accidents will not continue to happen, but that risk is always on the horizon.

Self-regulation is suggested as an alternative. All local authorities and local industrial concerns must do their utmost to protect the community, not only employees. They must protect people who have no choice but to live near an industrial site.

Canvey island is one of the most risky sites, but people choose to live there. They need protection and I am certain that they will be protected. The Health and Safety at Work etc Act has been honoured under the regulations—and will continue to be honoured. We need an active public education. The police, local authorities and fire services performed well in the Leicestershire incident, as they do throughout the country whenever a major explosion occurs. All the local services must co-operate. That is the best way.

It is up to hon. Members to inform their constituents when they visit local installations that the regulations will help. The guidance notes should be respected. They will make the installations and the local communities safer places in which to live. For that reason I have no hesitation in supporting the regulations.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): All accidents are frightening, and few more than those involving chemicals. We have only to glance through the regulations to see chemicals listed which most of us cannot even pronounce, let alone understand their uses or what may happen if they were subjected to heat or major pressure changes. I sometimes feel that the House is at its least adequate when discussing such technical matters. It is obvious that few of us know enough about the subject to make valid comments.

We are all floundering to find a solution to the problem, and we sometimes come near to mistaking bureaucracy for safety. If there is an accident, we do not need acres and acres of paper—we require someone with the relevant knowledge to be available within minutes. He will be the most valuable person in a disaster. That is the weakness of the regulations.

On the whole, the regulations apply to the larger installations. We know that if there was an accident on such a site in the United Kingdom the company involved could produce someone with the relevant knowledge. It probably employs a number of suitably qualified people. However, on the smaller sites where the amount stored is much less—perhaps a site in one of our villages or towns—I fear that there is a real hazard. Indeed, that has been shown during the past three or four years. In such a case not only will the paper not be produced, but the person with the knowledge will not be produced either.

Mr. Crouch: The hon. Gentleman's point about flying by the seat of one's pants is not really an answer to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) about a real disaster. A detailed professional statement about quantities of chemicals could be kept in certain areas.

Mr. Penhaligon: I accept that, and would welcome any regulations on that line. Whether the figures quoted are correct is beyond my competence to say. I saw the hon. Gentleman nod when I said that what we really need is someone with the relevant knowledge. The greatest service that the Government could offer to encourage confidence in our communities would be to ensure that within the Government there are a considerable number of independent people who have the knowledge, and are seen to have the knowledge. It is true that the Government cannot employ the number of chemists and experts employed by industry. However, anything that reduces the number of inspectors or their qualifications — which must be high to deal with some of the problems—would erode confidence, and confidence is as important as any other factor.

Does the Minister really believe that the regulations cover the small storage sites, and are the Government willing to invest enough in the Health and Safety Executive to produce sufficient people in every area of the country to know what to do when an accident occurs? There is no substitute for that skill when a disaster happens.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I recognise that it was impossible for all those who wished to speak in this debate to do so, and I am sure that the hon. Members for Gower (Mr. Wardell), for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) and for Barking (Ms. Richardson) would have contributed well to the debate.

In the light of today's tragedy in Germany, when 18 members of the band of RAF Germany died in a road accident caused by a spillage of aviation fuel, we must recognise that there are constant dangers around, not only on site but on roads. The House will wish to join me in expressing heartfelt sympathy to the families and colleagues of those who died.

As a matter of public interest, I should say that we take seriously the matter of safety on roads, taking the advice of the Health and Safety Commission. For example, the transport of dangerous substances in bulk by road is controlled by the Dangerous Substances (Conveyance by Road in Road Tankers and Tank Containers) Regulations 1981, which deal with such matters as the design and construction of vehicles, labelling, driver training, information to be carried and parking. Other regulations are in the pipeline, and I hope that the Health and Safety Commission will accept the recommendations of the advisory committee. It has set up a sub-committee on dangerous substances to study and report on such matters.

We are looking at a hierarchy of controls and trying to ensure that hazards and risks are reduced. I greatly welcome the comments of those hon. Members who have direct experience, including the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) and my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), who spoke with expertise not only of the industry but of the Health and Safety Executive. In considering the positive benefits from present arrangements on health and safety at work, in which the regulations will play a part, I place much emphasis on the close involvement of the Factory Inspectorate and other Health and Safety Executive inspectorates in giving guidance and advice to industry. There is a great fund of expertise in the Factory

Inspectorate; and 95 per cent. of inspectors' time when visiting factories is spent giving advice, information and guidance to employers. They should be seen as people whose expertise is of immense advantage to industry in ensuring that processes are safe and without risk to health.

I do not wish to fall out with the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) — [HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"]—because I suspect that I shall be having debates with him for several years, I hope with me remaining on the Government side of the House, and him remaining on the other side. But whatever our position in the House, we share a concern which has been well expressed today. If I cannot answer every point in detail, I shall write to hon. Members and ensure that the information they requested is passed on.

I shall spend no more than a moment on the July versus January point and the December edition. I have written to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East about it, and I draw his attention to the Official Journal of the European Communities of 5 August 1982, which gives the date of 8 July 1989. That date has been around for three years, and I hope the hon. Gentleman will accept that there was no intent——

Mr. Prescott: It is just that the Department was sloppy.

Mr. Bottomley: As the Minister responsible, I accept the blame, but it may have been the fault of Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

The hon. Gentleman talked about disclosure of information. The Health and Safety Commission is to issue a discussion document in March on the possible changes in the law on disclosure information, in response to a direct request from Ministers to review the law in this area. The hon. Gentleman seemed to imply that the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazardouss Regulations overtake and replace the Notification of Installations Handling Hazards Substances Regulations, which were introduced a few years ago, because there was doubt about whether the European Community would introduce its directive in time. They do not replace those regulations; they add to them.

Perhaps this could be a general answer to hon. Members who asked whether the CIMAH regulations cover small plants. The answer is that, in general, they do not. The regulations are designed to cover the most hazardous sites, where the consequences of disaster would be the worst. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) was right to say—he corrected the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East on this—that the CIMAH regulations are not a substitute for the other regulations in place, which may have been the flavour of what the hon. Gentleman said——

Mr. Prescott: They are not safety plans.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman will realise that these regulations cover only the 250 most dangerous sites, and that the other 1,600 sites will be covered by the NIHHS regulations as a second tier of sites. Other sites are covered by the normal Health and Safety at Work etc. Act provisions.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): How do the Government define a dangerous site? At the Anchor Chemicals plant in Manchester, only the expertise of the fire brigade averted a disaster. Under the Minister's criteria, that is a small site.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman raises a serious matter. I shall deal later with how the regulations and their implementation will be reviewed. We must always learn from disasters, accidents and incidents, whether at Manchester or Sheffield. No one is claiming that the regulations are the end of everything. However, it is important to recognise that they have come through from the Health and Safety Commission, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury has reminded the House, is a tripartite body which has the advice—I take up a point made by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon)—of advisory groups which bring together expertise. The regulations have, as far as possible, benefited from the advice of those who are the greatest experts. We have tried to put them in a form that will be understood by those who come new to an industry and by those who are confronted by circumstances that endanger those at work and their neighbours. That is the way in which the regulations have come before the House for consideration and, I hope, for approval. The role of safety committees is laid down in health and safety at work legislation and there is no need to add to that in the regulations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) spoke with direct expertise of matters underlying the regulations. The circular issued by the Department of the Environment gave guidance to local authorities on the need to consult the Health and Safety Executive about developments near hazardous sites.

The hon. Member for Wallsend has direct experience from ICI. He asked for a sense of balance and reinforced the importance of the human factor.

Under the regulations, local authorities will be able to charge for the work that they undertake in developing off-site plans. This will be a major new responsibility for the authorities. The Health and Safety Executive will give high priority to their work in that area. Industry may be under pressure in terms of cost, but it is its responsibility to achieve safety and I am sure that it will discharge it. The role of trade unions is a valuable one, through safety representatives, and it is well known that the Government, like their predecessors, devote considerable resources to this matter.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury for reinforcing the point that the regulations are not to be taken in isolation. He advanced a vivid argument in saying that no amount of imposed regulations will surpass self-regulation. I hope that both forms of regulation will work together.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) spoke about the fire at Sheffield and experience in the area. I hope that he will forgive me if I respond to his comments by writing to him. We are determined to learn lessons from the fire. I am sure that the Home Office and the fire service will pay serious attention to the remarks of the chief fire officer.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield Hillsborough): When the inquiry takes place, is there any possibility of testing the long-term hazards of such a fire? It is obvious that some firemen have been exposed to asbestos and it is more than likely that some in the area will die from asbestosis. An inquiry into the long-term hazards needs to be undertaken.

Mr. Bottomley: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hardy: And to all south Yorkshire Members?

Mr. Bottomley: To all south Yorkshire Members, if I can. Many issues have been raised that are not covered directly by the regulations. In trying to reply to the debate I have had to omit some of the points that I wanted to make overall.

The hon. Member for Truro, with his usual robust good sense, made sure that we would not try to substitute bureaucracy for safety. The guide to the regulations and the consultation paper show that our aim is to create greater safety by getting individuals to anticipate the worst thing that may happen to them, to look for the safety approach and to try to ensure that it does not happen. Nothing is perfect——

Dr. Godman: As in Livingston.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman has intervened twice on Livingston, but I do not think that it is for me to say much about the issue that concerns him, especially given the recent news about Livingston and the proposed plant.

I am pleased that the House has had the opportunity to debate these important regulations, which in my view and that of the Health and Safety Commission, as well as that of the Community, mark a major step forward in the development of a comprehensive system in Britain for the control of hazards at industrial plants. It is an important subject and recent events have concentrated our minds on the terrible hazards that exist.

We have in the regulations and in the wider system of controls of which they are a part of a powerful armoury of weapons to ensure not only that the consequences of an incident are as small as possible but that the chances of an incident occurring are minimised. For many reasons, the world, including the Third world, needs the products of the chemical industry. Without those products our quality of life and expectation of life would be much less. Without such products we would have less clean water and vastly reduced food supplies, and we would be at the mercy of the many illnesses and diseases which can be controlled by the use of pharmaceuticals. It is important to realise that there is a need for the chemical industry and that we cannot just wish away many of that industry's developments, although we can do our best to eliminate avoidable risks and, when there is a disaster, to ensure that the consequences are reduced as much as possible.

This has been a good debate. It has been illuminated by the many shared objectives. I hope that we shall be able to ensure that the chemical sites make good neighbours. The CIMAH regulations help towards meeting that objective.

It being half-past Eleven o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question pursuant to Standing Order No. 4 (Prayers against Statutory Instruments, &c. (negative procedure)).

Teachers (Scotland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lang.]

11.42 pm

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I make no apology for prefacing my speech with a criticism of the Secretary of State for failing to take this opportunity to make a statement to Parliament on an issue of such gravity to Scotland.

I do not doubt the Under-Secretary's ability to put the Government's case, but it is a tradition that the Secretary of State replies to Adjournment debates on issues of major national significance. I hope that the Under-Secretary will explain the reasons for the Secretary of State's absence, so that we can judge whether he has treated the teachers, Scotland and Parliament with contempt.

The crisis in Scotland's schools is the outcome of years of frustration in the teaching profession at the Government's educational policies. Successive years of cuts in spending on Scotland's schools are now having a serious effect on the quality of education. Falling school rolls should have enabled us to improve the range of opportunities for our children. Instead, we have had the three blackest years in Scottish education.

National and local spokespersons for the Conservative party may convince some people with their propaganda that we cannot afford a decent state education system, but teachers and others know that the Government found thousands of millions of pounds for the Falklands campaign, are finding thousands of millions of pounds in their struggle against the National Union of Mineworkers, and plan to spend over £10,000 million on a new nuclear weapons system. It is a question of priorities; if the Government wanted to do so, they could find the £100 million or so that is needed for Scotland's schools.

The vast majority of our teachers are dedicated to their work. They want the best for our children. It is no use the Government harping on about pupil-teacher ratios. Even the Under-Secretary's predecessor acknowledged that making cuts in teacher numbers proportionate to falling rolls would necessitate a decline in standards. I say, "Even the hon. Gentleman's predecessor" because the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North, as he was then, now Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher), used to make speeches that attracted the headlines, "Lothian a disgrace". When one read the report, one found that Lothian was a disgrace because it was spending more per pupil than any other authority in Scotland. It had the best pupil-teacher ratio. Things have changed with a vengeance in Lothian. We are suffering a massive cut in education opportunities in our schools as a consequence of the policies of the Lothian regional council. The position throughout Scotland is severe as a result of the lack of resources, especially a lack of the additional resources that are required for the new standard grade curricula.

Teachers' salaries have now fallen well behind the standards set by the Houghton committee. Any objective comparison of the movement of teachers' earnings with average earnings in general or the average earnings of non-manual workers puts that beyond dispute. To compare teachers with other public sector groups that have suffered under the Government or to take as the base year for comparison the position immediately prior to the Clegg committee award is specious, and Ministers know it.

[Mr. Gavin Strang]

Perhaps the main reason for the teachers' anger is the deterioration in their conditions of work. Last November, the Secretary of State received the Scottish joint negotiating committee working party report on teachers' workload. Let me quote some of the important conclusions in that report. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone) scoffs, but the report was agreed by both teaching union and management representatives. I should like to quote some of the conclusions which, I emphasise, the Secretary of State received last November. The first conclusion that I should like to quote is:

"a significant change in the nature and extent of teachers' work content and workload has taken place and continues to take place".

The second conclusion that I should like to quote is:

"the changes are fundamental, progressive and . . . once complete, they will result in a higher level of workload than before".

Another conclusion is:

"the effect of these changes, in circumstances of limited resources in terms of teaching staff, support staff, equipment and materials, has been to place increasing demands upon the personal contribution, personal commitment and personal time of teaching staff".

And another conclusion is:

"the cumulative effect of the changes, pressures of work and lack of recognition is undermining the morale of the teaching workforce".

In preparation for today's debate, I visited Portobello secondary, the largest secondary school in my constituency. I was very impressed by the stance taken by the teachers, but I was particularly impressed by the enormity of the additional hours of work that teachers have had to cope with to prepare the new curricula for the standard grade courses.

In view of the teachers' concern about the deterioration in their conditions of work as documented by the working party report, it was disgraceful that the Secretary of State put forward a proposal in December that the Scottish joint negotiating committee should carry out an internal pay and conditions review with a remit to reduce rather than improve conditions of service. I hope that Ministers are under no illusions about the depth of feeling among our teachers in Scotland at this time. Surely the result of the most recent ballot by the Educational Institute for Scotland, when there was an overwhelming vote in favour of boycotting documentation and procedures connected with the Scottish Certificate of Education examinations in 1985, made some impact on Ministers.

Like most hon. Members here today, I attended last week's meeting of teachers' representatives from all over Scotland. These people were not EIS activists but teachers from parts of Scotland where there is no tradition of militancy and certainly none in the teaching profession. The reality is that thousands of teachers who would hardly have contemplated this kind of action a few years ago are now doing so because they believe that the Government are influenced only by this type of action. Year in and year out their representatives have campaigned and made representations but the Government have totally failed to respond.

Teachers are concerned about their salaries and conditions of work, but they are also frustrated at the lack of resources and the conditions now prevailing in the schools. I hope that the Government realise that their present stance will not succeed. They will not be able to ride this out on the basis of what is currently on the table. It is not a matter of the leadership of the EIS or the other unions out in front leading their members into action. It is the opposite. The leaders are responding to massive and still growing pressure for action to halt the attack on Scotland's teaching profession and on standards in our schools. The anger and despair among teachers is probably more widespread now than ever before. Individuals for whom industrial action was anathema a few years ago are now convinced that it is the only way to influence the Government.

The halting of curriculum development for third-year pupils following courses for the new standard grade certificate is now seriously damaging their future prospects. I hope that the Minister will comment on that, because although there has been a great deal of publicity about the action in Ministers' constituencies the most serious aspect of the industrial action is the threat to pupils who have embarked on phase 1 of the new certificate. Most schools have run out of materials and there is no authentication of new materials. Those pupils are in a no man's land, not knowing whether they are to press ahead with the new curriculum to be assessed for examination in the fourth year or whether they are to revert to O-levels.

It is not just a matter of the damage to children's education. There is widespread anxiety among pupils and parents that the grade and qualification that they will obtain will be seriously impaired as a result of the present situation. [Interruption.] Conservative Members seem to regard that as some kind of indictment of the teachers' case, but it is nothing of the kind. It is a reflection of the strength of feeling of professional teachers who have been driven to this action.

The Secretary of State has always known that his suggestion of an internal review with a remit to reduce teachers' conditions of service is utterly unacceptable. The teachers' request for an independent pay review has overwhelming support, and it is fair and reasonable. It is high time that the Government made a positive response.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) for making it clear that he intended no personal criticism of me in his opening remarks, but I found his comments about my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State both spurious and bogus. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] This Adjournment debate is being handled in entirely the normal way. I assure the House that my right hon. Friend is deeply concerned, as is the whole House, about the situation in Scottish education. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State personally met the unions and the management side before he reached a decision on the request for a review. That is why, immediately there was a request from the Scottish Joint Negotiating Committee, he agreed to another meeting. That meeting took place on 28 January.

I note that the hon. Members for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) and Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), who represent the Scottish Opposition on education matters, are in their places. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East has referred purely to pay. It is important to clarify the position. Opposition Members originally signed an early-day motion on pay and conditions of service. The teacher unions have never asked for an independent review of pay and conditions of service.

Mr. Strang: It is true that the title of the debate refers to the teachers' claim for an independent pay review, but I made it obvious in my speech that I was talking about pay and conditions.

Mr. Stewart: That is an important point. I understand that that view is shared by the Opposition Front Bench. The point is crucial at this stage of the negotiations with the SJNC.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): The Minister is seeking to make clear the Government's position on pay and conditions. The Secretary of State has said to the teacher unions that he is prepared to discuss conditions provided that the outcome, in terms of pay, is within the Government's economic policy. In other words, the Secretary of State will make teachers' conditions worse, in exchange for a pay increase of, say, 3 per cent. That is simply not acceptable.

Mr. Stewart: No, that is not the position at all. We are not insisting on any absolute conditions, as I hope to make clear.

As always, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East made a calm speech. However, it is important to distinguish between two key issues—sympathy with the desire of teachers for better pay, and the attitude of hon. Gentlemen towards the current action by teachers.

I can, of course, understand the first concern. I am myself the son of a teacher. However, it is a distortion of reality to reserve sympathy for teachers prepared to take extreme action rather than for their victims. The action is unprecedented in a number of important respects, notably in relation to examinations and certainly in the fact that sustained action has been taken against the education of pupils who happen to live in the constituencies represented by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and by my hon. Friends who are members of the Government. On a sustained basis, such action is unprecedented in the history of the trade union movement in Britain or elsewhere.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) rose——

Mr. Stewart: Not only is it immensely damaging, but it has the most serious implications, because it is action that can in theory be repeated at will by the teachers or by any other trade union.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East raised a number of general questions about expenditure on education. That is not strictly the subject of the debate. However, expenditure per pupil in Scotland, in money terms and in real terms, is higher than ever before. It is also true that pupil-teacher ratios are better than ever before.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart) rose——

Mr. Stewart: Let me set out the current position of the respective parties. The teachers believe they have a grievance which they want to be resolved only by an independent pay review. My right hon. Friend did not turn down that request out of hand. On the contrary, he made the reasonable and constructive suggestion that the Scottish joint negotiating committee for teaching staff in school education should itself carry out a review of pay and conditions of service together.

Mr. Foulkes rose——

Mr. Stewart: This body, set up by Parliament, was established in 1982 with the statutory responsibility for precisely those areas.

Mr. Foulkes rose——

Mr. Stewart: I have already given way twice—[Interruption.]

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for hon. Members, during an Adjournment debate, to heckle the Minister in the way that some hon. Members are doing now?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): It is very clear that the Minister is not giving way.

Mr. Foulkes rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to resume his seat. It is clear that the Minister is not giving way.

Mr. Stewart: I have, Mr. Deputy Speaker, already given way twice.

The Scottish joint negotiating committee has both teachers and employers among its members. It therefore has the necessary experience and expertise to undertake a review. There is no case for passing the responsibility for making recommendations to a body with no responsibility for implementing them.

The SJNC was established recently by Parliament, and its remit covered both pay and conditions of service, but so far it has not conducted the kind of review which is now suggested.

My right hon. Friend and I met both sides of the Committee on 28 January at their request. At that meeting we stressed that we would be prepared to consider a pay and conditions of service package on its merits. If it were sufficiently attractive, we agreed to undertake the very difficult task of re-ordering our existing spending priorities to provide additional finance. We would, of course, expect education authorities to make their contribution, too, and I do not pretend for a moment that any such re-ordering of priorities would be other than extremely difficult.

At that meeting the management side accepted the good faith of the Government's intentions and agreed that a review of the kind that we suggested represented a reasonable way forward. It appreciated, I think, that a guarantee in advance that the outcome would be funded in full was not feasible. Obviously, my right hon. Friend could not give such an undertaking before he knew what any package contained.

Subsequently, I was heartened—as I hope all hon. Members were—by the news that the teachers' side was willing to consider the proposals for a review of pay and conditions of service outlined by the management side at the last SJNC meeting on Thursday. I hope that that expression is widely shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House. I hope that at the further meeting this Friday the teachers' side will come back with a constructive response from its membershipa to what the management side proposed. I am sure that it offers an acceptable way forward.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East mentioned the teachers' perception of the heavy demands made by the job, and no one has ever sought to deny these perceptions, although the report to which he referred had an absence of quantification of burdens. Nobody denies the pressures that effective and worthwhile curriculum development can bring, at least in the critical stages. Equally, I hope that nobody denies the facts of a 32½ hour working week and 12 weeks' holiday a year, which represents some acknowledgement of the strains of the job.

This brings me to the real stumbling block between the parties—conditions of service. Recently, and here I am answering specifically the point put to me by the hon. Member for Falkirk, East, certain duties which were always regarded as part and parcel of a teacher's job have come to be regarded more as optional extras than indispensable elements. The Government want to achieve much greater clarity of definition about the work of the modern teacher. For example, parents have a right to know whether attendance at parents' evenings is purely voluntary or a firm commitment.

We are not insisting on any absolute conditions. We have simply pointed out the main uncertainties, which we think should be clarified, and the points which need to be covered. I am convinced that we need to move as quickly as possible to a state of affairs where all parties know exactly what is expected of them. That must be in everybody's interest—parents, pupils and, not least, the teachers themselves. It is surely a reasonable expectation of an established negotiating body that these areas should be clarified in conjunction with any consideration of pay.

I hope that I have demonstrated to the House that the Government have responded in a genuinely constructive way. Against that background, it saddens me to see how the trade unions are exacting a savage penalty from pupils who have committed no conceivable offence.

Mr. Foulkes: The Minister referred to pupils who are innocent in this dispute. My son is one of them—he is affected on three days a week at the Kyle academy. The Minister knows that I have written to the Secretary of State suggesting a possible way forward, but I have had no reply. Is it not about time that the Secretary of State looked at possible ways of conciliation in this dispute, because there are ways in which the dispute can be resolved? The Secretary of State should not be digging in as he is, and seeing the teachers unions digging in on the other side. As there are ways forward, will the Secretary of State and the Minister seriously consider them?

Mr. Stewart: We have suggested a way forward. I have read the hon. Gentleman's letter, and he will shortly receive a reply to it from my right hon. Friend.

Let us look at some of the actions which the EIS is taking, which go way beyond its response in previous disputes. The action in the constituencies of my right hon. and hon. Friends who are members of the Government is not the action of a professional body. I hope that there will be an early return to professional pride and scruples before the damage inflicted on these pupils is irretrievable. That kind of action, apart from being damaging, is completely pointless.

I was asked about the attack on the standard grade examinations for 14 to 16 year-olds—an attack which strikes at our attempts, fully supported by the education profession, to provide better and more relevant teaching which will help positively to equip youngsters of all abilities for adult life. It is particularly damaging for those pupils who are now being taught the four phase 1 standard grade subjects — English, mathematics, science and social and vocational skills. We have made it clear that those courses should continue. I have asked the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities to make a careful assessment of the situation and to advise us urgently on what further measures might be taken to ensure satisfactory provision for third-year pupils who are being affected by the action.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East referred to the threatened disruption of examination procedures — for example, the withholding of the forms putting candidates forward for SCE examinations or the orders of merit which provide a ranking of candidates' expected abilities. The absence of the orders of merit is particularly unfair; without them candidates who do not perform to their true ability for compassionate, health or other reasons may not have enough evidence for an appeal against their mark. I am happy to be able to report to the House that on the latest figures there is evidence that many teachers are showing a sense of personal responsibility by not boycotting the examination procedures. I am told that by today about 80 per cent.—120,000 out of 150,000—of the forms for putting candidates forward for the exams had come to the board, and that two thirds of the marks for modern languages oral examinations had been received by the Scottish Examination Board.

The board is also discussing with the Scottish Universities Council on Entrance what account universities can take of lower performance than expected by candidates for entrance.

My message to hon. Members in all parts of the House is to think long and hard about the fundamental issues at stake in the dispute. I hope that all hon. Members will use their influence to press teachers in their own constituency to give the management side proposals within the SJNC a fair chance. I do not ask Labour Members necessarily to support the Government, but these proposals from the management side represent a reasonable way forward. I hope that we get a package to consider and that we shall get it as soon as possible. We shall consider it on its merits in the interests of everyone concerned with Scottish education.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SERVICES

Civil Defence

1. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has had any meetings with the Royal College of Nursing to discuss civil defence matters; and what progress was made.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): A preliminary draft of revised guidance to health authorities on civil defence planning was sent to the Royal College of Nursing last July. The college made a number of helpful comments which were discussed at a recent meeting between officials and representatives of the college.

Mr. Bowden: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. When does he intend to publish the revised civil defence plans HD 771?

Mr. Patten: We are still discussing with the Royal College of Nursing and the British Medical Association the detailed provisions of the guidance. We hope to publish it as soon as it is available.

Mr. Meadowcroft: How far will it differentiate between attempting to pretend that there is a possibility of civil defence in a nuclear disaster as opposed to the proper need for civil defence in a non-nuclear disaster?

Mr. Patten: It will be a realistic document and we are having realistic discussions with both bodies.

Mr. Stern: In view of the extremely varied capability of the Soviet bloc in terms of biological and chemical weapons, has my right hon. Friend considered the need for isolation fever units in various parts of the country in relation to civil defence matters and whether these should be expanded, or at least maintained?

Mr. Patten: The Government are firmly committed to civil preparedness in time of emergency in warfare, whether conventional or nuclear. The National Health Service must play its part in that civil preparedness and we keep the need for facilities such as those to which my hon. Friend refers constantly under review.

Limited List Prescribing

2. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received on his proposals to limit the prescription of certain drugs.

6. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further representations he has received regarding the Government's proposals to limit the list of drugs available on National Health Service prescriptions.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): I am now considering the results of the consultation, following my announcement in the House in November, together with the advice of the group of independent experts consulted by my Chief Medical Officer. I hope to make a statement on the final list shortly.

Mr. Fisher: Do not all those representations, including those by the experts, tell the Secretary of State that he is creating two National Health Services, one for those who can pay and one for those who cannot? Is he not saying to people who have confidence in the drugs that they are using and who find that those drugs suit them and work for them that he knows best and that he will prescribe different drugs for those who cannot afford to pay? Will he now take away his prescription for those people and reconsider his proposals?

Mr. Fowler: No, I will not do that. Nor have we any intention of introducing a two-tier system. I have a responsibility to provide proper and sufficient drugs, and that responsibility I shall fulfil. That is why if we find a branded drug that cannot be replaced it will remain, but I ask the House to await my statement on the subject.

Mr. Yeo: Will my right hon. Friend condemn the tactics that appear to have been used by certain sections of the medical profession in attempting to frighten some of their patients — especially elderly patients — into believing that certain essential preparations will no longer be available under the NHS?

Mr. Fowler: The tactics employed in that campaign both by the profession and at times by the association that purports to represent the industry reflect no credit on either body. My frank advice to both would be to cool it and to await the statement. They will then find that many of the fears that they have raised are groundless.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Is the Secretary of State not aware that there is much genuine concern, especially among older patients, that they will be denied the drugs to which they have hitherto had access? Does he not realise that he could have avoided all this trouble if he had gone through the normal processes of adequate consultation before announcing the change?

Mr. Fowler: With great respect, we have been consulting since November——

Mr. Fisher: Nonsense. Not with the BMA.

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) says "Not with the BMA". That is because the BMA has decided that it does not wish to consult. That is therefore a somewhat ridiculous statement, even from the hon. Gentleman's point of view.

I put it to the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) that the Labour party has a policy of indiscriminate generic substitution.

Mr. Fisher: Rubbish.

Mr. Fowler: That was certainly the policy until a few weeks ago. If there has been another change, I am sure that the House would be pleased to hear what the policy is now. On this whole subject the Opposition have no credibility whatsoever.

Mrs. Jill Knight: Will my right hon. Friend note that many hon. Members join the Royal College of Surgeons, the Royal College of Physicians and the pharmacists in their full support for producing a limited list and putting an end to the enormous waste of drugs in the NHS? Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that the money saved will be spent elsewhere in the NHS?

Mr. Fowler: Yes, I can give that assurance. Until now, I had always assumed that it was common ground between both sides of the House that we wanted to reduce the NHS drugs bill. Opposition Members talk about it, but they do not come forward with any proposals.

Mr. Donald Stewart: The agreement with the BMA that generic drugs should be used in place of the same drugs bearing expensive branded names is regarded as sensible. At the same time, however, will the Secretary of State adhere to the principle that doctors must be free to prescribe what they think is best for the patient?

Mr. Fowler: In my statement, I shall consider such points. The Government stand firmly by the principle and the approach that I have already set out, but, clearly, I do not want to close the door on any reasonable suggestions —and suggestions have been made, both by doctors and by hon. Members, that we will wish to consider.

Sir John Wells: Homoeopathic medicine provides, at one-tenth or one-thousandth of the cost, remedies that are for the most part wholly satisfactory to the patients. Will my right hon. Friend take that on board, and also the fact that the BMA thoroughly dislikes it?

Mr. Fowler: I have no proposals for a limited list in homoeopathic medicine. I know that my hon. Friend intends to give me a teach-in on the subject, to which I look forward with eagerness.

Mr. Madden: In the light of recent events, was it wise for the advisers on this issue to be requested to sign the Official Secrets Act? Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to publish the advice and representations that he receives? If the overwhelming message that he has received by the end of the consultation process is that this is an undesirable attempt to introduce a two-tier NHS, will he undertake to withdraw the proposals altogether?

Mr. Fowler: No. We shall act on the advice that we are given. That is the whole purpose of setting up a team of independent outside experts to advise me. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to await my statement.

Sir Dudley Smith: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, because of the confusion and anxiety that has been caused, there is a strong feeling that the limited list ought to be for consultation? Will he introduce it as a list for consultation before bringing forward a statutory instrument?

Mr. Fowler: I am aware that my hon. Friend has a close knowledge of these matters. I made an announcement to the House in November on how we were proceeding and I invited consultations and representations then. At some stage the House must reach a decision. The history of limiting the cost of drugs in the NHS during the past 10 or 20 years has been one of Governments evading action and simply using words. The Government intend to take action. I hope that that action will be reasonable and carry the support of my hon. Friend. The time has come for decisions.

Mr. Kennedy: Why does the Secretary of State not adopt the approach laid down in the Greenfield report, which would allow generic substitution with medical consent? Will he consider extending membership of the Acheson committee, which is advising him inter-departmentally, to take on board people in the medical profession who have shown a willingness to try to improve or move towards the generic system which both sides of the House want?

Mr. Fowler: I am not sure that both sides of the House want the type of indiscriminate generic substitution that the Greenfield committee suggested. The industry would regard such a proposal as damaging to its interests, as it would affect research-based jobs. The hon. Gentleman and his party must take that on board. With regard to the independent committee, the hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension. Members of the committee are not what he regards as an inter-departmental committee of civil servants but doctors, pharmacists and people from universities. They are from outside government. Their examination has finished and I do not intend to extend it.

Mr. Galley: Although much of the debate has rightly concentrated on the unscrupulous activities of a minority of doctors, does my right hon. Friend share my anxiety about the effect on pharmacists? Is he able to give us some assurances about compensation for stock losses?

Mr. Fowler: I am aware of my hon. Friend's interest in this matter. Pharmacists and their stocks will be considered in the statement. I understand, however, that many pharmacists broadly support the Government's action.

Mr. Meacher: As the Secretary of State's bungling of the issue has been so ham-fisted as to turn off the British Medical Association and the Government's standing medical advisory committee, will he now at least have the grace to recognise that a limited list is acceptable only if doctors agree that it covers the full range of clinical needs——

Mr. John Patten: What is Labour's policy?

Mr. Meacher: This is our policy. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the limited list is acceptable only if it includes generic substitutes whenever possible, if it applies in the private sector as well as in the NHS, if it is not implemented over-rigidly and if it is subject to regular review by a qualified, representative and independent body that represents all of the relevant interests? Does he or does he not accept those criteria?

Mr. Fowler: No, I do not accept those criteria. First, because the Labour party's policy—[HON. MEMBERS: "What about the Government's policy?"] With respect, the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) asked me to comment on the policy that he has just put forward. That policy would do immense damage to the industry and would be opposed by the research-based industry. No Government want that. Secondly, if the hon. Gentleman believes so firmly in this policy why, when in government, did his party do absolutely nothing about the drugs bill? Thirdly, the hon. Gentleman is utterly inaccurate about the advisory committee. Three of the royal colleges support our policy. The Government are acting, and all the Opposition are good for is words and hot air.

Wrightington Hospital, Lancashire (Children's Ward)

3. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to make a definitive statement on the future of the children's ward at Wrightington hospital, Lancashire.

Mr. John Patten: We have not been able to agree to the region's proposal for closure. A decision will not be made until we are satisfied that any revised proposals bring clear benefits to patients.

Mr. Atkins: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's welcome assurance that the children's rheumatological unit will not be broken up at Wrightington hospital. Will he give a further assurance that if the feasibility study into transferring that unit to, for example, the Royal Preston hospital is not a success, the obvious answer will be to retain a ward with a small number of beds at Wrightington hospital? Does he recognise how urgent the matter is, bearing in mind the time that it has taken to reach a decision, and the fact that people do not know what the future holds?

Mr. Patten: For the avoidance of doubt, I should not want my hon. Friend to think that I had said anything other than what I have just said, which will be recorded in Hansard. That is the extent of my assurances. The regional health authority, the district health authority and the Department will consider carefully all proposals for the welfare of the children who are now being cared for in that ward in that hospital.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: Will my hon. Friend recall that the interest in the future of the Wrightington ward is wider than the area immediately around Wrightington and the north-west because its distinction attracts children from other parts of the country? Will he bear in mind that it is undesirable to break up the successful team there, which is producing good, positive results?

Mr. Patten: I am aware of the excellent care that that ward has given to one of my hon. Friend's constituents. I shall certainly bear in mind everything that he has to say when making the difficult decisions that need to be taken about the future welfare of the children cared for there.

Cystic-fibrosis (Manchester)

4. Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the future of treatment for cysticfibrosis sufferers at the Royal Manchester children's hospital.

Mr. John Patten: Salford health authority is considering improving services for cystic-fibrosis sufferers and other patients at the Royal Manchester children's hospital by altering the present ward arrangements. I am aware of the hon. Member's concern. If the health authority decides to press ahead with those proposals, it will consult locally.

Mr. Carter-Jones: I express gratitude to the Minister for his reply, but will he say how wide-ranging the consultations will be? In view of the national importance of the hospital, will he give a firm assurance that the decison will be made on medical grounds, not on the basis of administrative expediency?

Mr. Patten: The decision will be taken on medical grounds and in the best interests of the patients at present being served in the hospital. Consultation will be according to the well laid down pattern for consultation, with the local community and the community health council.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Is the Minister aware that parents of children and staff in the affected ward at that hospital are worried about a possible break-up of the specialist teams and their skills, which have been built up for the treatment of cystic-fibrosis? Is he further aware that as it is a regional service — my constituents, for example, use it — the decision should not be in the hands of Salford district, but should more properly be shared equitably throughout the region?

Mr. Patten: Obviously, the regional health authority is considering the region-wide implications of proposals such as this which may be made in that hospital. We have been assured by the district health authority, which so far has made only possible proposals, that the treatment will simply be carried out in different parts of the hospital, and at the same level and largely by exactly the same staff as previously.

Mr. Sumberg: Is my hon. Friend aware that the matter causes widespread anxiety in all parts of Greater Manchester, including my constituency? Will he give an undertaking that if these proposals are implemented they will be kept under constant review, and that if they do not work, the decision can be reversed?

Mr. Patten: We would not permit any decision to alter the use of the ward, or to transfer patients from one ward to another, if we did not think that it was in the best interests of the young patients who are being helped in that ward.

Mr. Terry Lewis: The change that Salford health authority is considering is that a seven-day ward should be reduced to a five-day care ward. That is based on experience in recent months of similar changes in a surgical ward. However, the treatment of children with cystic-fibrosis is wholly different from the treatment of children in surgical wards. Many Opposition Members are desperately keen for the regional health authority to have a say in this and to make sure that any changes will be for the benefit of the children — [HON. MEMBERS: "Question."] Although the yobbos on the Conservative Benches may not like it, it has been said.

Mr. Patten: My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health has written to the regional health authority about this matter following a meeting that he had shortly before Christmas with interested local Members of Parliament.

NHS (Expenditure Plans)

5. Mrs. Roe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services by how much, in real terms, the Government's spending plans for the National Health Service in the next three years have increased since 1979, and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): Expenditure on the NHS is planned to increase on average by 1 per cent. a year in real terms during the next three years. By the end of the period expenditure on the NHS would be about 24 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1978-79.

Mrs. Roe: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for his reply. Have the Government made any real cuts in capital expenditure on the National Health Service?

Mr. Clarke: I am glad to say that capital expenditure is about 16 per cent. higher than it was under the Labour Government. The only Government who have cut the capital programme of the NHS and delayed new hospital building were the Labour Government in 1976.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is it not dangerous to rely on national figures in the face of obvious shortages of staff and resources at local level? How much of the increase is taken up by the justifiable reduction in nurses' hours of work?

Mr. Clarke: The increase in nursing staff must reflect in part the changes in nurses' hours, but there has still been an absolute increase in the number of nurses. We also have increased demands on the budget. Nevertheless, the increased expenditure is real and is shown best by the way in which we now treat 650,000 more inpatients each year than the figure that was achieved during the last year of the Labour Government.

Mr. Butterfill: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that his admirable pursuit of value for money in the Health Service will not lead him to put at risk the section of the population which receives blood transfusions? I understand that the output of the National Blood Products Laboratory at Elstree is inadequate fully to supply heat-treated factor VIII, which guards against the AIDS virus. Will he allow imported products to bypass the usual licensing procedures so that such supplies can be made available immediately, and so that we need not wait until April, when the Elstree laboratory will be able to supply them all?

Mr. Clarke: We are investing more than £30 million in Elstree to make Britain self-sufficient in blood products as quickly as possible. Some imported heat-treated factor VIII is already coming into the country, and Elstree is about to start manufacturing that product. We must ensure that no infected factor VIII is given to haemophiliacs, and we shall spare no expense and effort to do so.

Mr. Meacher: Is it not true that, as a percentage of gross national product, the NHS has had less spent on it this year than was spent on it five years ago? If the NHS is properly funded, why is it that this year more premature babies are being turned away from intensive care, that the death rate has increased because of a lack of renal dialysis for kidney patients, that there are growing delays for patients awaiting heart surgery, that there is lack of provision for drug addicts and for hypothermia, that geriatric wards are being closed and that there is a breakdown of the emergency bed service in London? Does that suggest an improving service?

Mr. Clarke: The proportion of gross national product spent on the Health Service has increased from 4·8 to 5·6 per cent. under this Government. It is unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman should have listed the parts of the service where we all know that more needs to be done, and that he should make such selective quotations in an attempt to denigrate the achievements of a service which remains one of the best in the world and which is being improved by the Government.

Elderly Persons (Severe Weather)

7. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to ensure that old and needy people are able to keep warm during the current severe weather conditions.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): We have both increased benefit rates in real terms for the least well-off—those on supplementary benefit—and extended entitlement to regular weekly additional help with heating costs, which now goes automatically to all supplementary pensioner householders over 65. In recent weeks we have also publicised the arrangements whereby one-off payments may be available to some supplementary beneficiaries in areas where the weather has been judged to be exceptionally severe.

Mr. Hardy: Is it not regrettable that at this time of very bitter weather Ministers are reported to be more concerned with preparations to reduce the cost of heating allowances than with meeting need? How many old people have died of cold this winter, and how many does the Minister think are currently at high risk?

Mr. Newton: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that Ministers are making a serious effort to improve the working of the supplementary benefit system as a whole, not least the effectiveness of the help that is given to all those who need our help. As to the rest of the hon. Gentleman's question, the concern that he feels about the effects of this severe weather is shared by all of us. We have been working closely with the Health Education Council and with Age Concern to make sure that all possible steps are taken to help old people.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: Does my hon. Friend recall that quite recently he described the extra heating allowance scheme as "weird"? Is not the scheme a farce? Does my hon. Friend also agree that, because of the appalling weather conditions from which we are now suffering, particularly in the south in areas like Brighton, many pensioners need heating to be on for 24 hours a day on account of the old buildings in which they live? Will he please look sympathetically at how this group can be helped when the bills start to arrive in March?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support of my view that there is something strange about this regulation and that we need to look further at it in the context of the review. As to his wider point, I must emphasise that one of our aims has been greatly to extend heating additions to include all pensioners who are in receipt of supplementary benefit. There are now far more pensioners in receipt of regular help of this kind than there were when this Government came to office.

Mr. Fatchett: Is not the reality of the matter that, despite the bad weather of this winter, old people suffer every winter from having to make the choice between heating and other provisions in terms of their budget? Is it not about time that instead of shedding crocodile tears the Government came forward with a real system? Will the Minister go to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and say, "If the Government have money to give away in tax cuts to the rich, would it not be more sensible to make that money available to old-age pensioners so that they can look forward to other winters without this hardship and without these difficult conditions?"

Mr. Newton: Both I and my predecessors have already been to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to such effect that the amount spent on heating additions has risen from little over £100 million in 1979 to around £400 million. This represents a real increase of £140 million and has been directed at exactly the problem that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

Mr. McCrindle: Whatever the charitable reasons that may have led to the introduction of the severe weather payments, will my hon. Friend accept it from me that there are many old people who simply do not understand why they are not entitled to these payments when the weather appears to be just as severe for them as it is for their friends who live perhaps a few miles away and who are receiving these payments? Would not the best course be to scrap this well-intentioned idea and to merge any additional assistance during severe weather into heating allowances generally?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his suggestion. Obviously we shall take it into account when looking at this provision.

Mr. Meacher: Is the Minister aware that the exceptionally severe weather payments that he has been making are a farce because the benefits are too paltry, the trigger points are too low and the system is far too slow to operate? Is he also aware that each week this winter during the miners' strike the Central Electricity Generating Board has been paying out £40 million on expensive oil in place of coal and that the expenditure of that sum for one week, if it had been devoted to pensioners, would have fully protected them from extra fuel costs in this bitter weather?

Mr. Newton: I really think that it is time the hon. Gentleman stopped harping on about the miners' strike in this context. The purpose of the CEGB has been to make sure that old people can have some heat when the miners have been seeking to deny it to them.

Social Security Reviews

8. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish the social security reviews presently being conducted by his Department.

11. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish the result of his departmental review on the supplementary benefit system.

Mr. Fowler: I expect to announce the Government's conclusions on the review and proposals for change in the course of the next few months.

Mr. Nellist: When will the Secretary of State lift his perhaps justified secrecy about these reviews and confirm to working people that he has refused to include in them proposals to abolish the £10 Christmas bonus, the £30 death grant, the £25 maternity grant, other woefully inadequate housing and supplementary benefits and the ending of the right to supplementary benefit for 234,000 16 to 17-year-olds? On Thursday 28 February, will the right hon. Gentleman meet a delegation representing upwards of 5,000 youngsters who on that day will be outside this House demonstrating against his proposal to end supplementary benefit to unemployed teenagers?

Mr. Fowler: Before the hon. Gentleman brings a delegation to see me, it would probably be a better idea if he discovered what the proposals are. As he does not know, it would seem slightly premature to have the sort of demonstration that he wants. It is obvious that the hon. Gentleman is in one of his more reasonable moods, and I must tell him that there is no point in having a review if we reject options in advance. We are looking at all options in social security, and I have no intention whatsoever of confirming or denying the kind of rumours that are around at present, however wild they may be.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Secretary of State accept that in principle I and my hon. Friends wholeheartedly agree that a review is very much needed? However, is he aware that the constitution of the reviews has been very much Government-orientated, in that they do not contain very many independent experts, and that the time scale is extremely short? Will he assure us that the consultation process will allow adequate time for people to respond and that he will publish all the evidence, or at least summaries of it, which he receives in private, as distinct from public hearings, so that we can all consider the matter properly before legislation is introduced?

Mr. Fowler: There will, of course, be a period of time for consultation between the publication of the review and the time any legislation is introduced. As to outsiders, I must point out that the supplementary benefit review which the Labour Government carried out in 1978 was done entirely by departmental officials. We did not take that view, but felt that we should include outsiders. One has only to look at the pensions review to see how many independent outsiders were involved in that. What applied to that review applies to all the other reviews as well.

Mr. Nicholls: As the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) suggested that the pensioners' Christmas bonus might be abolished, will my right hon. Friend remind the House that that bonus was abolished for two years, and on both occasions by a Labour Government?

Mr. Fowler: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There were two years in the 1970s when the Christmas bonus was abolished by Mrs. Barbara Castle when she was Secretary of State for Social Services. The only party which abolished the Christmas bonus was the Labour party.

Mr. Pavitt: Will the right hon. Gentleman reconsider what he said about the time scale? Does he realise that on 19 March he is the supremo of two of the major spending Departments? Therefore, his reviews should be published before the Budget, otherwise we shall be discussing a very nebulous approach to expenditure for the coming year.

Mr. Fowler: I doubt whether I shall be able to satisfy the hon. Gentleman on bringing out the proposals before the Budget. A moment ago I was urged to bring them out later rather than earlier. I hope that the proposals will be produced within the rough time scale of the Budget considerations, because I think that the hon. Gentleman has a fair point about the connection between the two.

Mr. John Townend: Will my right hon. Friend reassure Conservative Members that if the reviews, when published, show areas in which savings can be made, that cash will be used to reduce public expenditure rather than to increase benefits?

Mr. Fowler: If there are savings in any area, the Government will have the alternative of putting the money into other benefits or reducing public expenditure and raising tax thresholds. I must stress that the aim of these reviews is basically to make the best use of available resources and to channel such resources to people who most need them.

Mrs. Beckett: May we yet again press the Minister to publish the reviews themselves, because only by comparing the evidence he has received with the conclusions and proposals of the Government can we properly judge what the process of review has been? What assurance can the House or the country have that, even if we believe that the Government are not attempting to destroy the welfare state through these reviews, they will not do so by the inadvertent incompetence that is the hallmark of this Administration?

Mr. Fowler: On the last point, the hon. Lady will just have to wait and judge the proposals as they come. In regard to publication, the hon. Lady, with her knowledge of the review process, will know that all the proposals to be put forward will be Government proposals. There is no question of publishing separate review reports. Clearly, different issues are contained from those in the housing benefit review, which is under independent chairmanship and which the House will want to see.

Cold Climate Allowance

9. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Social Service how many representations he has received concerning cold climate allowance for Scotland and the North of England.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): Since the beginning of last year we have received about 80 letters on the subject of a cold climate allowance, including 11 from right hon. and hon. Members.

Mr. Bruce: Will the Minister recognise that the recent decision to give additional heating allowances to areas in the south of England because of cold weather was greeted with shock and outrage in the north of England and Scotland, where the weather is traditionally colder? Will he recognise that in the same week that one area in the south-west of England recorded a temperature of 55 deg F and got a cold climate allowance, Aviemore in Scotland, with a temperature of -6 deg F, did not? Does this not mean that the criteria should be reviewed and that cold weather areas should have a permanent allowance to take account of the higher costs of heating?

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Gentleman's question shows a misunderstanding of two issues — the cold climate allowance and extra help for budgetary requirements when there are exceptional weather conditions. He should be aware that Governments of both complexions have rejected the concept of a cold climate allowance for several reasons, which he should understand. Various factors have an effect on supplementary benefit spending. Expenditure on heating is only one of those factors.

With regard to exceptional payments, the criteria have been established and are available in the Library. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State has said, these are under review as part of the general review of the supplementary benefit system.

Mr. McQuarrie: Surely my hon. Friend will accept that, despite what has been said in answer to previous questions, the cold climate allowance, as presently enforced, adversely affects parts of Scotland, particularly in Grampian and my region of Banff and Buchan, because of the severe weather they have to suffer. Can my hon. Friend give an undertaking that that point will be taken account of in the review, and that the needs of the north of Scotland will be carefully considered?

Mr. Whitney: I confirm that the exceptionally severe weather payments will be the subject of review. Again, my hon. Friend is confusing the concept of the cold climate allowance with budgetary help under exceptional conditions for variations of climate. In regard to the criteria, I remind the House that it is possible for payments to be made in Glasgow when average temperatures are higher than average temperatures obtaining, for example, in Birmingham and Suffolk.

Mr. James Hamilton: Is the Minister aware that people in Scotland and in the north of England are convinced that the decision to pay the allowance in the south of England was political? Was the decision taken because the people in Scotland and the north of England have consistently returned Labour Members of Parliament? Is the Minister prepared to make a statement on proper lines?

Mr. Whitney: As the hon. Gentleman should understand, that is an outrageous suggestion. I refer him to the regulations setting out these criteria, which are available in the Library if he would take the trouble to go and read them.

Health Authorities (Chairmen)

12. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what account he takes of the political affiliations of regional health authority and district health authority chairmen when they are appointed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Chairmen of health authorities are appointed for their personal qualities and not to represent particular interests. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] We often do not know the political affiliations of chairmen and potential chairmen and we do not give undue weight to those affiliations when we know them.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The reaction of the House shows the cynicism with which we greet the right hon. and learned Gentleman's comments. Is he not aware that the current edition of the Hospital and Health Service Review says in its editorial that we all know that political appointments are made? Would it not be an idea to link the operation of the Health Service and the health authorites with the inquiry into local government practices that was announced yesterday?

Mr. Clarke: I said that we do not give undue weight to political affiliations when we know them, because I know that the House would not accept that we do not pay regard to them. However, that is a minor factor in making appointments and we try to pick the best people. I think that we have a much better record of objectivity than our predecessors in the Labour Government.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Blair asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 February.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleages and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty The Queen.

Mr. Blair: Now that Clive Ponting has been acquitted, and a jury of ordinary men and women has reasserted the value of parliamentary democracy over ministerial deceit, will the Prime Minister give an assurance that this is the last time that we shall see a person in fear of his liberty for preferring to tell the truth on behalf of the people to telling lies on behalf of the Government?

The Prime Minister: Mr. Ponting was accused and duly acquitted by a court of law. That is a fundamental part of our constitution. It is not a variation from our democracy, but an example of it.

Mr. Onslow: While my right hon. Friend must be right to resist pressure for hasty reform of the Official Secrets Act on the basis of a single verdict, does she not agree that it is essential that Ministers and civil servants should be able to work together within an accepted framework of mutual confidence and trust? Will she give some consideration to setting up a special committee of experienced and responsible Privy Councillors to review the matter and report back to the House as soon as possible?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is absolutely vital that there should be trust and confidence between Ministers and civil servants. I note that a former Prime Minister said in 1976:

"there must be absolute confidence that papers and discussions that take place are kept within the circle to whom they are given."
—[Official Report, 17 June 1976; Vol. 913, c. 739.]

I, then in opposition, supported him.

I shall consider what my hon. Friend said about the Official Secrets Act, but I remind him that the Franks committee considered the Official Secrets Act, and that on the committee there were three Privy Councillors, the person who was later to be a Labour Home Secretary, and a number of other people. Later there was a White Paper upon that Act and later, in our time, there was a proposed Bill brought before the other place, which did not find favour in Parliament.

Mr. Kinnock: Confidence and trust between civil servants and Ministers is essential, but so is confidence and trust between the Government and the House of Commons, and that is what is at stake here. Yesterday, a vetted jury unanimously concluded that Mr. Clive Ponting had not broken the law by exposing the attempts of Ministers to mislead Parliament and the public deliberately. Did the Prime Minister know about the proposed deception of Parliament, and if she did, did she endorse it? If she did not know about it, will she now condemn it in the strongest possible terms? What was her involvement in the decision to prosecute Mr. Ponting?

The Prime Minister: To take the last point first, as the right hon. Gentleman knows full well, Ministers have absolutely no role in deciding whether to prosecute. That is the duty of the Attorney-General and the Director of Public Prosecutions. Ministers had no role whatsoever in the prosecution.

With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's first point, may I make it quite clear that we have put a full account on record. I must make it clear that Ministers in power have always taken, and I hope will always take, the view that information that would have some security value to those who threaten our people or our territory is not released. Our first regard in considering whether to release intelligence information is the safety of Her Majesty's armed forces.

Mr. Kinnock: The right hon. Lady says now, and she has said to me before, that she was not involved in the decision to prosecute. Frankly, I do not believe the right hon. Lady—

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is in order.

Mr. Kinnock: The right hon. Lady's domineering style of government forbids belief that she was not involved in an issue as important as this. Mr. Ponting testified on oath that his superiors had told him that it would be the end of the matter if he resigned from the Civil Service. Since prosecuting counsel in the trial said that it was not suggested that the disclosures damaged national security, will the Prime Minister tell us what issues of national security were at stake in the Ponting affair? What reasons, other than the Government's political convenience, motivated the prosecution of Clive Ponting?

The Prime Minister: I told the right hon. Gentleman, and I must ask him explicitly to accept what I said—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."]—that I was not involved in the decision to prosecute a particular person. The right hon. Gentleman knows that that is correct. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to accept that point, otherwise he is making a very grave accusation. Before I answer the second part of the right hon. Gentleman's question, I ask him to accept my word.

Mr. Kinnock: We have not had in writing nor have we had on any previous occasion or now an adequate explanation for the prosecution of Clive Ponting, in view of the fact that even prosecuting counsel said that no question of national security was involved in the decision to prosecute Clive Ponting. Until we get an adequate explanation, my words stand.

The Prime Minister: No. Mr. Speaker. I have said explicitly and before the whole House, to which I am answerable that I was not involved in the decision to prosecute Clive Ponting. I ask the right hon. Gentlman to accept that explicitly.

Sir Peter Blaker: Has my right hon. Friend's attention been drawn to the fact that Mr. Ponting said in court that there was a good military case for attacking the Belgrano and that he had seen nothing to support the contention that the ship was sunk to end a Peruvian peace plan? Does that not mean that the contention that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) wished to prove when he started his line of questioning was wrong?

The Prime Minister: The Belgrano was sunk for the protection of our armed forces, our naval forces, the Hermes and the Invincible. May I make it clear to everyone that, so long as this Government are in power, the protection of our armed forces will be our prime consideration, whatever the Opposition say. I challenge the Leader of the Opposition: will he or will he not accept my assurance? May I tell him that I was on holiday when the decision was taken?

Mr. David Steel: Has the Prime Minister noted the determination of the jury to distinguish clearly between loyalty to a Government and the security of the state? Will she therefore welcome, indeed rejoice at, this reaffirmation of basic democratic values by a cross-section of the British people and will she demand higher standards from her Ministers?

The Prime Minister: I accept the decision of the court —of course I do; I always have—but I stress that two things are vital. The first is that Ministers are able fully to trust civil servants. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman agrees with that and does not in any way endorse or condone the breach of trust that occurred.

Secondly, I wholly and utterly insist that there are some things in security and intelligence which, for the safety of our forces or the safety of the state, the Government must keep secret. To put it in specific terms:

"The Government has concluded that information relating to security and intelligence matters is deserving of the highest protection whether or not it is classified. This is pre-eminently an area where the gradual accumulation of small items of information apparently trivial in themselves could eventually create a risk for the safety of an individual or constitute a serious threat to the interests of the nation as a whole."

That was the view of the last Labour Government when they were in power, set out in a White Paper brought before this House by the then Home Secretary in 1978. It is something that we endorse.

I again ask the right hon. Gentleman: will he accept the assurance I have given that I had nothing to do with the prosecution of Clive Ponting? If not, he is the smaller a man because of his refusal.

Q2. Mr. Ward asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 12 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ward: May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the announcement by the National Union of Teachers this lunch-time that it intends to call a series of strikes? Does she not find this a strange way for teachers to carry out their duties and responsibilities to the young people of this country?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. Children are in the care of teachers and it is a tragedy if teachers do anything to jeopardise the future of children in order to go on strike. But I must say that I do not believe that many teachers will go on strike. I think that they will prefer to look after their charges.

Mr. Dalyell: Who was it who altered Sir John Fieldhouse's official commander-in-chief's report without Sir John Fieldhouse's knowledge?

The Prime Minister: I understand from Admiral Fieldhouse that during the drafting of his dispatch at Northwood he queried the date in the sentence on the detection of the Belgrano but agreed that it should be left as 2 May in order to protect sensitive operational and intelligence information. The second of May was therefore the date in the dispatch that Admiral Fieldhouse submitted to the Ministry of Defence. It was not altered by officials there.

Q3. Sir John Farr asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 12 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Sir John Farr: In view of the rising costs of Trident, will my right hon. Friend consider whether there are new ways of ensuring that a far greater domestic content is included in the contract? Given the increasing cost of purchases from America, an additional input from the British end would be very helpful to British industry.

The Prime Minister: A very considerable part of the Trident order has been placed in Britain as, indeed, all the submarine orders have been. I shall see whether we can achieve anything more, but the whole Trident programme will give us far more deterrence than any other programme on which we could spend that same amount of money.

Dr. Owen: The Prime Minister is a Member of the House and is aware of the convention that when the record of the House is printed it is accurate. When that record has been shown to be inaccurate and statements have been made to the House that have subsequently been shown to be untrue, they have been corrected. Why has the Prime Minister not come to the House today to correct the many mistaken statements that have been made by her and her Ministers, the most recent of which was on 21 February 1984, and is reported in column 695 of Hansard. She said that all the facts had been revealed and went on to say:

"All the facts are there. They support the Government's case."—[Official Report, 21 February, 1984; Vol. 54 c. 695.]

All the facts were not revealed. They do not support the Government's case. There are misleading statements on the record, and the Prime Minister owes it to the House to put the record straight.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman wrote a very long letter to me in the autumn. I answered his allegations fully in my letter to him of 8 October. He replied to that, and I answered again on 16 November. I have also answered very extensive letters from other right hon. and hon. Members, and I believe — although I speak from memory — that some of them have been reproduced in Hansard.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the private notice question and then points of order.

Later——

Mr. Speaker: There is a point of order, but it must relate to the subject of Question Time, social services, or Prime Minister's questions.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I must seek your guidance and possibly even your protection. I am well aware, as a new Member, that I am unable to accuse any member of the Government of telling lies. Am I able to accuse any member of the Government of being unable to tell the difference?

Mr. Speaker: That is just the sort of point of order that I had hoped would not be made.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Last Thursday my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition invited you to look into the recent habit of the Prime Minister of reading lengthy statements during Question Time. I happen to have done a little research into this and it confirms what my right hon. Friend asserted last Thursday. I wonder whether you have had an opportunity to do so, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I have no responsibility for how questions are answered, or for the questions that are put to the Prime Minister or to any other hon. Member. That is entirely a matter for those concerned.

RAF Bandsmen (Accident)

3.31 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the accident that occurred yesterday in Germany to the 1st Battalion RAF Bandsmen and the subsequent death of many of the bandsmen involved.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Michael Heseltine): Yesterday afternoon on the E6 autobahn near Langenbruck in Germany a coach——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is this true or false?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a foolish question. This is a very serious matter.

Mr. Heseltine: Yesterday afternoon, on the E6 autobahn near Langenbruck in Germany, a coach carrying the band of RAF Germany collided with an oil tanker. [Interruption.] It is with the greatest regret that I have to inform the House that in the fire which immediately ensued, the band's Director of Music, Squadron Leader C. R. Tomsett, 17 bandsmen and the civilian driver of the coach died. [Interruption.] A further two bandsmen are very seriously ill and the condition of three others is giving cause for concern. All next of kin have now been informed and arrangements have been made to fly those next of kin who wish, to Ingolstadt, where the injured are in hospital.

Following this tragic accident, an investigation into its cause has been put in hand jointly by the RAF police and the German civil police. In addition, an RAF board of inquiry has been convened but will await the outcome of the police investigations before completing its own assessment of the accident. I know that the whole House will wish to join me in expressing our deepest sympathy to the families of all those so tragically killed and injured in this terrible accident.

Mr. McNamara: We on this side of the House join in the sympathy expressed by the Minister to all the families of the people bereaved and of the injured, and in particular to the RAF as a service, because this band was well-known, respected and loved by people within and without the service.

May I ask the Secretary of State two questions? When does he expect the preliminary inquiry to be completed, and will it be published? Secondly, will he also publish the report of the RAF board of inquiry when it has completed its investigation? Finally, will he convey to the German civil authorities the thanks of the House and of the British people for the splendid and quick way in which they came to the aid of those who were tragically harmed in this accident?

Mr. Heseltine: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I will certainly ensure that his views are passed on to the appropriate people.

I do not have a date by which to expect the report of the German civil police inquiry, but I am sure that it will proceed with dispatch, and I will ensure that the House is kept as fully informed as I can.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Will the Secretary of State please take this opportunity to convey the deepest regrets and condolences of my right hon. and hon. Friends to the families of those concerned?

Mr. Heseltine: Yes, of course I will do so.

University Hospital of Wales

3.36 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement in view of a large number of wild allegations that have been published on the subject of the defects at the University Hospital of Wales, known as the Heath hospital.

The hospital was planned in the 1950s by the board of governors of the United Cardiff Hospitals. Messrs S. W. Milburn and Partners were appointed architects and Messrs W. S. Atkins and Partners engineers in 1961. F. G. Minter and Sons Ltd. were appointed principal contractors for the main works in 1966.

The hospital was constructed between 1966 and 1972. Some faults, mainly arising from work carried out in the period 1966 to 1969, began to become apparent in December 1973 and in 1974. In the meantime, the hospital had been handed over to the Welsh Hospital Board in October 1970 and became the responsibility of the new South Glamorgan area health authority on reorganisation in 1974. The rights and liabilities of the Welsh Hospital Board passed to the Welsh Health Technical Services Organisation at the same time. The architect signed the final certificate in November 1975.

The issue of this certificate was an event of crucial significance, as it precluded claims against the contractors in contract or in tort in respect of defects patent at the time. At that stage, WHTSO took no specific steps to protect its legal position and that of the taxpayer. Counsel notes that the AHA and WHTSO had become much concerned with the state of the concrete by 1976. In February 1977, a general property survey by the South Glamorgan health authority also led to concern at the condition of the mosaic cladding. WHTSO commissioned Ove Arup and Partners to carry out a survey. While that report was awaited, the only legal action that was in hand was the defence by WHTSO of a claim by F. G. Minter Ltd. and subcontractors Drake and Scull Ltd., who were seeking to recover finance charges under the terms of their building agreements. Consideration was given to the inclusion of the mosaic defects as a counter-claim against Minters' finance charges claim, but counsel advised in July 1977 that such a counter-claim could not be sustained. Under the traditional conventions, which have been strictly observed, I have no means of knowing what consideration my predecessors gave to the problem of the Heath, but I have been informed that no other legal action was taken before 1979 to protect the interests of the taxpayer.

Ove Arup's first report was received in November 1978, and having reported defects in the concrete during the course of its mosaic study it was further commissioned to carry out remedial and survey work on the concrete. The full extent of the mosaic defects having now been clearly identified, WHTSO commissioned Bickerdike Allen Partners in January 1979 to advise, and they reported in April 1979.

That report identified for the first time a possible claim against the architects. The first reference to counsel was on 12 July 1979 when, among other matters, the question of limitations was considered. Following that meeting with counsel, Bickerdike Allen prepared a further report that was received in November 1979 and was concerned with responsibilities and liabilities. Meanwhile, counsel had been instructed in October to settle a draft writ and statement of claim against the Milburn partnership, and in the instruction to counsel the need for urgency was emphasised. Counsel settled notices of arbitration and an endorsement for the writ by telex on 17 December 1979 and the writ issued the same day.

Allegations have been made that the writ was out of time. The limitation period for a claim in contract was and is 12 years and the writ was clearly in time in that respect. The limitation period for a claim in negligence was and is six years. At the time of issue of the writ, that six-year period was regarded as running from the date when damage was discovered or was reasonably discoverable by the plaintiff, and on that basis the writ was in time for the claim in negligence also. The Pirelli decision of December 1982 moved the commencement of the six-year period back in time to the date of occurrence of damage, regardless of the date of discovery, and on that basis the claim in negligence would have failed if it had been pursued.

I turn now to the outcome of the legal action, details of which were given on 6 February in an answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist). I shall deal with the allegation that there has been some kind of cover-up and the suggestion that in settling the action at about £300,000 the taxpayer has been negligently left with a liability for work costing £4 million—or, as is further alleged, as much as £8 million. The total cost of remedial works is about £4 million, of which about £2·8 million is attributable to structural defects other than the mosaic cladding. The Department's accounting officer reported to the PAC as long ago as 14 November 1983 counsel's advice that legal action about that should not be pursued. He had previously been cross-examined in some detail about this matter by the PAC on 17 March 1982.

The settlement that was finally reached on the mosaics will be published in the summary accounts of health authorities to be laid before the House of Commons as a paper. It was always the position that the Department's accounting officer would provide the PAC with any further information that it requires. There has therefore been no cover-up; nor, indeed could there have been. But in view of the outrageous and serious allegations that have been made on this subject, I have made available to the House the fullest possible information.

I turn now to the relationship between the Secretary of State and WHTSO—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an important statement for those in Wales.

Mr. Edwards: I have been pressed by the Opposition to make a statement in reply to serious allegations.

The WHTSO is a special health authority established under the Health Service Acts. It is entitled in the conduct of litigation to act as a principal. It is not required to seek my approval to settlements of legal actions in which it may be engaged. It is normal for health authorities to engage in litigation and to reach settlements without reference to Ministers. But given the public and parliamentary interest in this case and the particular terms of the non-disclosure clause, I think that it would have been better had I personally been informed, particularly since one of my officials was a member of the WHTSO board. I regret that this was not done; and I am sure that, in these exceptional circumstances, I was right immediately to arrange that the fullest information should be given to Parliament.

[Mr. Edwards]

I will deal with the suggestion that the cost of putting right the defects at the University Hospital of Wales may amount to as much as £8 million. As the House was told in answer to a parliamentary question on 1 February, the total cost of the remedial work is expected to amount to as little as under £4 million. The fullest possible information has, again, been given to the PAC. I regret that the hon. Member for Pontypool, who has been responsible for most of the wilder allegations, did not at any time check the facts with my Department.

I have had to answer this afternoon for events involving a hospital conceived in the 1940s, planned in the 1950s and built largely in the 1960s, before I entered the House. I have had to report on the absence of any protective legal measures during the whole period of the last Labour Government, on the outcome of complex legal actions that were initiated very soon after we came to office and on measures to repair damage that will be a burden on the health service for several years to come. I shall accept such responsibility as is mine. I trust that others will accept theirs.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): The right hon. Gentleman referred to the hon. Member for Pontypool. There is no such Member, and to that extent his statement was inaccurate. He was, in fact, referring to my hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse).

Is it not a fact that the right hon. Gentleman has been forced to make this statement because of the tenacious campaign of my hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen and because a South Wales Echo journalist, Mr. Tindle, made a prudent inquiry?

Is it not a fact that the Welsh health technical services organisation, WHTSO, struck a secret deal with the architects and engineers responsible for major defects at Wales's premier hospital, and that a settlement was reached last February? Amazingly, the terms of the settlement were to remain confidential between the parties and their legal advisers. The settlement sum was derisory. The cost of repairs is prohibitive.

Is it not a fact that a board member of the technical services organisation happens to be one of the right hon. Gentleman's right-hand men—[Interruption.]—and that that senior civil servant, an assistant secretary, was a signatory to the secret deal? In relation to one of the Secretary of State's most senior advisers, could it be possible that before, and since, the secret deal, at least over a period of 11 months, the matter was not mentioned once? This technical organisation is supposed to give value for money, one of the right hon. Gentleman's objectives.

May we be told when, in his crucial first six months in office—crucial from the legal point of view—the right hon. Gentleman met the technical services organisation and discussed the hospital's problems? If he did not meet his technical advisers, why did he not do so, considering that an important issue was being dealt with? It affected the capital building programme of Wales's hospital network.

Will the right hon. Gentleman publish the findings of his internal inquiry into the technical services organisation? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that his Permanent Secretary has stated that the technical services organisation is a special health authority answerable in the same terms as any other health authority?

The right hon. Gentleman told me that £4 million was the cost of remedial works. Has he omitted to include the cost—£1·8 million at 1981 prices—of restoring the flat roofs?

The right hon. Gentleman yesterday mentioned Bangor. Has he issued writs against the construction company that built the nurses' home, which has major problems? Is the IDC construction company the company that built the nurses' home? What is the scale of moneys that the right hon. Gentleman seeks as compensation?

Fundamentally, this issue spotlights the right hon. Gentleman's ministerial responsibility and his control over his Department. We think that he has failed abjectly. Why have we had to drag the information out of him? Is it not a sad spectacle to see the right hon. Gentleman saying that the technical services organisation is independent of him when it is directly responsible to him? Did not the right hon. Gentleman have seven valuable months in which to save Welsh taxpayers millions of pounds? It is pathetic of him to hide behind his ministerial predecessors—former Welsh Office Ministers who always face up to their responsibilities because they have nothing to be ashamed of. Does the right hon. Gentleman not recollect the Crichel Down case?

The right hon. Gentleman has been seen to have a feeble and faulty grip of affairs. He should go away and consider his position. The people of Wales have already lost confidence in him.

Mr. Edwards: Almost all the allegations made by the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse) have been proved false and were dealt with in detail in my statement. The information was not confined to the legal advisers, and there was no secret deal. Indeed, it was WHTSO that inserted into the agreement the disclosure clause that ensured that the information would be provided to Parliament through the Public Accounts Committee, as is normal practice for confidential agreements of this kind. I repeat that there was no secret deal. The information would have been provided to the Public Accounts Committee, and indeed the summary of the financial settlement will appear in the normal course of events in a House of Commons paper that will appear in the next few weeks.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) inquired about the time scale on which legal action was taken. Legal action was initiated as a matter of urgency within weeks of this Conservative Government having come into their place. The hon. Gentleman asked me whether I was involved in the discussions of that settlement. I was indeed fully informed about the early stages of this matter which led up to the decision that we could not proceed with the claim for £3 million of the £4 million at issue, on the advice of counsel. The reasons for that have already been given to the Public Accounts Committee.

I was also involved in the decisions that led up to the renovation programme for the hospital. I can confirm that the cost of the programme is £4 million, and not more, as has been alleged, including the work on the roof. I confirm that writs have been issued in respect of the Bangor hospital.

The hon. Gentleman talks about control of the Department. I have to point out that legal action was initiated within weeks of the Government coming into office and was followed through energetically. No legal action at all was taken by WHTSO to protect its position in 1975 when the hon. Gentleman was responsible for the Health Service in Wales and when his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) was Secretary of State, and no legal action was taken to protect the position of the taxpayer for the five years between 1975 and their going out of office.

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): Although it is true that this catalogue and history of disaster appears to have continued for two decades and during the terms in office of several Governments, are there not some signs that the earliest opportunity for effective remedial action might have occurred during the time of the Labour Government?

Mr. Edwards: The undoubtedly crucial event was the issuing of the architect's certificate in November 1975. Counsel has made it clear in his opinion, which is in the Library, that WHTSO could have taken action at that time to protect itself and the taxpayer, and that it failed to do so. It might have had good reasons for doing so, but I cannot tell at this stage because I have no access to the papers of my predecessor. That was undoubtedly a crucial event and it is also undoubted that serious defects were known from 1977 onwards and no effective legal action was taken until we came to power, when a meeting was held with counsel. Action was initiated in July 1979 onwards.

Mr. Leo Abse (Torfaen): As the Secretary of State regrets that I did not communicate with him when I could have had all of the information that I required, does he recall that, in May 1983, I tabled a parliamentary question asking him to give information about the surveyor's report of Ove Arup? He refused to do so because litigation was pending. As he refused to give information, how can he now complain that, until I and the South Wales Echo and the rest of the Welsh press prised the matter open, this secret deal was kept under wraps? Is it not clear from the right hon. Gentleman's statement that his passion, which is shared by the rest of the Government, for secrecy is now superseded by zeal for obfuscation? Having failed to put all the responsibility on civil servants, as he shamelessly did originally, he is now attempting, in the most convoluted manner, to persuade the House that some past Labour Administration was responsible, when he well knows that it was his own folly, neglect and lack of monitoring that led to millions of pounds being lost by taxpayers in Wales.

Mr. Edwards: When the hon. Gentleman tabled his first question, as he said, litigation was pending and information was not given to him for that reason. Of the £4 million, £3 million has already been accounted for fully to the Public Accounts Committee, and the accounting officer has been examined in detail on all aspects of this matter, giving details of the amounts and of legal opinions. The legal opinions have now been published. It will be clear to anyone who studies them that I was not responsible for any failure. Furthermore, it is quite clear that every proper legal step to pursue the matter was taken from the moment that the Government came to power. It is also clear that the £1 million that remained outstanding and which was involved in the settlement, would have been reported in detail to the Public Accounts Committee in the normal course of events. Indeed, the settlement provided that it should be.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that there are two other statements and that we have a full day before us. I propose to call those hon. Members who were not called at Question Time yesterday when this matter was discussed.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for making a statement. The hospital is in my constituency and the matter is of great concern in Cardiff. Since the news of the settlement came out, what approaches were made to my right hon. Friend or his office by the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse) before he made allegations of a cover-up by my right hon. Friend? Does my right hon. Friend agree that those allegations have so obscured the pursuit of the heart of the matter that they ought to be considered in a full public inquiry by the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs?

Mr. Edwards: I would welcome any investigation by the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs. My hon. Friend is right. No approach was made by the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse). There is no doubt that, in the circumstances that have arisen, I have given fuller disclosure to the House than has probably ever been given about a commercial contract of this type. I thought that it was absolutely right to give the fullest possible information to the House. That is why I made the statement today, and why I have laid so much information in the Library.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): As the Secretary of State claims that all possible legal steps were taken as soon as the Conservative Government took office in 1979, will he please explain to the House why no writ was issued as soon as the Conservative Government took office, and why there was a delay from May to December 1979 before legal proceedings were started when his legal advisers should have known well that it was essential to issue a writ as soon as possible?

Mr. Edwards: On the basis of the law at the time, the writ was in time both at the time of its issue and now. The limitation period ran from the time when damage was discovered or was reasonably discoverable, which was the receipt of a letter on 18 December. The law as to the limitation before the Pirelli case was the decision in the Sparham Souter case, referred to in counsel's opinion on 5 March 1982. The Pirelli decision moved the start of the limitation period back in time to the date when damage occurred, regardless of when it was discovered. The writ was out of time as regards the claim of negligence after the issue of the Pirelli decision, but the writ has always been in time for the claim based on breach of contract, and it still is.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Cannot the Secretary of State see the contradiction between alleging in his own defence that WHTSO is an independent agency, and blaming my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) for his deficiencies during his period of office? Has he not admitted that he first heard of this settlement by reading the South Wales Echo, which clearly shows gross mismanagement of his Department? Are there any other contracts to his knowledge with these non-disclosure clauses?

Mr. Edwards: No, it is not I who seeks to have this absurdly tight control over a health authority in the settlement of these matters. It is perfectly right that health authorities should negotiate the best possible terms, and I would not have sought to overrule their judgment, which was perfectly correct in the nature of the settlement. The only fault they made was in entering into a clause involving parliamentary disclosure, without consulting Ministers about the way in which that parliamentary disclosure should be made. Opposition Members are arguing that there should be the tightest possible control on WHTSO and that it should be run, as indeed it frequently was by my predecessors, in the tightest possible way. Yet although they ran it in that way, they apparently did not know about these matters or, at least, did not take steps to ensure that effective legal action was taken.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Does not the failure of the Secretary of State for Wales and the Welsh Office show a basic flaw in the reorganisation of the NHS in 1974? I was a member of the Welsh Hospital Board which started an investigation into this matter, but we were abolished by the Conservative Government, and the powers for the Health Service were taken over by the Welsh Office. Does not that failure by the right hon. Gentleman's Office underline, as we have always claimed, that the reorganisation was basically undemocratic and that the Welsh Office simply cannot exercise day-to-day control over the running of the Health Service in Wales?

Mr. Edwards: I think that when the hon. Lady studies the papers she will find that it was not the Welsh Office. Certainly I have no reason to think that WHTSO was necessarily responsible for a failure to recover. We have a story of a hospital first planned in the 1950s by local hospital boards, carried towards completion under the hospital board, of which the hon. Lady was a member, and taken over under the new organisation. The hospital was planned over a long period. There are lessons to be learnt about the general management of such capital programmes. Indeed, it was exactly about that subject that I made my maiden speech in 1970. The hon. Lady is quite wrong to conclude that the failure to recover and the loss that was incurred were the fault of the reorganisation of the Health Service. It was quite the contrary.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): You will be aware, Mr. Speaker, of the exchanges in the House earlier this afternoon about the withholding of information from the House. Will the Secretary of State, in addition to referring this matter to the Public Accounts Committee, invite the Chairman of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs to carry out an in-depth investigation into this matter?

Mr. Edwards: I should find it hard to discover anything in common between this case and the other case that was referred to. The complaint in this case is that my official did not keep me informed about a matter, which I have since revealed in full to the House. I should certainly welcome any further investigation which the Welsh Affairs Select Committee chooses to make.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Is it not remarkable and unbelievable for the Secretary of State, who is responsible for hospital services in Wales, to tell the House that, having been informed that negotiations about the £4 million deficit in a major hospital in Wales were in hand, he never bothered to establish their outcome in the next four and a half years? Does he recognise that it is no good coming to the House and saying that his officials should have informed him about the matter? Is it not a fact that virtually a year after the settlement he knew nothing of it until he read about it in the South Wales Echo last week? Does he recognise that on those considerations alone he is guilty of incredible incompetence? Is he further aware that the attempted cover-up that followed was made even more serious by the fact that a term of the settlement could, as you ruled, Mr. Speaker, have been a contempt of the House, had it been enforced? Finally, does he realise that the revelations of the past 10 days have left the clear impression in Wales of a Cabinet Minister who not only does not know what his Department is doing, but does not even try to find out?

Mr. Edwards: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong in almost every respect. I have already said that not only was I fully aware, but a full report had been given to the Public Accounts Committee of £3 million of this matter. The detailed clauses of the settlement were not disclosed to me. It was an error of judgment not to tell me of the particular disclosure clause. That was a matter about which Ministers should have been consulted. There was no attempt at a cover-up — indeed, WHTSO took specific action to ensure that provision for full disclosure to the PAC was included in the terms of the settlement. I believe that I am right in saying that it is for the PAC to decide whether it sits in camera and whether it accepts that the information given to it is confidential. Therefore, in my judgment this particular settlement could not have kept information from Parliament because the PAC could, if it had wished, have published all the information that it received.

Business of the House

4.8 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short business statement.

The business for Monday 18 February will now be a debate on the sinking of the Belgrano, which will arise on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

I shall announce a new date for the Second Reading of the London Regional Transport Bill at business questions on Thursday.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I tell the right hon. Gentleman that the debate on the Adjournment of the House is a completely inadequate way to deal with the matter? The Government have decided on a subject that entirely misses the point of having the debate on Monday. The debate must be about Minister's responses to questions from right hon. and hon. Members and from the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs on the circumstances surrounding the sinking of the General Belgrano. I commend that motion to the right hon. Gentleman. We should debate it on Monday if the House is properly to address the issues. They have become matters of vital importance, especially in the wake of the trial and acquittal of Clive Ponting.

I hope that we may have the right hon. Gentleman's co-operation in ensuring that, well before the debate, a full transcript of the proceedings of the trial is deposited in the House of Commons Library, as some difficulty has been experienced in obtaining that and we shall require his assistance in doing so.

Finally, if we debate the subject that I suggest it will provide the full opportunity necessary for a detailed account to be given of the precise reasons why a prosecution of Mr. Ponting was undertaken, in the light of the fact that apparently he was at no time accused of breaching national security.

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition will not be disappointed in his desire that the scope of the debate on Monday is drawn sufficiently wide to enable all the points that he has mentioned to be properly discussed. I have said that the Government wish the matter to be debated on a motion for the Adjournment of the House; he has demonstrated his anxiety on that point, and perhaps we can consider it through the usual channels. I shall see whether I can meet his point about the proceedings of the trial being made available in the Library.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Will the Minister of State for the Armed Forces be speaking in the debate on behalf of the Government, or will he be speaking from the Back Benches? If there is to be no change in his position, will whoever is speaking on behalf of the Government be doing so because the decision to deceive the House was taken much higher up than him?

Mr. Biffen: The easy accusation about deceit of the House is something that can best be left to Monday, when I have no doubt that it will be dealt with in the most authoritative fashion.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Michael Heseltine): Hear, hear.

Mr. Biffen: As to those who will be speaking in the debate, that has been concluded through the usual channels.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Leader of the House give an undertaking that the document which has been called the "crown jewels" will be made available to the House — [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Because it has been circulated to 12 good men and true. It may or may not be part of the transcript that may be available to the House. To have a realistic debate on this matter, there must be an all-pervading argument that the document should be available to hon. Members.

Mr. Biffen: I note what the hon. Gentleman says, but I must say in all candour that I can give no such undertaking.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): May I suggest to my right hon. Friend that an all-embracing improvement would be a debate on the new concept in British politics that the ends justify the means?

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend says, and I have sufficient regard for him to know that, if that is to be the thrust of his speech, he will be making it on Monday.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Does the Leader of the House recognise that the leader of the Labour party spoke for many people in the House when he criticised the decision to have the debate on a motion for the Adjournment of the House and the scope of the debate? What should be discussed is the relationship of the House, Ministers and the Government. Hon. Members might have different views about the wisdom of sinking the Belgrano. Those two issues should not be clouded in the same debate.

Mr. Biffen: I thought that I gave a reasonably responsive answer to the Leader of the Opposition, and I shall not go beyond that now.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Is it not a fact that Mr. Ponting has made it clear that he agrees with the Government's action in respect of the General Belgrano? If that is so, why is the scope of Monday's debate so wide? Why is it not focused on the action or otherwise of the Government in replying to the Select Committee's questions? Is the Leader of the House aware that the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs is considering these matters? Would it not be better to wait until it has reported before debating the wider issue?

Mr. Biffen: I think that the House will feel that it is important to debate this matter as speedily as possible. I also believe that the House would wish to have the debate on a broadly generous interpretation of all the factors that are relevant to this incident, and I am sure that we can fulfil that objective.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have another important statement, and we must not delay too long on this one.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Will the right hon. Gentleman give the House a clear undertaking that he and the Government are responsible for the subject matter of the debate? Will he also give an undertaking that, since the Prime Minister is responsible for the security services, she will take part in the debate?

An Hon. Member: She will be on holiday.

Mr. Biffen: This is a Government motion, and with that go the consequences for the choice of topic and its title. But it is also a matter for discussion through the usual channels, and I am happy to say that that is what happened in this case.

Mr. Mark Hughes (City of Durham): Will the Leader of the House discuss with you, Mr. Speaker, whether a preferable motion would be that the House should set up a Committee to draw up the rules for impeachment and a bill of impeachment, because that is the last resort of this high court of Parliament against Ministers of the Crown who have misled the House?

Mr. Biffen: I think that I have been helpful to the House in the announcement I made concerning Monday's business, and I have no doubt that the point that the hon. Gentleman wishes to argue can reasonably be made on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will call one more hon. Member.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): If, in the opinion of the Director of Public Prosecutions and, presumably, of the Attorney-General, it was essential, in order that a jury of 12 men and women should have a full view of the circumstances surrounding the sinking of the General Belgrano, for it to see the document known as the "crown jewels", why is it impossible for right hon. and hon. Members to see that document before a debate on the matter?

Mr. Biffen: That point has already been made to me, and I cannot add to the answer that I gave.

Mr. Clive Ponting

4.16 pm

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement on my decision to prosecute Mr. Ponting. On 13 August 1984, certain facts were drawn to the attention of the Director of Public Prosecutions by the Ministry of Defence. In my absence, the Director consulted my hon. and learned Friend—[Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a matter for hilarity.

The Attorney-General: I wonder whether some of those who are jeering were on holiday in August last year. In my absence, the Director consulted my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General the same day. On 16 August 1984, a report by the Ministry of Defence police was sent to the Director. My hon. and learned Friend and the Director considered that report on 17 August, and both formed the view that this was a serious breach of duty and trust by a senior civil servant. They decided to consult me and I was telephoned on the same day. The facts as reported by the Director were explained to me. The nature of the documents which had been communicated was described and I was told that the Director and the Solicitor-General advised a prosecution. Having considered the facts myself, I, too, decided that the case fell within my published guidelines and that there should be a prosecution.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): When did you ring Thatcher?

The Attorney-General: Neither I nor the Solicitor-General nor any of my officials sought the view of or consulted any other Minister, nor was the view of any other Minister conveyed to us before the decision was taken.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon) rose——

Hon. Members: Apologise!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I called the shadow Attorney-General.

Mr. Morris: Does the Attorney-General realise that his brief deadpan statement—a 19-line calendar of events—is an insult to the House in the light of the crisis and the operation of this law, its provisions and the activities of Defence Ministers? Would it not also have been right for those Ministers to have lost not a moment in taking the House into their confidence about their personal intentions today? Does not the jury's verdict — a vetted jury, incidentally — reflect the view that Mr. Ponting's evidence either was true or could be true but that it also believed that Defence Ministers blatantly misinformed, or were prepared to misinform, the House? May I first ask — [Interruption.] — if the hon. Gentleman will allow me,—we still have freedom in this House—with your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) in the third row who is laughing, why in general there has been no prosecution for many years under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act when security is not involved and whether there has been a change in policy since the present Administration came into office? Secondly, may I express the hope, and indeed assume, that the Attorney-General will never again authorise a prosecution so long as section 2 continues in existence in cases where there are no security implications? Thirdly, in agreeing to prosecute, did the Attorney-General bear in mind, first, the views expressed by the Lord Chancellor in 1979 about the need to have legislation capable of being enforced and the need to limit the extent of criminality and, as regards continuing the prosecution, the letter of Mr. Sam Silkin to The Times on 26 September about the difficulties of getting a true verdict in which he said:

"however careful the trial judge"—

when so many issues might be canvassed—

"and which no intelligent juror could easily dismiss from his mind and conscience"?

He warned the Attorney-General that at that late stage he might reconsider the case and allow events to take their course. Does the Attorney-General now regret not having heeded that advice?

The Attorney-General: The right hon. and learned Gentleman describes my statement as an insult to the House and says that I should have dealt with the activities of Defence Ministers. May I remind him and the House of the words that he used only yesterday when making a Standing Order No. 10 application:

"the misuse of section 2 of the Official Secrets Act and whether the Attorney-General, in current circumstances, should have granted his consent to prosecute in the case of the Queen v. Ponting."—[Official Report, 11 February 1985; Vol. 73, c. 38.]

That is exactly what I have responded to today. The right hon. and learned Gentleman went on to make a number of points. He referred to the false conclusion by the jury. I do not follow why that amounts to a false conclusion by the jury. The jury's verdict was given on the particular facts of the case and does not establish, as I see it, any rule of law or any precedent in law. I shall continue to apply this law as it is, looking at each case on its particular merits. The right hon. and learned Gentleman then asked me to give an undertaking that I would never again authorise a prosecution under section 2 which does not involve security. That is a remarkable proposition. I have a duty to enforce the criminal law. I have no right, nor must I seek, to usurp the function of Parliament by effectively repealing legislation.

Mr. Norman St. John-Stevas (Chelmsford): By refusing to accept the solemn word of the Prime Minister, now corroborated by the Attorney-General, that she took no part in this decision to bring the prosecution, has not the Leader of the Opposition done more to undermine respect for democracy than any other action in this affair and is it not time that he apologised to the House?

The Attorney-General: I regret very much what was said and repeated by the Leader of the Opposition. After having heard what I have said, I hope that he will offer the apology that my right hon. Friend deserves.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): May I ask the Attorney-General two questions? He says in his statement that he took the view that there had been a serious breach of duty and trust by a senior civil servant. In that case, why did he not proceed under the Civil Service disciplinary procedures? And was he aware before he took his decision, of the offer that had been made to Mr. Ponting that, should he resign the service, there would be no prosecution? My second point is that the last sentence of the Attorney-General's statement is very carefully worded, stating that neither he, nor the Solicitor-General nor any of his officials were in touch with other Ministers before the decision was taken. That is quite consistent with the assurance given to us earlier by the Prime Minister. However, it does not exclude the possibility that Ministry of Defence Ministers were in touch by telephone with the Prime Minister, after he took his decision and before he acted on it, to get her approval.

The Attorney-General: I am quite unable to say what conversations, if any, took place. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] But it has no relevance. The relevant factor is the decision that I reached, which I reached alone with the Solicitor-General and with the Director of Public Prosecutions and my officials. It was reached without any contact of any kind with any other Minister.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicester, North-West) rose——

Mr. Steel: What about the first part of my question?

Mr. Ashby: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, while defendants have a right of appeal against a perverse verdict the prosecution rightly, in my view, and in the view of many of us, does not have the right of appeal against a perverse verdict?

The Attorney-General: It would be quite wrong for me to comment in any way upon the verdict. May I deal with the other question that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Liberal party put to me? I apologise for having forgotten it. Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act is not in existence only to protect national security. Civil servants, whatever their rank, have a special degree of responsibility imposed on them by the nature of their office and of their duties and by the confidence that is therefore reposed in them. Mr. Ponting was a senior officer and his breach of responsibility and trust was accordingly greater.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Does the Attorney-General have any criticisms of the Ponting trial judge?

The Attorney-General: The only comment I would make about the Ponting trial judge is that I agree with his definition of the law.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Will my right hon. and learned Friend agree that before this House proceeds to the beatification of Mr. Ponting we should do well to reflect that if senior civil servants want to stand on principle they would do well to resign their official position, make a public disclosure of what they want to disclose and thus openly invite prosecution rather than act in a covert, underhand and disreputable manner?

The Attorney-General: I note what my hon. Friend says.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Will the Attorney-General expand on his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and tell the House what is his view of the judge's ruling that the interests of the state relate solely to the interests of the Government of the day? Is that not a very dangerous trend in British justice and is it not excellent that 12 ordinary people have said that they want none of it?

The Attorney-General: I think that it is a mistake to make the assumption that 12 ordinary people want none of it. There are so many circumstances that may affect a jury, but I have said already and I say again that I accept that the learned judge was right in the direction of law that he gave.

Mr. Peter Thomas (Hendon, South): Could my right hon. and learned Friend tell the House who took the decision that the proper conduct of the prosecution in this case required the disclosure to the jury and to others who are participating in the case of the restricted document known as the "crown jewels"? Who authorised the disclosure and, as the document has been disclosed, can he give any valid reason why the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, on the same basis as the jury saw that document, should not in accordance with its request be shown the document?

The Attorney-General: There was no intention by the prosecution to make any use of the document called the "crown jewels". The defending solicitor asked for a copy, rightly recognising that some of it might be of a very highly confidential nature. When the edited version was looked at, it was quite clear that it would give a very misleading impression. I then sought the authority of those responsible from a security point of view, and in particular the authority of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence—because they were all defence matters—and asked whether I could use the whole document. I was then given that authority, which is why the whole of the "crown jewels", rather than a misleading part of it, was put before the jury. I cannot, of course, have responsibility for the Foreign Affairs Select Committee.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Will the Attorney-General explain why on the one hand he decided to prosecute Clive Ponting for actions which did not prejudice national security while, on the other, he has not decided to prosecute Lord Lewin for revealing top secret information about the towed sonar array, which does prejudice national security?

The Attorney-General: As I said in a written answer only a few days ago, which the hon. Gentleman may not have seen, there is an investigation by the DPP into the allegations in respect of Lord Lewin.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that, while I fully understand the need to protect the security of the state, the time has surely come when we should examine, review and reform the Official Secrets Act 1911? Further, will he call on the Leader of the Opposition to withdraw his scandalous accusation against the Prime Minister?

The Attorney-General: If I may seek the indulgence of the House, when I sought the authority of those responsible for the security side of the "crown jewels", I should have added that the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs was also consulted. The reform of the Official Secrets Act cannot be a matter for me but must be a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): Many of us are concerned that the Official Secrets Act is now being used less to protect national security than to protect the faces of Ministers. We in this House are concerned with the quality of information given to us by Ministers. In view of this jury verdict, will those in this House who really believe in law and order ensure that the rights of the House are safeguarded?

The Attorney-General: I think I have dealt with that point already, but I shall repeat it again. I found it interesting that the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), who shadows me, said on the radio just after one o'clock that, with regard to the leaking, he did not endorse in any way what had been done. I welcome that statement from him.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, had Mr. Ponting genuinely felt that any Minister was about to act improperly, he had a perfectly good chain of communication leading to the Prime Minister's Office itself, through which he could properly have registered his complaints and fears without resorting to the lies and deceptions with which he breached the trust placed in him? Did Mr. Ponting take those steps, and what are they?

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend is quite right. There is a recognised procedure, which Mr. Ponting did not follow in this case.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Did not two Ministers come here and deliberately tell untruths to the House of Commons? Is it not also true that Mr. Ponting decided that that was not good enough, and that his decision has been upheld by 12 men and women good and true? Is it not clear that if those Ministers involved had any decency whatever, and on the basis of our parliamentary traditions, they would resign from the Government forthwith? Does the Attorney-General also believe that the Government should take no notice of those Conservative Members who now want to introduce legislation that would make it impossible for decent people in future to tell the truth in the House of Commons?

The Attorney-General: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will find that a useful dummy run for the speech that he will make next week.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that this case shows that, despite the scaremongering from the Opposition Benches, jury vetting has a useful part to play?

The Attorney-General: I have a feeling that that could be taken in one of two ways. It is of interest that the Crown did not challenge anyone but that Mr. Ponting, through his counsel, at a random selection, removed three potential jurors.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Now that the court has specifically found that the disclosure of certain information was not a breach of the Official Secrets Act, will the Attorney-General, in anticipation of next week's debate, confirm that he will not initiate a prosecution against anyone who similarly discloses relevant information to Members of this House?

The Attorney-General: I thought I had made it clear, but I repeat, that I shall continue to apply the law as it is, looking at each case on its own particular facts.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that in the longer term the ideals of more open government are unlikely to be promoted by the surreptitious activities of a distraught civil servant?

The Attorney-General: Probably the most important and damaging consequence is the risk that it may result in a loss of confidence between Ministers and civil servants.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does the Attorney-General accept that, in the light of the verdict, his decision to prosecute must be regarded as an ineffective means of dealing with what he considered to be a serious breach of trust? That being so, where he believes that a risk to public security is involved, will he undertake to seek to rely, not on section 2 of the Official Secrets Act—long ago discredited—but on the other specific provisions of the Act which deal with matters of national security?

The Attorney-General: The problem is that there are none. For example, in practically every case in which I have granted my consent since 1979, there has either been a breach of security or information has been sent by a police officer to someone else, usually for corrupt purposes. In one case information was provided by an examiner in bankruptcy to a criminal, and that person had no right to be in possession of it. The question put to me must mean that no prosecution should be launched unless there is 100 per cent. certainty of the prosecution succeeding. To put such a question shows a total misconception of the duties of the prosecuting authorities.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House knows that there is to be a debate on this matter on Monday——

Hon. Members: No, there is not.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Leader of the House has announced a debate. I shall allow questions to continue for another five minutes and I shall then call the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), the shadow Attorney-General.

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): What worries so many of us is that the traditional trust and loyalty between Ministers and civil servants is being so gravely jeopardised. Will my right hon. and learned Friend point out to the Opposition leaders that if they were ever to regain power they would require that trust and loyalty which we expect?

The Attorney-General: I agree entirely. I was very interested in the passage that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister read out to the House during Question Time.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Did defence officials tell Mr. Ponting that if he resigned he would not be prosecuted? If so, was that offer made with the knowledge of the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General or the Secretary of State for Defence?

The Attorney-General: I had no knowledge. It was not made with approval by me, by my hon. and learned Friend or by any officials. I do not know, I cannot know what the Secretary of State for Defence said.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): Ask him.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that his hon. Friends on this side of the House applaud the decision he took in the first place to prosecute Mr. Ponting and that we also warmly welcome the fact, which is as helpful to the Civil Service as to anyone else, that he will prosecute in cases where people betray their trust? Will he not agree that if the Ponting ideal of loyalty becomes the norm, it has more dangers for the Civil Service than it does even for the Government?

The Attorney-General: I think I have made my view clear that there is a real risk of a loss of confidence between Ministers and civil servants. That is a matter which no doubt will be much more fully aired in the debate on Monday.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Do we take it from the answers that have been given today by the Attorney-General that he does not accept what has basically been confirmed in the court's decision: that a civil servant's duty first and foremost is to Parliament and not to a Government bent on misleading the House? Does he not accept on reflection that his own reputation and integrity would have been much higher today if he had worked on the same principle as Mr. Ponting?

The Attorney-General: I have not, in fact, intended to take or even contemplated taking any documents out of my office and giving them to the press, to the hon. Gentleman or to anybody else.

Mr. Home Robertson: Or to Parliament.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Does not my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the formal admission made by counsel for the defence at the beginning of the trial, together with the summing up of the judge, show that there was a strong prima facie case that would have led even the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) to prosecute?

The Attorney-General: I hope that the sort of approach that I would expect him to take might well have led to that result.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): The Attorney-General has told us that he was not aware of the offer made to Mr. Ponting that he would not be prosecuted if he resigned. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that, if he had known of that offer, he would not have consented to the prosecution? Will he also tell the House on how many other occasions has an Attorney-General consented to the prosecution under the Official Secrets Act 1911 without reading the papers and after a brief account of the facts over the telephone?

The Attorney-General: The Secretary of State for Defence has been kind enough to tell me that he did not know either of any offer that might have been made. If such immunity was offered it would have been offered without my consent. Immunity can only be offered in cases of this sort with the consent of one of the Law Officers.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that in spite of all the noise we have heard across the House today and in spite of all the excitement in the media, most ordinary people greatly applaud the decision he took? Although Mr. Ponting was acquitted by the jury, they are very distressed about the case and will welcome the debate on Monday on the General Belgrano.

The Attorney-General: I thank my hon. Friend for what he has said.

Mr. John Morris: On mature reflection, was there not an element of undue haste in the decision to prosecute in that information was drawn to the attention of the Director of Public Prosecutions on 13 August, including, as I understand it, the recommendation of the chief of the defence police, not to prosecute, and on 17 August, four days later, the Attorney-General agreed to prosecute? As we understand it, he was on holiday and presumably, as the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) indicated, had no papers with him. Is that not unique? Does the Attorney-General agree that there is a need for a much more restrictive Act and, in particular, to balance the public interest according to his own words, which I commend to him:

"But the public interest also requires that there is no misuse of secrecy to cover up errors or bungling or to avoid criticism." —[Official Report, 15 June 1978; Vol. 951, c. 1258.]

Those were the words of the Attorney-General himself in the House on 15 June 1978.

The Attorney-General: I do not think there was undue haste. It was a very lengthy telephone conversation— [Laughter]——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Attorney-General.

The Attorney-General: —on matters which were in a small compass, which were of no major difficulty and on which I already had the benefit of the very helpful and careful advice of my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General and the very experienced views of the Director of Public Prosecutions. In those circumstances there was in my view no undue haste.

The fact that the decision was taken on holiday is not unique. I suspect there were many occasions on which the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), when he was Home Secretary, had to take decisions about warrants when he was out of the office. I am sure it must have happened in other cases.

The right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), requesting a much more restrictive Act, quoted words of mine which I am not ashamed to agree with. That was tried in 1979 in a Bill in which the incoming Government reacted with great speed to the Franks report, very much unlike the complete lack of action by the Labour Government over the previous six years. That Bill did not meet with the approval of the other place. There was a great deal of criticism gummed together by Fleet street—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I am not afraid to take on Fleet street. A lot of it was clearly inspired from Fleet street; there is no doubt about it. One had only to read the articles, press criticism and comment at the time. As a result of that the Bill was withdrawn. At least we tried. It is much more than that lot over there did. Since then, as the House knows, the Prime Minister has said that there is no intent to try to reform it again. That is the position as I know it today.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Ordered,

That European Community Documents Nos. 9219/83 and 11039/84, draft Directive and amendment on air quality standards for nitrogen dioxide, and 11159/83, Communication from the Commission concerning environmental policy in the field of combatting air pollution be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents. — [Mr. Biffen.]

References to Members

4.49 pm

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not in accordance with the traditions of the House that we treat each other and speak of each other as hon. Members? When an hon. Member accuses another of dishonesty and the Member accused denies that accusation, and when that denial is supported and confirmed by another hon. Member who is in the best position to make a decision and to give us the truth, is it not right that the Member making that accusation should withdraw it totally at the time?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have listened with great care to what was said this afternoon. It is right that we do not impute dishonour to each other, but what the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition said was that he did not himself believe it. That is a different matter.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. What I said, and Hansard will show it tomorrow, was that my words stand unless and until I receive an adequate explanation of the decision, in the circumstances, to prosecute Mr. Ponting when no breach of national security had taken place.

Solicitors (Independent Complaints Procedure)

4.50 pm

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to reform the system of investigating complaints against solicitors by establishing a General Legal Council independent of the Law Society; and for connected purposes.

The purpose of the Bill is to establish a new procedure for investigating complaints against solicitors. We do not know how many such complaints there would be if the public had confidence in the present system. According to the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, it has received about 10,000 queries a year relating to the quality of solicitors' work. In its annual report, the Law Society says that it received 9,000 inquiries and complaints, although 2,000 of these came from members of the profession.

The main thrust of my Bill concerns the existing functions of the Law Society and how to replace them by a different system. The Law Society has three functions. It looks after the interests of the profession, it administers the legal aid system and it investigates the complaints by members of the public against solicitors. I contend that what I am seeking to do could not be called something that is against lawyers or the Law Society. I maintain that the Law Society has a major conflict of interest in trying to look after the interests of the profession on the one hand and investigating complaints made against members of the profession on the other. This conflict of interest has been recognised as existing by other professions who arrange their affairs differently—for example, the medical and architectural professions.

The Law Society itself is aware of this conflict of interests. In 1984, its professional purposes committee wrote:

"The Society is accused of putting the interests of the profession and of individual solicitors before the interests of the public when dealing with complaints. At worse the accusation is that the Society is 'whitewashing' members of the profession; at best there is unease on the part of the responsible critics that justice is not seen to be done because the Society is judge and jury in the profession's own cause."

In the previous year, 1983, there was a joint submission by the the Police Federation and the Law Society about the proposed police complaints and discipline system. This said:

"The public does not believe that the present system is impartial. The public does not believe that complaints against the police are fairly investigated and adjudicated. The police investigate and then judge complaints against them within the police service."

It seems to me that what the Law Society has said about complaints against the police applies equally to complaints against solicitors. Furthermore, in the code of professional conduct produced by the Law Society, there is a paragraph that talks about the conflict of interest when a solicitor may represent more than one party. I should have thought that, by analogy, all these points reflect adversely upon the Law Society's conflict of interest. That is understood.

The public may lay several types of complaint against a solicitor. They may concern his conduct, his negligence or what the Administration of Justice Bill refers to as inadequate professional services. By their very nature, these are hard to define or classify. Individual complaints may go from one of these headings to another.

The present system for investigating complaints has at its core the Law Society. I have looked with some interest at the pamphlet produced by the Law Society entitled "Complaints About Solicitors". About half of the pamphlet says what the Law Society cannot do and talks about consulting another solicitor in such circumstances. However, there are a number of detailed questions that the individual should answer for himself before deciding whether there is a basis for an approach to the professional purposes committee of the Law Society. I should have thought that, for the average person in the street, this represents a formidable hurdle, and explains why many people are reluctant to take their complaints to the Law Society in this way.

There are other features of the present system, to which I shall refer only in passing because time does not permit a more detailed analysis. There is the solicitors disciplinary tribunal, to which the public can refer complaints if they are willing to pay costs, but to which, in the normal course of events, there are only references from the Law Society. There is a negligence panel run by the Law Society to help individual complainants find solicitors when they wish to pursue actions for negligence. There are the courts to which the individual has the right of recourse in the case of negligence, and there is the lay observer, whose responsiblity is to look into the way in which the Law Society is investigating complaints where there is dissatisfaction about how this is being done.

Apart from conflict of interest, there is much dissatisfaction with the way that the Law Society handles complaints. Since I became interested in this subject some time ago, and particularly over the past week or two, I have had virtually an avalanche of complaints about the way that the Law Society handles complaints. Letters and telephone calls keep coming to me, and not one has done anything other than support my stand.

There was the famous Glanville Davies case, and I do not want to say too much about that. However, the Ely report which looked into the matter on behalf of the Law Society said:

"The whole episode is a disgrace to the Law Society. We can find few aspects of the complaints that were handled properly."

There is concern that the Law Society will not look into complaints about its solicitors presented by a third party. There is concern about the large number of refusals to investigate other types of complaints by the Law Society. Many constituents and other people have come to me with complaints about fees in immigration cases and so on, and there has been either unhappiness at what the Law Society has done or an unwillingness even to contemplate going to the Law Society.

The purpose of my Bill is to establish a new body called the general legal council. This would consist of solicitors and representatives of consumer organisations such as the National Consumer Protection Council, the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, the Consumers Association and the Legal Action Group. To allay the concern of the profession, the Bill will make provision for a bare majority of solicitors on the council. All the members of the body will not be appointed by the Lord Chancellor. They will have a qualified staff to help them.

The functions of the general legal council will be to have an independent method of investigating complaints against solicitors, to be the sole focus of complaints. That means that one would have only one place to go to for the complaint to be dealt with, even if subsequently it were decided that the solicitors' complaints tribunal might be the appropriate body to deal with a case of misconduct.

Because of the complexity of complaints, the general legal council would have a responsibility to advise and help individual complaintants as to how to proceed further with their complaints. Taking a leaf out of the Administration of Justice Bill, which is going through the other place at the moment, I believe that it is right that the new body I propose should be able to remit part of or the whole of the fees that have been collected by a solcitor if that body feels that there is substance in the complaint.

The general legal council would be able to deal with matters of negligence. The council would have an arbitration panel which would seek to resolve questions of negligence within a £2,000 limit. If arbitration did not work, or if the sum of money was clearly larger than £2,000, there would still have to be recourse to the courts.

I submit that my proposals are popular among many people who feel that they are not getting justice when they complain about their solicitors. The Bill is popular because it is supported by a wide variety of bodies — for example, the National Consumer Protection Council and the Legal Action Group. I believe that it makes sense that the solicitors' profession, for which I have enormous respect, should handle its affairs differently so that the Law Society's responsibilities are distinct from complaints against solicitors. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Alfred Dubs, Ms. Jo Richardson, Ms. Clare Short, Ms. Harriet Harman, Mr. Clive Soley, Mr. Austin Mitchell, Mr. Andrew F. Bennett, Mr. Chris Smith and Mr. Tony Blair.

Solicitors (Independent Complaints Procedure)

Mr. Alfred Dubs accordingly presented a Bill to reform the system of investigating complaints against solicitors by establishing a General Legal Council independent of the Law Society; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 19 April and to be printed. [Bill 81.]

Orders of the Day

Transport Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: More than 34 right hon. and hon. Members have indicated their wish to take part in the debate. I propose to apply the 10-minute limit to speeches between 7 pm and 8.50 pm. I hope that those right hon. and hon. Members who speak before 7 pm, especially Privy Councillors, will bear in mind the limit that will be applied to Back Benchers.

I must tell the House that I have selected the motion in the name of the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry).

5.1 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

May I first say a word about the amendment in the names of some members of the Select Committee on Transport and others. I am sorry that Committee members were not able to publish their report before Second Reading today. I hope that they will be able to get the report out before the Committee stage. They have toiled long and hard. The Bill is a major part of the Government's legislative programme. It is also a large Bill. If we are to have sufficient debate in Committee on the Bill's many detailed provisions, we must set it on its course. I look forward to seeing the Committee's report, which no doubt will be of great assistance to hon. Members.

The purpose of the Bill is to halt the decline that has afflicted the bus industry for more than 20 years. Many have assumed — wrongly — that that decline was inevitable. It was not. One of the principal causes of the decline was the system of regulations and near-monopoly — the 50-year-old road service licensing rules which embodied an assumption that the best way to protect bus services was to restrict the numbers that could operate.

The Bill is about competition. We want to see operators free to provide the services that the customers want. We want to see competition providing an incentive to be efficient and to offer passengers a better quality of service. The customers may want greater efficiency, lower fares, smaller buses going into residential estates, greater comfort or a more polite and helpful driver. Competition is the key to these improvements. It is the key to increasing patronage.

The present bus regulations date from the 1930s, but the bus industry must learn to meet the challenge of the 1980s. That challenge comes from the private car. As more people enjoy the use of a car, so bus travel has declined, both relatively and absolutely. The industry's response has been to demand, and local authorities' response has been to grant, escalating levels of subsidy. Revenue support between 1972 and 1982 increased from £10 million to £520 million. Even this staggering increase has not halted the decline. It seems to be assumed that if only there was a little bit more subsidy everything would miraculously be all right. The industry was saying the same thing five or even 10 years ago. It got its way. Subsidy increased. But have services improved? Are the customers now satisfied?

By concentrating too narrowly on subsidy, the industry has neglected its market. Blanket subsidy will never solve the problems of the bus or any other industry. Industries have to adjust to their market, increase it if they can, and eventually live by it. In the short term, subsidies can help to ease the transition from a regulated to a competitive market. Subsidy is also crucially important in the provision of transport for people who do not have access to a car and who live in remote areas or need to travel at unpopular times of day or week. The Bill marks a change from subsidy to the industry—a subsidy that all too often has leaked into costs — to subsidy for those passengers who need it.

The Bill is not about reducing subsidy. It is about putting life back into the industry and making sure that the country gets the best value it can for the customer.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): Bearing in mind what the right hon. Gentleman has said about the need to halt the decline, does he agree that, far from there being a decline in south Yorkshire, during the past 10 years there has been a constant expansion of the bus service with the benefit of subsidies? Does that not destroy the right hon. Gentleman's argument that subsidies do not prevent decline? In south Yorkshire those subsidies have prevented a decline. Would it not be better to extend the south Yorkshire system to the whole country?

Mr. Ridley: There has been a massive increase in the subsidy in south Yorkshire. Speaking from memory, the subsidy is about £60 million, 49 per cent. of which comes from taxpayers' funds. That is more than the nation can afford.

In looking only to subsidy—as the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) and south Yorkshire have—as a solution, we have overlooked the depressing effects of 50 years of regulation on the efficiency and responsiveness of the industry. Whenever an industry is regulated, some of the freedom of the customer to buy what he wants is removed. One begins to discourage and turn away one's best customers. Passengers on profitable or potentially profitable routes pay higher fares than they ought. The industry becomes defensive. Old markets and old routes are protected at the cost of other passengers. There is plenty of life in the local bus market but it is being stifled by regulation.

Thirty-nine per cent. of households do not have the use of a car. In the 61 per cent. of households which have the use of a car, many members will seldom or never be able to use it. That is the bus's natural captive market—a substantial home base for any industry. The bus industry should be trying also to persuade people who have regular use of a car to take a bus—by providing a service which can be relied upon to turn up on time, and which takes them where they want to go at a price they are prepared to pay.

There is evidence of latent demand. We were told in 1980 that there was no demand for express services; indeed the hon. Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) predicted in 1979 that, as a result of the Government's proposals for freeing express coach services,

"In five years' time nothing will remain of the existing public transport system. There will be a substantial loss of jobs in the transport industry." — [Official Report, 27 November 1979; Vol. 974, c. 1218.]

It is now five years on and competitive operators have proved him wrong. There has been a 40 per cent. increase in patronage of express coaches. Fares have fallen sharply. The number of express services has increased. Quality has improved. We also have direct evidence that local bus markets do not have to decline. The National Bus Company's new high frequency minibus services in Exeter have brought an increase of 100 per cent. in patronage because they have provided what people want.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): The right hon. Gentleman was talking about the use of cars. Is he aware that in parts of my constituency that are 10 miles away from the city centre, where 94 per cent. of young people are unemployed and 70 per cent. of people are receiving social security benefits, people are likely to be denied a bus service because it would not be profitable? Seventy-five per cent. of those people have no use of car whatever. Will he give an assurance that those people will be catered for under his Bill?

Mr. Ridley: It is because of areas like those to which the hon. Gentleman is referring that it is necessary to reform the bus industry so that the people can be transported to where they want to go at reasonable cost. That is the whole purpose of the Bill. I give the assurance which the hon. Gentleman requires that services will benefit, not suffer, from what we are proposing.

The potential for expansion exists in both urban and rural areas. In rural areas the growth of car ownership and the decline in bus transport have had a very damaging effect on mobility for those who have to rely on it. This Bill will improve the services in those areas in three ways.

First, the tendering system will enable much better value to be got for the money councils spend on rural services. Not only will operators be able to offer vehicles of a size suitable to the demand, but the effects of competition will reduce the costs of running uneconomic routes, making many more of them viable.

Secondly, there is to be a transitional grant—£20 million in the first year, reducing by even steps over four years—which will be paid direct to operators through the fuel duty rebate mechanism until the full benefits of competition have worked their way through.

Thirdly, there is to be a rural services grant, administered in England by the Development Commission and in Scotland and Wales by my right hon. Friends.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Would my right hon. Friend like to comment on the suggestion by some district and county authorities in rural areas that this Bill may be a threat to them because of the threat of phasing out the cross-subsidy from commercially viable routes?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend could not have intervened at a better moment, because that is exactly what I want to do. I will give him some examples of what has happened in rural areas when a competitive element has been allowed in.

First we have the three trial areas. Before I comment on those I would like to remind the House of some of the predictions about them made by Opposition Members during the passage of the 1980 Transport Act.

We were told that if any authority was rash enough to take advantage of the trial area provisions

"The result would be that bus operators would charge skyhigh fares on profitable routes and provide no services on other routes where there may be more need." — [Official Report, 27 November 1979; Vol. 974, c. 1215.]

[Mr. Ridley]

That was the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson).

What has happened? In the Hereford and Worcester trial areas fares have fallen sharply on many routes, and the subsidy requirement has been dramatically reduced by 38 per cent. But, most important of all, the level of services provided has increased by 70 per cent. in Hereford town. It has also increased marginally in the rural areas, where services have been declining fast elsewhere. The passengers, as my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State can testify from personal experience, think they have never had it so good.

Through tendering for services, Norfolk county council obtained a reduction from £500,000 to £150,000 in the cost of subsidising an identical group of services, and Surrey council is about to save £200,000 through obtaining tenders for a group of services around Guildford. The House must assume that, if savings of that order are available in Herefordshire, Norfolk and Guildford, they are available elsewhere. With savings like this from greater efficiency local authorities can provide better rural services for the same money, or provide the same services for less money. This gives county councils an opportunity to improve rural services at less cost. That is the answer to my hon. Friend, and he will find that county councils have an opportunity both to provide more services and to save money.

There are lessons here, as well, for all areas of the country. The effect of competition will be to reduce costs dramatically. It will bring into profitability services which were previously considered unprofitable. Fares on main routes will be reduced. Operators will look for and exploit new markets and offer new products. All experience is that the person who benefits from competition is the customer. That is the truth that all the propagandists, all the lobbies fearful of having their monopolies threatened by competition, have tried to hide.

If the market is to develop we must remove the obstacles that confront the innovator. So clause 1 of the Bill sets out to reverse the decline of the bus industry by the abolition of road service licensing. If the Opposition parrot cries were true that the aim of this Bill was to achieve a free-for-all for cowboys creaming off the profits with clapped-out buses—a charge to which I note the private sector has taken great exception—there would be no more than clause 1. There are in fact 113 further clauses. These seek to achieve a flexible and competitively structured industry within a framework of stringent controls to ensure reliability and safety and of local authority powers to meet the needs of those not served by the market, and of elderly and disabled people.

The existing requirements for operator licensing will continue, and clauses 21 to 28 contain a number of new provisions to modify and tighten up those requirements. Let there be no doubt about the Government's commitment to maintain operator standards and to provide the means to take firm action against operators who abuse the freedom which this Bill gives.

The provisions are linked to the system of registration which is set down in clause 5. An operator wishing to run a local service must register the route, stopping places and other details with the traffic commissioner. He must give notice of his intention to start or discontinue a service, and he must run the service in accordance with the registration.

Under clause 23 an operator who runs unreliable services or does not register them may have his public service vehicle operator's licence restricted. That can also happen if he interferes with another operator or behaves dangerously or recklessly, or if his maintenance is inadequate.

Under clause 91 an operator stands to lose 20 per cent. of the fuel duty rebate due to him for all local services run by him during the previous three months if he fails to register or runs a registered service unreliably. These are serious sanctions. We are committed to making the registration system work to ensure reliability.

Clauses 6 to 8 give the traffic commissioner powers to impose traffic regulation conditions where there are problems of severe traffic congestion or danger to the public. These powers are new; they have never been suggested before. They can be used to stop operators using unsuitable streets, to limit the use of bus stops or to prevent congestion caused by bunching by allotting the use of stops at different times to different operators.

With the ending of road service licensing there is no longer a need for a body of three traffic commissioners. Instead, clause 3 provides for a single commissioner, the existing Chairman of Traffic Commissioners, to be the authority for operator licensing for both passenger and goods vehicle operators and the new registration authority. I think that the whole House would like to thank all those who have served as traffic commissioners for the excellent service that they have given over many years.

In London, for the time being, road service licensing will continue and part II of the Bill essentially re-enacts existing legislation. Clause 44 enables me to bring deregulation to London also. But first we must see through the major changes that were introduced in London less than a year ago. Indeed, London Regional Transport management has to tackle a legacy of appalling inefficiency.

We also want flexibility between different types of vehicle. Clauses 9 to 14 bring taxis and hire cars into the mainstream of public transport, and restrict a local authority's power to limit the issue of taxi licences as already happens in Scotland.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): I should be most grateful if my right hon. Friend could spare a second to cover a point that involves chapter 6 of the White Paper. In paragraph 6.5 there is talk of a gradual increase in the number of cabs. It states:

"The Government will propose provisions to relax progressively the restrictions on the number of taxis which operate in some areas."

I have not been able to find the relevant provision in the Bill. Is it covered by clause 14?

Mr. Ridley: Clause 14(2) contains the relevant amending provision which produces the pressure slowly to reduce the restrictions on taxi licensing.

Sir John Page (Harrow, West): Why does the Bill discriminate against 30,000 private hire car drivers in London, who are not allowed to take part in the sharing scheme despite the fact that there is probably the greatest demand for it in London?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend has discussed that matter with me. I think that the Committee will want to debate that point. It is a question of whether we should have supervision and licensing of hire cars, with all the bureaucracy and expense that goes with that, or whether the present arrangements, which most people find satisfactory, should continue. However, I am happy for the Committee to consider that issue to see where the balance of advantage lies.

There are three ways in which taxis can operate in future. First, passengers may still hire a taxi for their own exclusive use. Secondly, clauses 9 and 10 make it possible for people who wish to share a taxi or hire car to pay separate fares. Thirdly, clause 11 allows licensed taxis to be used to provide regular local services.

In order to be sure that competition is fair, the Bill contains proposals for the restructuring of the bus industry. To abolish road service licensing without tackling the issue of competition on fair terms would be reckless. Freed from the constraints which road licensing imposes, companies could use their market strength, bolstered by public subsidy, to stifle their competitors. That is, indeed, what they are trying to do in Hereford.

I turn first to the National Bus Company. It is required to submit to me plans for the disposal of its operations to the private sector and to implement those agreed plans within three years. The main objective of the company will be to promote sustained and fair competition not only at the disposal stage but also in the behaviour of local subsidiaries competing in the deregulated market.

We want local managers of the National Bus Company and their employees to own as much and as many of these companies as possible and the Bill makes special provision for that.

Secondly, the passenger transport executives and some 50 district and regional councils at present have their own bus undertakings. By the time deregulation takes place they will be required to form Companies Act companies to which they will transfer the bus undertakings. These new companies will be at arm's length from local authorities, and will have to compete on fair terms with other operators. After deregulation it will not be possible to subsidise the companies directly except with my consent. The separation of the bus undertakings from the PTEs is the first step in reorganising the metropolitan bus undertakings into several separate competing companies. Clause 58 provides the necessary powers to require break-up after the transitional period.

I should like at this point to refer to a provision which is not in the Bill, but which is an integral part of our policy for competition. I refer to the removal of the present exemption of bus service operators from the provisions of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act. To continue that exemption would be incompatible with competition. It can be removed by an order made under the Restrictive Trade Practices Act.

One matter of concern during the consultation has been the role of local authorities. In a free competitive market it no longer makes sense for local authorities to have a duty to co-ordinate public transport. Instead clause 55 places a duty on them to secure powers to subsidise passenger services which are not provided by the market. These are powers to promote the use of transport services generally, provided that they do not inhibit competition. Local authorities will be able to discuss the transport needs of their areas with the operators, to provide timetables and to advise the traffic commissioners about traffic problems. Their role is if anything increased.

Local authorities are required to seek competitive tenders for subsidised services under clauses 80 to 84. Open tendering will ensure that all bus operators will have equal access to subsidy; that local ratepayers know what bus services are being bought at what cost to them; and that local authorities will be able to get the best value for money in their use of subsidy.

Clause 80 places a duty on local authorities to consider their expenditure on public and school transport services as a whole in order to get best value for money. These functions must not go on in isolation from each other. This is an important way to get more effective use of public money.

Mr. Christopher Hawkins (High Peak): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the widespread concern that has been generated by the campaigns run by Opposition parties in my constituency and many other constituencies to frighten old and disabled people into believing that the Bill will abolish bus passes? Will he condemn such scaremongering, and take this opportunity to reaffirm that under the Bill bus passes can continue? Will he give us any details of how they will operate under the new system?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. The Bill gives the lie to the scare stories that my hon. Friend has heard to the effect that the powers of local authorities to provide concessionary fare schemes for elderly, blind and disabled people will go. That is simply not true. But we seek to make them more widely available and to allow any operator who wishes to do so to participate. That represents an extension. Nor does the Bill force local authorities to use tokens rather than bus passes. Some local authorities already operate bus pass schemes with a number of operators. Therefore, I am sure that my hon. Friend will tell those who have been spreading scare stories—and some local authorities have spent a lot of ratepayers' money on propagating scare stories—that they have been wasting the ratpayers' money in throwing it around on something that is not true.

The Bill also clarifies local authorities' powers to provide concessionary fares——

Mr. Gordon A. T. Bagier (Sunderland, South): The right hon. Gentleman has been paying a lot of lip service to the experiment in Herefordshire, but is he aware that Hereford council has stated categorically that the experiment has led to "reduced benefit to recipients of Concessionary Travel Schemes as a result of the unstable fares and the necessary adoption of a token system".

Does that not give the lie to the right hon. Gentleman's statement?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has kindly given me another point. The cheaper the fares are, the less concessionary fare passes will cost. If, as in Hereford, there are free buses running, concessionary fares will cost nothing. Through competition, the Bill's provisions will lead to a reduction in fares on many routes, and the local authorities will be able to make savings by not having to pay so much for concessionary fare passes.

The transitional provisions in schedule 5 are important. They are a result of the consultation exercise. Our aim is to achieve as smooth a transition as possible allowing competition to emerge gradually without giving an unfair competitive advantage to any one class of operator and without disrupting services on which passengers rely. Road service licensing is to be replaced by the registration system on 1 October 1986. By then local authorities will be required to have completed the move from network to tendered subsidy and to have transferred their bus undertakings to companies, and the National Bus Company to have reorganised its operations to ensure fair competition.

Road service licensing criteria will be modified in this period to allow greater competition. The traffic commissioners will be required to accept an application unless the new service would disrupt arrangements being made by local authorities to effect a smooth transition, unless the applicant would be able to compete unfairly because he was still receiving blanket subsidies or unless the new service would create severe traffic problems.

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): On the question of transition, will the Secretary of State look at his diary? Does he realise that 1 October 1986 is mid-week? In fact, it falls on a Wednesday so that one system will be in operation on a Tuesday and a different one on the next day. Contracts must be drawn up with operators, often on a weekly basis. Did he consider that when he chose 1 October?

Mr. Ridley: I shall look at my diary if the right hon. Gentleman will read the Bill. He will observe that there is clearly set out in the Bill a transitional period in which all these things will happen so that they are complete by 1 October. The situation will not change dramatically overnight because everything will have been put into place.

The Bill also contains the provisions on bus substitution services that the Select Committee suggested in 1983. The railways board may put forward proposals for bus substitution in situations where existing rail services are making significant operating losses and where buses can provide travellers with a reasonable alternative service at substantially lower cost of operation.

It will be for the railways board to put forward proposals for bus substitution in particular places, and I would take account of those bus substitution proposals in deciding whether to give my consent to any proposal from the board to withdraw rail passenger services from a particular line. This is an area where the Select Committee can see its work reflected in our proposals.

My proposals for the bus industry have been called radical. They are; nothing less would do. It is strange that these days the word radical frightens the Opposition parties to death. The Labour party's radicalism is to throw more public money at any problem that it observes. Liberal radicalism has become agreement with everyone who has a complaint in the hope of picking up the odd vote. But bus services are too important to too many people. We cannot shirk reform. We cannot sit idly by and watch the bus industry sink further into decline, leaving more people isolated. There is far more to this Bill than deregulation, far more than privatisation. It is a full-scale rescue plan for the bus industry. It sets local authorities free to concentrate on help for people who need it. It sets operators free to compete and find markets in order better to serve their customers. In short, the Bill puts the passengers first. I commend it to the House.

5.33 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): It is important to establish what the Bill is and what it is not. First, it is not a Bill about improving public transport. The one thing that is absolutely certain is that the Secretary of State has pushed ahead with the legislation irrespective of the fact that he has no proper evidence to prove that it is necessary, that a Select Committee of the House has been taking detailed evidence which would have enabled him to come to some sensible conclusions and that, even after the rapid run round the country which passed for consultation on the part of his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, there is still nobody of any status or with any real knowledge of the transport industry who imagines that the legislation will improve the bus services.

The Bill is about the two pet obsessions of the Secretary of State. One is privatisation and the other is deregulation. It is therefore important that we should examine closely what is being introduced to the House in such a hurried and incompetent manner.

The Bill will not provide a better service for children on their way to school. It will not improve facilities for old-age pensioners who need concessionary fares. It will not provide a more efficient service for women who rely on public transport to do their shopping and to get to the doctor and to other essential services.

The Bill is about the Secretary of State's wish to save money on subsidies. He has made that plain from the beginning of the debate. His attitude towards public service is that it should be provided free of charge preferably and with no protection for the people working in the industry or for those who wish to benefit from the services. He made that clear in the explanatory statement. He says that of course 50,000 jobs will have to go, but that other jobs will be provided in the public service.

The change that the Secretary of State is proposing will lead to total anarchy. No such measure is applied anywhere in the world except in Kenya, which has now decided that it needs a form of regulation, and in Hong Kong, which has one or two minor differences from the United Kingdom of Britain and Northern Ireland. Such a measure when applied in other places has been found over a period to lead to total anarchy and chaos.

The attitude of the Secretary of State is that people should be prepared to go and buy cars and, if they cannot do that, they must travel by taxi. That argument has threaded through consideration of the Bill.

The National Federation of Women's Institutes, an organisation not normally connected with revolutionary ideas, was so worried by the implications of the Bill that it carried out a survey of 4,000 members. It found that 50 per cent. of women in the Oxford group had no day-time car, 40 per cent. of women in the area had no car licence, 30 per cent. needed the bus once a week or more and, of 237 towns and villages covered in the survey, only 33 had an evening service. Therefore, the majority of women, for shopping and medical attention, needed the advantages of a bus. The NFWI said that the effect of the legislation would be for women in rural areas to be left totally isolated, and that its anxiety had turned to despair. It said that only those with two cars per family in the country would be able to have decent lives.

The effect of the legislation will be that not only those who live in villages will suffer. Those who live in large cities where shopping centres and hospitals are concentrated on the periphery will also suffer.

Mr. Colin Shepherd rose——

Mrs. Dunwoody: I will give way to any female member of the Government. [HON. MEMBERS: "Sexism."]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): It is clear that the hon. Lady is not giving way.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: I am most grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way. This is an important matter to the women of the country. When the hon. Lady wrote to the National Federation of Women's Institutes, did it tell her that the Herefordshire federation did not share the view of the national federation? It is the north Herefordshire women who have been living and working in the trial area during the past three years.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I shall come to the Hereford experiment later and go into it in very great detail. I shall then comment on the hon. Gentleman's point.

The reality is that nationally 30 per cent. of women have car licences, compared with 68 per cent. of men. In the west Midlands, women account for 60 per cent. of the passengers of the bus companies. Among old-age pensioners, 14 women use buses for every six men. It is important, therefore, that we are aware who will be especially concerned with and damaged by the proposals.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): The House would find it tremendously helpful if the hon. Lady could explain why the Bill, which is removing regulations that are controlling the system and not allowing it to liberate, will discriminate against women. In fact, it will help women by providing many more services, especially in rural areas where it will bring women into the towns. That is a good thing, not a bad thing.

Mrs. Dunwoody rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As a large number of hon. Members on both sides of the House will seek to catch my eye during the debate, I must tell the House that in deciding whom to call, I shall take into account the interventions made and the extent to which they have pre-empted other hon. Members.

Mrs. Dunwoody: It is very important to understand that the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) comes from an area with large spreads of villages and very few buses. He will soon find that in the South Hams area those who need buses will have their interests badly damaged by the Bill. The reason lies precisely in the effect of deregulation, which we have just been told is the most important aspect of the Bill.

The reality is that the entire legislation has been brought forward on the basis of what we were told were a number of experiments. The Hereford experiment has been mentioned time and again. We were told that deregulation and the conversion of municipal and NBC operations into private companies would wholly transform any provision and that in identifying unprofitable routes and the tendering for private contracts, the bus industry would be liberated and better services would be provided for everyone.

The reality in Hertfordshire, and especially in Herefordshire, was the opposite. In Hereford, the rural areas were, without exception, worse off at the end of the experiment than at the beginning. It is true that in the centre of the town there were initially a number of additional buses. However, they did not come in a properly timetabled manner nor in a way that provided better facilities. Some of the fares went down initially, with some operators actually running free services.

One does not need to be too brilliant an economist to work out that no company can continue to run free services for any length of time if it is, first, to replace its existing stock and, secondly, to provide decent conditions for those who work for it. Yet we are told by the Secretary of State that that is not a problem because in future those who want to run buses will have total freedom to do so. The right hon. Gentleman has actually suggested that those who are out of work can rush out and buy a bus and operate it in the areas where they are unemployed. Far from creating new jobs, this legislation will do one simple thing—it will make it extremely difficult to maintain any safety standards for the passengers. I would have thought that even Conservative Members would be concerned about that.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Tell us about London Transport.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I shall be happy to discuss London Transport in a minute. If the Secretary of State really believed that the Bill was the answer to providing a new transport system, surely he would have been before the House today saying that it should be brought in for London as soon as possible. The actual contradiction to his present argument lies in the fact that he has an opportunity to introduce the scheme in London, but he has no intention of doing so.

Any public industry must have a safety responsibility to its passengers. In Hereford, some of the private operators were found to have many dangerous faults in their buses—47 in one instance, and the operator lost his licence. One man was maintaining his buses in a layby —which is the ideal way to ensure a high standard of public service vehicles. Other operators were found to have a number of major faults in their buses. But we are told by the Secretary of State that we do not have to bother with all that, because he will monitor the effects carefully to ensure that all public service vehicles maintain a very high standard of safety.

All sides agree that, at least initially, we may have a larger number of smaller bus operators providing services —even if those services, almost inevitably, cover a smaller number of routes. There is no doubt that one effect [illegible]ough smaller bus companies will be additional pr[illegible] in maintaining the standard of the vehicles. Even if we ignore the business methods of the sort of people who will try to cream off any profitable routes, and look at everybody across the board, additional problems will be created simply because of the size and viability of the companies.

The Leeds institute for transport studies, in the most thorough survey of deregulation to date, quotes a survey of 478 bus operators in Yorkshire. It found that small companies with one or two buses were eight times more likely to have defects than the major companies with 50 or more buses. That also applied to the number of defect notices per million vehicle kilometres—the figure was absolutely minimal at the top end of the scale compared with operators with one or two vehicles. One reason is that a small company cannot afford its own maintenance yards and equipment. No matter how honest the new operators, safety standards inevitably decline.

[Mrs. Dunwoody]

The evidence from the Government's trial areas is very instructive. Four new operators emerged in the Hereford trial area. The Devon and Norfolk areas were not considered to have shown the effects of deregulation. Of the four in Hereford, one company had its licence reduced and was then banned in February 1983. The operator had broken 47 safety codes, 27 of them immediate — meaning that they needed immediate attention. The traffic commissioner, in banning the operator, said:

"to allow you to continue to hold a PSV operator's licence for any longer than is absolutely necessary could result in death or injury to the public."

In March 1984, another operator had his licence reduced following more complaints.

From the evidence that exists, it is clear that more companies with more safety problems and more operators with even less interest in safety will enormously increase the strain on the traffic commissioners. Without additional resources — and although the Secretary of State has spoken about the need to maintain a proper service, he has given no sign that he will provide the proper resources —the traffic commissioners will inevitably have to shift from preventing the operation of unsuitable companies to picking up the pieces and banning the companies after they have proven to be inadequate for the task in hand.

The work of the traffic commissioners for road haulage and passenger vehicles will be merged under one person. An assurance is needed that the work per employee will not be increased. There are signs that the merger may lead to overall reductions in staff available and consequently to even less monitoring of the safety provisions.

The White Paper promised new safeguards to ensure that safety standards were maintained. The control, to which the Secretary of State referred this afternoon with great approval, means that the traffic commissioner is able to prevent dangerous traffic conditions or severe traffic congestion. Those are the circumstances in which he can operate.

However, clause 7 says that an operator cannot be assumed to operate the proper service

"solely by reason of his complying with any traffic regulation conditions."

It is clear that part-time drivers working on the buses as a second job could become the norm. Otherwise, why is it so essential we should introduce those changes? All the threats to safety that that implies have been glossed over both this afternoon and in the talks that the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary of State have had with all the people concerned.

Clause 81 says that tenders

"may not include conditions with respect to the terms of employment".

In other words, we shall have no way of knowing what hours the people operating the buses will be working and how tired they will be. After 50 years of proper controls, the chance of bad crashes caused by over-tired drivers will be introduced as a law.

Inevitably, the Bill will affect those that we are told will be protected. The Secretary of State says that in future local authorities can, if they wish, hand out bus passes. Let us consider the whole business of concessionary fares. The Government say that they have not been banned, but they never refer to the fact that many authorities will not only be rate-capped but will be constantly told that they are in danger of going into penalty. The spread of operators alone will make travel cards, which are a great asset to many old age pensioners, extremely difficult to use. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"]

Hon. Members do not seem to understand that, if there are many different operators on the same routes, there will, almost inevitably, be constant arguments over who is eligible to use travel cards. Inevitably, local authorities will move towards a system of tokens. One effect of that, which nobody ever wants to discuss, is that free travel comes to an end when all the tokens have been used up. At the moment, many elderly passengers go backwards and forwards using travel cards to do their shopping, to go out for entertainment, to receive medical attention and to go away at the weekends. That will not be possible under a system of tokens, which will be a much lower standard of provision. The scheme is completely indiscriminate since every operator must be given access to it. The only control that the authorities will have is if the charges are unusually high. A difficult service or an unhelpful company cannot be banned under the existing legislation.

The Government will claim that they have extended the scheme to children, but it emerges from schedule 7 that, although they have maintained the Scottish right to aid the mentally handicapped, there is no similar provision for those elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

The Government have already decided that next year they will cut concessionary fare grants by £48 million— more than 20 per cent. With the rate capping of the metropolitan county PTAs, the concessions will be of astonishingly little use.

It is not only the elderly and those in receipt of concessionary fares who will suffer. Those who live in the country will be particularly affected. Services will be disrupted. The National Bus Company is the main service in the counties and the cross-subsidy is worth at least £122 million. The institute of transport studies in Leeds estimates that it could be as high as £305 million. That will be lost because the Secretary of State has made it clear that he does not believe in cross-subsidy. He does not accept the fact that the only way that many bus companies make their operation viable is to cross-subsidise between peak hours and busy routes and difficult hours and rural routes or non-viable routes in the suburbs. That is such a basic way of balancing the bus books that I should have thought even the Secretary of State would have been careful before he wiped that out.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Lady should be a little careful, because cross-subsidy involves much higher fares on the prosperous routes than are necessary even to break even. The Bishop of Durham has already said that it is immoral to make a profit on a bus route, so to cross-subsidise on a bus route must be super-immoral.

Mrs. Dunwoody: If people living in country villages have a choice between a higher fare and no bus, they will be perfectly clear in their own minds which they prefer.

Let us be quite plain what we are talking about. The Secretary of State tells us not to worry about the transitional period, because he is aware of the difficulties and will provide £20 million. Of course, he will reduce that by £5 million over four years until it disappears, but he says that that is nevertheless bound to be enough to deal with all the difficulties. He also says that perhaps we should have £1 million for experiments with minibuses because they may be the answer. In Cheshire, the authority bought a minibus and handed it over to Crosville. Less than 11 months later, that vehicle is clapped out, needs replacing and is unable to perform the function required of it.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): I am rather worried if my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is more extreme than the Bishop of Durham, but let me leave that on one side. The hon. Lady is looking all the time at the cross-subsidy from the point of view of a person receiving it, not at the £140 million which others are paying for that subsidy. Why should people in towns pay that subsidy, which is in effect a tax, to help those in rural areas?

Mrs. Dunwoody: Unfortunately, people in towns will not escape the effect of the Bill. We have heard a great deal about the services in Exeter. No one has said that the little minibus there is only running up and down an exeedingly limited central part of the city. Those who are paying the taxes that we are talking about, whether by rates or taxes, in the outer suburbs of Exeter are not benefiting from that tiny minibus and are not likely to do so. The hon. Gentleman must be clear that those people who live outside one or two clearly demarcated busy routes in the centre of cities will be in the same situation as those in the rural areas.

No one will cross-subsidise a bus going to a hospital outside the urban area. No one will cross-subsidise a school bus that is going across country from one comprehensive school to another. No one will cross-subsidise buses during difficult hours or on difficult, unused or half-used services. To think that those who live in towns will automatically be provided with better services is not to understand the implications. Almost inevitably, services will disappear. Then and only then shall we see the extent of the need for cross-subsidisation in order to provide a public service — because that is what the bus services are.

When we talk about the effects of the Bill in rural areas, we should be aware that the shire counties alone will have to find an extra £102 million in subsidies just to maintain services on the NBC routes. With a cut of £250 million —30 per cent.—planned in April in transport subsidies, there is no way in which the shire counties can maintain those subsidies.

In Hereford — despite what we were told about Hereford town—no operator was willing to take on one of the 53 routes without a subsidy. We are told, however, "It is unfortunate if people cannot get buses. They can always get taxis." The Department is adopting a Marie Antoinette attitude — if people cannot have buses, let them take taxis.

It is, of course, more expensive to travel by taxi. Taxis cost on average 95p a mile, compared with 16·5p a mile on buses. About 75 per cent. of the population will not take cabs. The city controller's office in Indianapolis studied the various systems, and when told that it was the intention of Britain's Secretary of State to change the entire taxi service, commented:

> "England had the best taxi service in the free world by industry standards. Why is it that Government always wants to fix something that isn't broken?"

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): While the hon. Lady is talking of the United States, may I ask her to consider what is happening in Phoenix, Arizona, where taxis are operating as subcontractors for the weekend bus service, at which time there are between 300 and 400 passengers, compared with 40,000 passengers a day during the week? That shows that, when there are fewer passengers, it is appropriate to have a taxi service. Is she aware that in that case taxi fares are almost identical to bus fares?

Mrs. Dunwoody: Removing the regulations applying to taxis will be no gift to taxi operators, many of whom will find themselves being undercut by others coming in. The system of licensing which they have enjoyed will be wiped out. The hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) will discover that those in the taxi business regard this as an ill-conceived and unimaginative piece of legislation.

The second and next important leg of the right hon. Gentleman's case is the whole question of the privatisation of the National Bus Company. We are told that the right hon. Gentleman is not interested in having viable companies but wants them broken down into smaller units, although today he did not specify the size of company that he would regard as viable.

Grieveson Grant and Company, the stockbrokers, said that, if the whole of the NBC was sold as a unit, it would be worth between £150 million and £200 million. That estimate explains why the Bill is being rushed through. The Secretary of State is rushing to help the Chancellor of the Exchequer; if the Government cannot find sufficient state assets to sell off, the Secretary of State believes that the National Bus Company can be sold to help the Chancellor do something to improve the economic situation.

The Monopolies and Mergers Commission stated that the present structure of the NBC was beneficial to efficiency. The attitude of the Secretary of State is muddled. On the one hand he has evidence to prove that the unit as a whole is worth a great deal of money. On the other, he tells the operators, "I want it broken down into smaller pieces." He will, in the process, fall heavily between two stools. He will provide units that are too big for local operators to buy and run, but too small to interest the institutional investors.

All this destruction is being carried out in the name of promoting better public transport. It is worth noting that, since the National Bus Company was formed, nearly all the private companies, particularly the holding companies, have pulled out and have put their money into different types of operation.

The effect on the staff of the NBC will be disastrous, especially as most cost advantages will come from reduced wages being paid to them. The NBC has made it plain that its pension plans for staff will not be protected by the Bill and that the 1982 Act will not help the 15,000 pensioners involved.

Why are the Government so determined to push this legislation through in this way? Do they genuinely believe that by opening the gates to competition they will produce a new era of better bus transport services? [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."] In reality, nothing of the kind will happen.

The Government feel that they need not indulge in consultation to discover what is really important for the public. They do not believe in constructing legislation based on research and investigative work done by those with knowledge of the bus industry. For this Government, it is sufficient to move fast towards certain shibboleths that are important to the Secretary of State. One is to remove from the public sector any service that is providing a level of care if that service has any reliance on subsidy. It does not even matter if it is impossible for other sectors to replace the existing system.

It does not matter to them if many rural areas suffer and if people in towns who wish to use buses at off-peak times find it impossible to do so. It does not matter to the Government if what the right hon. Gentleman is doing will wipe out 50 years of road safety, of better services generally and of good facilities for those most in need. It does not matter to them if concessionary fares for the old and benefits for the young are wiped out.

It is important for the House to understand that the Secretary of State is concerned only that we should, by some means, hand the system over initially to small companies which want to cream off profits from any little areas of state assets that can be made available. The cost of this Secretary of State is high, but it is high mostly to those who cannot hit back, those who cannot protect themselves. I hope that, for that and many other reasons, the House will refuse—in the interests of those who are of most concern to us all—to give the Bill a Second Reading.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

this House declines to give a Second Reading to the Transport Bill until it has had the opportunity of studying the imminent report of the Transport Committee on what is the most fundamental upheaval in the bus industry for over 50 years.

The amendment stands in my name and in the names of most members of the Select Committee on Transport.

I begin with what I regard as a House of Commons point. Last year the Select Committee decided to conduct an inquiry into the financing of the public transport services. In the autumn it decided to extend that study to take account of the bus White Paper. We discovered, however, in view of the amount of evidence that was put before us, that we could not report before Christmas. On the other hand, the Government, having produced their White Paper, also produced a mass of consultation documents and gave no deadline for this Second Reading debate. The chairman of the Select Committee wrote to the Secretary of State saying:

"The Committee has accordingly agreed that I should write to you to request a delay in the introduction of that legislation until our report is published."

On 10 December last the Secretary of State replied:

"I fear I could not undertake to do that—nonetheless, a Bill of this importance will undoubtedly be very thoroughly considered by Parliament through all its stages."

One would imagine from the wording of that letter that the Government were proceeding with speed to produce a Bill immediately following the Christmas recess. Indeed, that was the advice that some of us were given, yet not until today do we find the Bill before us on Second Reading.

The majority of members of the Select Committee feel that the evidence given to us was of such a nature that the rest of the House — certainly the members of any Standing Committee that might be set up to consider this major revolution—should have the advantage of that evidence and, preferably, of any report that is made.

We were aware of widespread concern on a variety of points among all sections of the community and across the political spectrum. I tell my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and my hon. Friends, that so far most of those concerns have not been resolved by the publication of the Bill. I believe that the work of the Select Committee is important. We have laboured hard and long to produce the report. We have taken evidence, and visited Hereford and Worcester. The taking of evidence has now ended and the report will shortly be produced.

I do not claim that the report will be enough. I do not claim that it will be either for or against the Bill. It will, however, show the House and the country how much feeling there is on the issue and how necessary it is to proceed with caution rather than rush madly ahead and accept the first set of proposals put forward.

In addition to my amendment, I should like to mention early-day motion 358 which calls for consignment of the Bill to a Special Standing Committee, again because those who will deal with the Bill should be entitled to take evidence from anybody whom they think would be able to help them, and, at least, to study the evidence that we have gathered. That is the very least that the House should allow. If we do not allow members of the Standing Committee to take advantage of all the work that their colleagues have done, the whole future of the Select Committees and the relationship between them and the House will be brought into question.

There are occasions when party politics are put on one side and we try to produce useful ideas that have a broad measure of agreement. That has been one of the bonuses of the Select Committee system. If Committees were always strictly partisan, their reports would be greatly devalued. I pay tribute to the Labour members of the Select Committee who bravely joined us in producing a unanimous report on the London area even though some people might have thought that they had gone too far in our direction.

The amendment is not supported only by those who put their names to it. It is also supported by no fewer than 11 national organisations. They are the Association of District Councils, the Association of Transport Co-ordinating Officers, the Bus and Coach Council, the Chartered Institute of Transport, Friends of the Earth, the National Association of Local Councils, the Ramblers Association, the Royal Town Planning Institute, Rural Voice, and Transport 2000, all operating under the aegis of Women in the Community — the National Federation of Women's Institutes. The organisation wrote to me as follows:

"We cannot anticipate what the Select Committee will say, but we feel that it is constitutionally inappropriate for the House of Commons to consider legislation in advance of receiving the report of its Select Committee".

Although not opposed to the Bill in principle, the Association of County Councils also has strong misgivings and would like to see the Bill sent to a Special Standing Committee.

The list is impressive. It cuts right across the political as well as the transport spectrum. What is at issue is the right of the House to information. It would be a mistake for the report and the evidence that the Select Committee has heard to be produced after Second Reading—let alone after Committee stage.

Many of my hon. Friends are completely bemused by the Bill. They receive conflicting reports from local councils, bus operators and voluntary organisations such as the NFWI. The Secretary of State and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary ply them with tea and sympathy in an attempt to encourage them to support the Bill. In my view, the House should have an opportunity to make up its mind about this fundamental change on the evidence, when it is published. That is the core of my plea. The House must decide whether to use our Select Committees or ignore them. Do we regard them as peripheral centres of activity to which we consign awkward hon. Members in order to keep them out of the Chamber, taking little notice of what they have to say? [Interruption.] Yes, some of us emerge every so often. Alternatively, do we accept that the Committees represent a serious attempt to enable a group of hon. Members gradually to gain a level of expertise on a subject that others would find it difficult to attain, to question Ministers and civil servants from a state of knowledge, and once again to begin to assert the influence of the House upon the Executive, no matter what colour it may be? No instance since the Select Committees were set up has brought the issue before the House as sharply as this.

My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Leader of the House can ignore the protests that I am making. There is no doubt that the Government, with their huge majority, could roll the matter over. However, in the long run such action will not be good for the Government or the House of Commons, and I doubt whether it will help the cause of parliamentary democracy in this country.

Of course Ministers want to push through their legislation — that is what we expect of them — but sometimes Governments display a tinge of arrogance. I am sure that my right hon. Friend does not wish to give the House an impression of arrogance. It is because I am sure that he does not wish to give that impression that I urge him to accept my amendment.

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): Do I understand that the Secretary of State ignores the work of the Select Committee — as a senior member of another Select Committee I regard that as a serious matter in itself —even though he has been before the Committee for a substantial time?

Mr. Fry: It is true that my right hon. Friend appeared before the Select Committee, and we had a long and interesting session. He did not ignore the work of the Committee. The Committee made him very much aware of the work that it had done.

I should like to make it clear that I favour increased competition in bus services, that I believe that subsidies to passenger transport executives should be reduced and that I favour the privatisation of the National Bus Company. In regard to the latter, I must declare an interest, although my interest in bus matters goes back many years to when I was chairman of the Conservative bus policy committee and took part, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, in producing our policy document "The Right Track" before the 1979 general election.

It would be wrong if no Conservative Member expressed some anxieties about the Bill. I should like first to deal with some of the wrong impressions that have been spread abroad. The first is that, because the Transport Act 1980, which liberalised coaching, has been successful, the same must automatically apply to the stage carriage bus industry. With coaches, the competition was not between two types of road operators but between two modes— road and rail. Moreover, as with deregulation in other respects, such as aviation in the United States, the result is more services on some routes and the disappearance of services on others. The Transport and Road Research Laboratory study has come up with some rather interesting figures. With all the extra coaches, there are only 43 more services as a result of the 1980 Act. That might surprise some hon. Members. Taking a service away to put it on another route is all very well, provided that a service remains in spite of the redirection. If a coach is taken off a route, there might be a stage carriage bus service serving the same route, but take off the stage carriage bus service and the people of the area are probably left with no public transport.

The second wrong impression is that innovation is virtually impossible under the present legislative set-up. Less than 0·5 per cent. of applications for licences have been refused recently. Even the example of Exeter, which has been given today, has taken place under existing law and without any competition. Competition could well undermine the success of that experiment.

A third false impression is that there has somehow miraculously been an increase in the number of passengers, enabling more services to be supplied and fares to be reduced. Revenue can be got only when demand exists. If there is not much demand, it is difficult to extend services as the Bill intends. Indeed, the evidence shows that the extra revenue comes not from existing passengers who make extra journeys. That is the evidence of the Association of County Councils.

A fourth misconception is that there will inevitably be massive economies. Existing economies are within a regulated system and at current fares. There is no guarantee that, in an unregulated system with cut price fares and without cross-subsidy, the same savings will necessarily accrue. The fifth fallacy is that the traffic commissioners are the ideal people to deal with problems that arise. I have been to Hereford and Worcester and seen some of the dangers of competition there and I am far from convinced that the traffic commissioners are the ideal people to do that job. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said today that the Bill would stop bunching, but how can we control six operators who arrive within one minute of each other at the same bus stop without taking control of the timetable? If we take control of the timetable we are not deregulating but altering the method of regulation. I ask my right hon. Friend to take that on board.

The idea that competition will always be the best thing is not borne out by current circumstances in Hereford, where the National Bus Company, by competition, is destroying the competition of the independent operators. It is doing that with a grand total of 22 buses in the Hereford bus depot. Unless each National Bus Company company is to be cut to less than 22 buses, such action would occur throughout the country. Utterly unregulated competition can lead to its own demise.

As for inspection, at least one traffic commissioner reckons that we shall need at least twice as much inspection as we have at the moment. I am waiting for some reassurance from the Government that that will be provided. It is exceedingly odd that people who want to apply for a heavy goods vehicle licence have to prove their financial stability before being granted a licence whereas no such requirement will be necessary to run a public service vehicle if the Bill goes through in its present form.

As to concessionary fares, I am sorry to disappoint some of my right hon. and hon. Friends, but the chairman of Hereford and Worcester transport committee agrees with me that bus passes are difficult if not impossible to apply when there is a large number of operators. In those circumstances, it is almost certain that token systems will be necessary. Tokens only cause resentment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): What does my hon. Friend mean by a "large number" of operators making bus passes difficult to operate?

Mr. Fry: If the chairman of Hereford and Worcester transport committee thought it difficult with four or five operators in Hereford, I suggest that there must be many other parts of the country where the same will apply if the Bill goes through in its present form. I am merely taking the advice of those who ought to know.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) has mentioned the north Herefordshire women's institute. It violently opposes the Bill and feels especially strongly on one issue. It believes that the county council should retain an important role in public transport. It is worried that removing the council's responsibilities will result in a deterioration of rural routes.

I should like to conclude by considering the fundamental issue. As with everything else, the fundamental issue is finance. The Association of County Councils—I am sorry to keep quoting it but I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends appreciate that it is not hostile to the Government or our party—says that it would require a minimum of £30 million extra to keep services as they are today. If we add that £30 million to the lowest estimate of cross-subsidy being spent on non-profitable routes—about £120 million—we arrive at a loss, if cross-subsidy is ended, of £150 million. That has nothing to do with London, the PTEs or the metropolitan areas. It relates entirely to the shire counties, which many of my colleagues represent. Therefore there is a real danger that that money will not be forthcoming and that councils will find it difficult to maintain the current level of services. Obviously, there could be an improvement in efficiency, which could result in lower fares on busy routes, but I and most people involved in the intricacies of transport finance doubt that it could also provide for the loss of cross-subsidy.

Almost a year ago I listened to the Secretary of State when he spoke at the Bus and Coach Council dinner. He made it abundantly clear that his main determination was to reduce the amount of public money spent on subsidising the bus industry. I do not necessarily disagree with him. However, I cannot understand why we need this Bill to attain the objectives that he wants. Competition can be extended by competitive tendering. My right hon. Friend might even consider negative tendering on certain routes. But privatisation of the NBC is already impossible. If he reduces the NBC to too many units, some of his ex-hon. Friends at the Treasury may have some words to say about the sum he receives from the public in exchange for it.

My right hon. Friend can control the spending of the PTEs. There has already been a change in transport supplementary grant. Already there is legislation to abolish the metropolitan counties, and he could replace them with any regime he wishes. All that is possible without the Bill. However, if we are to have the Bill, it needs considerable amendments. It needs amendments on tendering, licensing and the role of county councils, and there must be a great deal of reassurance on the question of finance. Without those amendments and that reassurance, I fear that the legislation, although welcomed by Conservative Members, may be viewed as the reforms in the Local Government Act 1972 are viewed. What appear to be a number of reforms may lead to an increased number of problems.

The Government have the opportunity in Committee to put right some of those points. I shall listen carefully to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State when he replies. If he assures me, as I hope he will, that he will wait for the Select Committee report, and that he is prepared to accept meaningful amendments, I shall not vote with the Opposition. However, I warn him that if the Bill emerges from Committee in its present form, I shall have no hesitation in voting against it on Third Reading.

Mr. J. D. Concannon (Mansfield): I am aware of the time and the fact that a huge chunk of it has been taken from the debate. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) and to the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) for their comments, which will enable me to cut my speech even shorter than I intended. The hon. Gentleman's speech showed the worthiness of Select Committees. He has examined the legislation closely and warned his right hon. and hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench of the dangers. If his amendment is rejected, he will suffer what we on the Opposition Benches have been suffering for a long time. If it is rejected, I hope that the Government will be sufficiently gracious to ensure that it is reconsidered in Committee. However, I should not like to guarantee him that, considering the content of his speech.

During the general election I wondered what the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) meant when he said that he was worried about the Government having a large majority. As an ex-Whip I could hardly understand that because I had always thought that the larger the majority, the easier a Whip's job would be. Since then we have discovered that the right hon. Gentleman was absolutely right. A large majority means bad legislation. We have had to get used to democratic dictatorship. Some Bills that have been introduced have depended not on argument or content, but on the size of the Government's majority to force them through. They should never have seen the light of day, and if the Government's majority had been about 50 or less they would never have seen the light of day. This Bill is one of them.

The Bill has nothing to do with services, and a great deal to do with party dogma and the dogma of the Secretary of State. He could not care less about safety, concessionary fares, services, routes or even job losses and the growth of moonlighting that the Bill will encourage. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State does not need to visit Phoenix, Arizona to find out what happens when taxi services are turned loose. He will remember from his stint in Northern Ireland, as I do, what happened to the taxi service and buses there. He knows the anxieties of insurance companies about the way vehicles are maintained and driven. I look forward to his reply.

The hon. Member for Wellingborough warned the Government about sensitive rural areas, and about the membership of various county councils. There have been rumblings among county councils and county councillors. The Government must accept that the Bill will be a major issue in the county council elections in May. Certainly in Nottinghamshire, where we are proud of our bus services and of what our county council has done for rural bus services, there is already consternation, and there will be more. There has been expansion there. It is not true that people in built-up areas do not care. The majority of councillors in Nottinghamshire county council, who represent areas, such as Mansfield, Bassetlaw and Ashfield, care. They could sit back and say, "It will not affect us very much", but to my surprise those councillors are more against the Bill than some Conservative county councillors. They seemed to acquiesce, but of late they have started to wonder about the political rumblings of people in those areas.

I have received stacks of briefing notes about this matter and others from my county council. I am obliged to my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich and to the hon. Member for Wellingborough that I do not have to discuss those matters now. I made a promise to make my speech as brief as possible, and so I shall. I hope and trust that if I am fortunate enough to be a member of the Committee—that is volunteering beyond the call of duty—this piece of political dogma will be considered thoroughly and properly on behalf of the people who will have to use the buses. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that there is no doubt that all the informtion that one can glean about the matter shows that there is a great deal of worry and consternation. I hope that the Committee stage will not be based on straight party political dogma. As I said, the county council elections will thrust this matter to the front of politics. I hope that the matter will be considered seriously. If not, the Opposition hope that the other place will again do its duty on behalf of the people who live in rural areas.

I have not gone into the nitty-gritty of the Bill, because it is not necessary for me to do so now. I promised that my speech would be short. I did not think that it would be as short as this. If we do not defeat the Bill tonight, which is what we want—we can win all the arguments but lose the vote—I hope that we shall take the Committee stage seriously.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): It gives me great pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Concannon) and my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry), who have demonstrated across the Floor of the House that there can be some consensus. Had I been called by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a little earlier, I might have said that some of the remarks of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) would have driven me away from that consensus.

It is fair to say that the Bill is a radical and imaginative set of proposals. It is right that the House should consider on Second Reading the Government's justification for those proposals, and I believe that they have made a case, at least initially, as to why some changes are necessary. The statistics for the decline of the bus industry are spectacular. In three decades from 1951 to 1981, total passenger miles in Great Britain increased threefold, while bus and coach passenger miles decreased by a half. A 51 per cent. share of the market became an 8 per cent. share. Why was that? The growth in car ownership was equally remarkable, if not more so. That has provided a competitive pressure that must make nonsense of the idea that the bus industry is a monopoly. Competitive pressure from the private motor car is the most important consideration in judging how to deal with the future of the bus industry.

We must recognise another major change in social habits during the past 30 years. In the 1950s, the British were cinema-goers; in the 1980s, they are television-watchers. In the 1950s, local bus services could rely upon a third daily peak in travelling habits—an evening peak to be added to the morning and late afternoon peaks. When cinema attendances decreased, the financial viability of buses changed dramatically. As the cinema declined, so did the profitability of the bus industry. To that can be added the change from a six-day working week to a five-day working week, which also affected the viability of the industry. We must consider carefully the statistics of the past 30 years before assuming that all the blame for the decline lies with the bus industry.

The key to the Bill is clause 1, which will unlock the vast, rambling edifice of subsidy that has been built up over the years in the bus industry. Action is undoubtedly needed on this front. However, my quarrel is not with the bus industry, but with local politicians, especially those of the Left wing. The bus industry has fallen into their hands in many areas, and it has consequently suffered. Indiscriminate subsidy which seeks to prevent fares from increasing in line with inflation has done nothing to protect the industry from the competition of the motor car; it merely sucks resources from the local community in the form of rates. To the extent that clause 1 will lead to a reduction in subsidy, it is to be welcomed. Furthermore, the elimination of cross-subsidy implicit in the Bill should lead to lower fares.

In my constituency those who live in areas of Swindon such as Penhill and the Parks estates, who have low incomes or none at all, have been encouraged to believe by the opposition to the Bill that they will have no bus services in the future. On the contrary; they will be pleasantly surprised when fares are reduced. Why should they—the less well-off in society—subsidise those on higher incomes in areas where the motor car is a readily available substitute?

I wonder whether the Government realise the extent of cross-subsidy in the bus industry. If they have not yet had time to read the report of the Select Committee hearing evidence from the National Bus Company, I urge them to do so. The report makes it clear that £20 million to replace the money lost through cross-subsidy will not be nearly enough to meet the requirements of the industry, if it is to maintain present services.

May I say something about the effect of competition on the environment in which we must live. The conscientious transport manager—I have known many in my years in the industry—is constantly seeking to do two things. He will endeavour to amend services from time to time to meet changes in passenger demand, because he dislikes empty buses and he dislikes passengers being left behind at stops. He will also try to plan an integrated network of routes to cover his area. Attacks on monopoly and vested interests are misplaced. It is in the interests of passengers to have a planned, integrated network of services on which they can rely, especially when they have no alternative means of transport. To the extent that the competition inherent in the Bill will hinder such planning, it is to be regretted. Passengers will not thank the Government for lower fares if dislocated services follow behind.

In this context, I would welcome a reassurance from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State when he replies to the debate that the successful tenderer for a loss-making and, therefore, publicly subsidised route will be protected for a reasonable period from speculative competition. Such protection should not be necessary in normal circumstances, but its availability would engender confidence.

The proposals in clause 6 could provide the framework for a sensible regulation of the new system. It empowers the traffic commissioner to determine "traffic regulation conditions" to "prevent dangerous traffic conditions or reduce severe traffic congestion"

by controlling routes, stopping places and lay-over times. In extremis, the traffic commissioner must have the power to refuse an application through a regulation which adequately safeguards the environment by banning a service in a sensitive area such as a town centre bus interchange point which is already over-congested. Conversely, I hope that the traffic commissioner will use clause 6(4) (d) to ensure that operators will offer services of reasonable fullness on a daily and weekly basis. That would provide a framework within which competition can flourish and the passenger benefit, as hon. Members on both sides of the House would wish.

I am sure that the Government do not wish to encourage cowboy operators, unsafe vehicles or stranded passengers. However, if they are to avoid those possibilities, they must strengthen the proposals. A framework for competition was considered right by the Government when British Telecom was liberalised last year, and a similar approach is entirely justified here.

I welcome the Bill's proposals to free the National Bus Company from state control and to reduce restrictions on the hiring of taxis. I welcome the drive to extend the flexible provision of transport into rural areas where profound social changes are taking place. There is a positive benefit to the nation in maintaining the rural population. I would also welcome a commitment from the Government to public transport in its true sense — transport for the public, not transport owned by the public. We need stimulation of fixed rail, overhead, underground and water-borne transport to reduce pressure on the road network.

The Government do not wish to destroy public transport, as has been suggested by the Opposition, but they want — rightly in my view — to reduce its costs. These proposals are at the least risky and at worst a clear threat to the level of public transport that we need, particularly in our towns and cities, to make the best use of our road networks. If the Government would consider fixing an upper limit to the permissible level of subsidy —say, at 10 or even 5 per cent. of income from fares, excluding concessionary fare contributions — it would meet the need to reduce public subsidy and would make enemies only among the far Left of the political spectrum.

To sum up, the Secretary of State reminds me of a character I once read of in a John Buchan novel who showed his bravery by going from a lighted room into the dark beyond. The Secretary of State has undoubtedly seen the light but he is now setting off into the darkness on an unknown path. There he may bump into the hon. Lady the Member for Crewe and Nantwich, the spokesman for the Opposition, which will be frightening enough, but he will also come up against some hard realities and some uncomfortable facts. The Secretary of State should travel carefully with the Select Committee's report under his arm, lest he should never arrive.

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): The hon. Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) began his speech by referring to an imaginative and realistic set of proposals that had been produced by the Secretary of State. He then referred to regulatory provisions that ought to be introduced in order to temper somewhat this state of imagination and realism. That is a dichotomy of thinking which in my experience is an attempt to back two horses at the same time when they are running in different directions. However, the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) was far more constructive and realistic and showed a profound knowledge of the subject matter. The right hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Concannon) gave a crowning piece of advice, good sense and caution arising out of his ministerial experience in Northern Ireland.

We are left with the Secretary of State for Transport. He has been here for a long time, but he appears to have learned nothing. He has behind him many years of experience but they do not appear to me to reflect great credit upon him. Wherever he has been he has left behind him concern and destruction. He is a devastating character. He is the only person who has followed persistently the proposals contained in the White Paper and who has ignored the practical advice and experience of all those who are involved in the operational and administrative aspects of transport. These sources have put forward an overwhelming case against the Bill. The Secretary of State clearly is the odd man out. It is a very lonely position in which to be and illustrates the pathetic state of the Secretary of State's case. He is anchored to dogma. He knows that deregulation and competition turn back the clock to the period before the 1930s. Regulation, licensing, co-ordination and all the other trappings of a public transport service in the United Kingdom have come into existence since the Road Traffic Act 1930. The Secretary of State has been warned from all sides that times have changed. The transport problems of today cannot be solved from the experience of the past.

The Secretary of State is returning to the conditions of the 1920s. He is not looking forward. The future development of our transport services requires a modern approach that involves planning, co-ordination, co-operation and support in the national interest, but the 1980 Act got rid of certain licensing procedures.

What has happened? The Secretary of State boasts in his White Paper that bus services have improved and that fares have been reduced. However, on examination we find that the picture is not as the Secretary of State paints it. Much of that traffic has been taken away from British Rail. Consequently, British Rail needs further financial support in order to meet its increasing overheads.

However, the Secretary of State is adamant and has tried to pretend to the House that he has put forward a constructive set of proposals.

The Secretary of State wants to introduce something that is, as yet, untried. Nothing in the Bill has been tried and tested. There is no evidence to support what the Secretary of State wants. Furthermore, what is counter-productive he actually denies. What is unworkable he scorns. He refuses to admit that the Bill puts at risk the quality, availability and efficiency of local bus services. Sadly, we shall have to wait and see what is the degree of his recklessness.

All that we have before us now rests not on a better transport policy. If that had been the case, we should have had before us a measure that reflected the experience of well-established bus operators and the experience of county councils, district councils, passenger transport executives, the National Bus Company and the Bus and Coach Council. The private and public sectors would have been partners in assisting the Secretary of State, if that had been his policy. Instead, we have expenditure cuts presented in the guise of lower transport costs. Just as surely as this policy has damaged the education service, housing programmes and social services and has forced additional costs upon ratepayers, so in this case ratepayers will be faced with higher costs and poorer services.

The abolition of road service licensing will break up a well-established network of services. The urban areas will suffer and the rural areas will be further deprived. The needs of both will have little priority in the scramble that the Bill invites. I am afraid that this applies also to standards, safety and the environment. Cross-subsidy—the provision of services that no private operator will provide—will be lost. No town is without the problem of providing a service that is socially important but which is unable to produce adequate revenue. The provisions contained in the Bill fail to meet the problem. The case is well demonstrated by the debate on 25 October 1984 in another place.

Part IV of the Bill is an exercise in muddled thinking. District councils are expected to transfer their well-organised bus undertakings to separate companies. What has been developed by public demand, criticism, social needs and accountability is to be handed over to municipal companies. However, those districts councils will remain burdened with public sector spending and investment responsibilities.

Municipal companies of this kind will immediately face unfair competition, and in this regard the Secretary of State can say nothing to deny the damage that we foresee. Eventual inconvenience will be a further consequence to passengers, in addition to a higher cost to the ratepayer. It is clear that all this will result in grave losses to the community.

The first will be the scrapping of the present road licensing system. That has been well tried and has been described as a useful instrument for the development of good services. That will go, as will cross-subsidies. The National Bus Company and municipal bus services will be broken up. The obligation on county councils to co-ordinate public transport will also disappear. There will be widespread reductions in service levels, and whether or not the Secretary of State admits it, there will be an increase in fares. That is bound to happen. A poorer quality of service will result, with a lowering of safety standards and job losses in existing undertakings.

I am advised, and I have no reason to doubt it, that the Bill will remove power from local government but that direct powers in many areas will be taken by the Secretary of State. This approach reverses the policy, previously endorsed by all parties, that local decisions should be taken locally. The Bill superimposes an alarming amount of ministerial control, often without further reference to Parliament.

I ask the House to consider the enormity of that. This Government presented themselves to the country in 1979 and 1983 and boasted about the amount of choice and non-intervention in local government. They were telling the electorate, "We will set the people free." Yet since 1979 we have had a most abrasive Government who have indulged in daily intervention and have dictated to industry, voluntary organisations, individuals and corporations alike. They have become an arrogant Government. They will not listen.

We have already heard from the well-informed hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) how the Secretary of State has had the audacity to appear before a Select Committee—charged under its terms of reference with scrutinising and monitoring Departments—and after two and a half hours took no notice of its comments, even though they related totally and wholly to the subject matter in the Bill. No operating undertaking is listened to. In other words, everyone has wasted his time.

I am sorry to say it, but as usual the people will have to suffer the consequences of the Government's actions. However, time will tell, and this Government, through the person who seeks to emulate his Prime Minister more than anyone else, will again be proved wrong.

7.4 pm

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): I very much welcome the Bill. Over the years I have received many complaints about buses, especially in my rural areas. Only last November, a large headline appeared in my local newspaper drawing attention to the fact that a parish council was complaining bitterly that its bus service was "diabolical". It was absolutely right. Only a fortnight ago, an article in the local newspaper which was titled "First catch your bus" complained that passengers wanting to get from Garstang to Scorton boarded a bus marked "Scorton" —a reasonable thing to do—only to be turfed off a few minutes later by a bus driver who said that it was going nowhere. They finally tracked down the right bus, even though it was wrongly labelled. As the writer of that article said, it is hardly surprising that the Scorton-Garstang bus is under-used and that

"on an average Thursday you could fit the passengers into a mini, let alone a mini-bus".

Small wonder that in Lancashire over the past 10 years, bus usage has shrunk by 46 per cent. and bus mileage is down by 14·3 per cent. while the revenue subsidy—this may delight Opposition Members — has risen from £93,000 to £8·5 million. This money has come out of hard-earned wages.

That is why I welcome my right hon. Friend's courageous efforts to provide passengers with decent bus services which go where they want to go, not where it is convenient for the bus company to take them, and at a price they can afford. I say "courageous", because my right hon. Friend knew very well that he was tackling not only the vested interest of the huge National Bus Company and the local authority bus services, which do not want their effortless, comfortable monopolies swept away. More difficult, he was also tackling the "When in doubt cling to nurse, for fear of getting something worse" syndrome, which is exemplified on the Opposition benches.

However, even when people complain like mad about something, they still fear change. Believe it or not, the very parish council which complained that its bus services were diabolical was frightened of change. By then it had the expensive benefit of the Labour-controlled Lancashire county council's propaganda campaign against the reform proposals. One can get a lot of propaganda for 135,000 quid, including a photograph of the county council chairman in all the local newspapers. I understand that it will shortly be on the back of all the buses. That is a mighty useful election gimmick—just before the county elections — at ratepayers' expense. But following Westminster's successful case against ILEA, this expenditure may well prove to be ultra vires, and Labour councillors may be liable to pay it. It may also mean that she has opened her election campaign.

The fears which have been aroused are precisely those that were felt when the experiment in Herefordshire was about to begin. There are no such fears there now. Everyone is delighted with the service, and no one wants to return to the old ways.

It has always seemed such a waste of public money to have taxis with one child in them, or health service transport vehicles going around the country half empty. Therefore, I particularly welcome clause 80 which makes the services co-operate to achieve better value for money for ratepayers and better services for passengers.

Shared taxis, provided for under clause 9, will give the flexibility which buses lack and, provided they are full, at little, if any, higher cost then buses. There is no doubt that travelling in from a country district is now expensive.

Country areas do not need large buses. Nothing annoys people more than to see huge buses containing only one or two people lumbering around country lanes, when a minibus would to a better and cheaper job. When I have suggested this in the past, I have been told that the bus grants system made it no more expensive to buy a full sized bus than a minibus. If that is so, it certainly needs altering.

With new, flexible services and the grants for services in rural areas available under clause 89, I believe that the country dwellers in my constituency will get a much better deal.

Much deliberately misleading rubbish has been talked about concessionary fares. Clause 85 makes it abundantly clear that concessionary fares are in no way threatened, and local authorities can operate schemes as they think fit. I was glad that the Secretary of State answered a Labour allegation that it would be impossible for local authorities to run concessionary fares schemes, either because they will have no money to do so or because it will be difficult to operate a scheme when large numbers of private operators are involved. At present many of my constituents who would be eligible for concessionary fares cannot use them because there is no bus service going where they want to go. Under the provisions of clause 86 any operator can tender to operate such concessions and the improved availability will benefit people in areas with poor services, including my old-age pensioners in inaccessible top-of-the-hill council estates.

One of the most illogical attacks on the Government's proposals has been on the safety aspects of buses. During the running-in period in Hereford, a lot of faults were found in buses, which were put off the roads by inspectors. This, of course, is exactly what tests and inspectors are for. I welcome the tightening of conditions for vehicle maintenance in clause 23 and the provisions to disqualify operators who operate dangerously or go in for such practices as bunching, so common now in all conurbations; the buses always run in flocks.

It is astonishing that the very people who profess to be worried at the imagined prospect of unsafe private buses on the road appear not at all worried by the published figures, given to me the other day, of safety test failures of National Bus Company vehicles. A failure rate of 40 per cent. on the first test in National Bus Company buses in the year 1983-84 is nothing to brag about, and the stricter standards will be welcome all round.

I appreciate that there is understandable anxiety among the staff of the National Bus Company and local authority undertakings, but there is also keen anticipation, and many employees are looking forward to getting a share of the action. Their appetite has been whetted by the knowledge that the employee-owners of the National Freight Consortium have seen their share in the consortium rise from £800 to £6,000, and it is still rising. Moreover, the consortium is able to plough back far more into new investment than the old company, so that is good for jobs in the manufacturing sector as well. The same applies to Tyne Shiprepair, doomed when nationalised and losing £12 million, but which now, after a workers' buy-out, has doubled its work force and is making a profit, so staff need not fear privatisation.

The Times summed it up splendidly when it said that the Government seek to eliminate quantity control while retaining quality control and to provide subsidies more related to need. All in all, I welcome the Bill and hope that my right hon. Friend will be in no way deterred by the orchestrated clamour that has been raised against it.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): I am amazed at the cavalier way in which the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman), like some other hon. Members on the Government Benches, has said that if no buses are available one can always order a taxi. Anyone who knows what it costs to order a taxi in my constituency to go to hospital or to an airport will realise that it is not something that people can do every day of the week.

In his peroration the Secretary of State said that we cannot shirk reform. The use of that phraseology suggests to me that some unpleasant medicine is to come. A few may benefit, but most people will find the contents of the Bill very unpleasant indeed.

I cannot be the only Member who has asked why a Bill of this size and detail could not have awaited the report of the Select Committee on Transport. I was glad that the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) dealt with that question adequately and in some detail. This is an important issue for the House. Although we know that Government are not bound by the findings of these Committees, at least they might recognise the time given to them by Members. If this is to be the pattern, in time it will be difficult to get Members to serve on such Committees.

When the White Paper, the precursor of the Bill, was issued last autumn, it was clear that the Scottish Office had merely accepted the views of the English Department of Transport. My party, the Scottish National party, said then that if the proposals were implemented they would be ruinous to the existing network of Scottish bus services, because feeder services and urban services to housing schemes are in a completely difference position to the lucrative express services and services on main routes. If the profitable routes are hived off under the deregulation proposals, their profits will not be used to cross-subsidise the services to rural areas and outlying areas of housing which, although loss-making, are socially necessary. I was disappointed to hear it said that people in towns would not agree to pay for losses in rural areas. I think many councillors have a more responsible attitude than that to their duties.

My party has made it clear that we believe the White Paper proposals to be extremely damaging to Scotland. Our transport needs are different and are often based on a dispersed population in rural areas. These conditions are rarely mirrored south of the border. If anything, it can be argued that Scotland needs greater rather than less co-ordination of public transport.

On cross-subsidisation, I understand that the Scottish Office has said that a new rural grant will be introduced to cover the transitional period when such subsidies are being reduced. I would be interested to hear more details of this; perhaps the Minister will be able to provide them tonight.

The evidence gathered by the Scottish consumer organisation suggests that the proposals in the Bill are not welcomed in Scotland. That organisation has reported that, following a wide-ranging survey, only one private bus operator fully supported the proposals. Regional authorities within Scotland, of all shades of opinion, have heavily criticised the Bill.

It is also worth noting that the Government are pressing ahead with the legislation on the basis of no practical experience in Scotland. Experiments in deregulation have been carried out in England but there have been none in Scotland. In regard to the Scottish dimension, we are taking a great leap in the dark. I fear the consequences will be damaging. If the Scottish Office is determined to press ahead, it would be worth while considering at the very least a longer time scale for implementation of the plans and perhaps also the need for controlled experiments.

Many questions remain unanswered or not sufficiently answered. What additional resources will be made available to make up for the loss of cross-subsidy? What will happen in rural areas, like my constituency, where there may not be competition in tendering for a service? Will the local authority have to accept a tender which is considered very high? I hope that these questions can be answered by the Minister.

The Bill reflects the Government's zeal to allow market forces to prevail, regardless of the consequences. My suspicion is that their principal motivation is not to improve bus services but further to reduce public spending and to stamp their own brand of ideology firmly on the public transport system. The Scottish interest demands that the Bill should be opposed, and I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): I am grateful to you for calling me, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that you will make a rude noise if I wander near my time limit.

As I have listened to the contributions so far I have been reminded very much of the difference in attitude portrayed by two shoe firm representatives who went to Africa. The first one sent a telegram back saying, "Opportunities appalling; nobody wears shoes." The second one wrote back saying, "Opportunities absolutely magnificent; nobody wears shoes."

We can take a totally negative view on this exercise or we can take a positive view. Anybody confronted with the basic figures which show that there are far fewer passengers, far less bus mileage and far more money ploughed into maintaining this creaking structure has to say either that we do not do anything about it but dig deeper in our pockets, confident in the knowledge that the situation will deteriorate, or that we take a constructive view that something has to be done. I take the view that no responsible Government, confronted with the figures, can do anything other than address the matter seriously. The state of affairs is so serious as to warrant major attention rather than minor tinkering with the structure. That is the basis on which I view the Bill.

I have the pleasure to represent Hereford, which has been the subject of a trial bus deregulation for the past four years. It might be helpful if I briefly set out a few of the things that have happened in that trial. There are those who have approached this in a negative way, and have said that the trial has caused problems. I think that it has been a valuable experiment from which much valuable information has been gathered if one wishes to look at it in a constructive manner.

I do not know whether the National Bus Company, which has the main service in Hereford city, is typical of other bus companies in other parts of the country. However, before 1981 if I wanted to get nearly lynched, I went into High Town and asked people how long they had been waiting for the bus. I had a string of complaints —the bus did not turn up, the bus did not stop, the company did not bother. When I complained to the driver, I would be told to get on down to the back of the bus. When I asked Midland Red (West) Ltd. why the bus had not turned up, I was told that there was no driver or no engine or that it could not get spares. It was not a happy state of affairs.

The county council's figures show that in 1975, £87,000 was spent in supporting buses, and in 1983, £867,000. That is three times as much in real money terms. Before the experiment, there were declining services, especially on Sundays and in the evenings. As a consequence of deregulation in Hereford there is competition from smaller operators, although this took a little time to start. There are, in general, reduced fare levels, and in some cases they have reduced substantially. More important, this has induced people to travel on the buses more often, which cannot be bad. On a personal note, the flow of complaints has dried up. Furthermore, I cannot find a queue of people waiting for buses in the city. They have gone because they are on the buses, which again is not a bad thing.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State mentioned subsidies, and in Hereford the subsidy has gone down by 38 per cent. If one adds in the amount of saving brought about by sensible use and co-ordination of school transport, we are talking about double that amount. If one saw that lying on the floor, one would bend down and pick it up. It would be worth while to do so because double 38 per cent. is a lot of money in anybody's terms.

All this has been done without reducing bus mileage in rural areas. We have commercial services operating without subsidy on routes that were previously operating with subsidies. We have managed to deploy ratepayers' and taxpayers' funds in such a way as to operate bus routes without a subsidy.

This is not necessarily just a cost-saving exercise, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that the Bill is aimed not at reducing subsidy but at making possibly better deployment of subsidy. If the county council wishes to put more services out to tender, to change the structure of the bus services, it can do so. It is significant that the same level of bus mileage—or 2 per cent. higher—can be sustained for less subsidy.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): I admire the tenor and spirit of my hon. Friend's speech, and he has had a great deal of experience. Has there been any difficulty when services have been put out to tender, the tender has been accepted but competition continues and the operation becomes difficult?

Mr. Shepherd: The question has not arisen because, as the service has been put out to tender it is, by definition, a difficult one, and the operator of the service runs it. No one has been interested in coming in in competition because it is recognised that there is not the volume of passengers for two companies. Potential competitors have turned their attention somewhere else.

Safety standards have been rigorously enforced in Hereford. We have had chapter and verse quoted about the failure of the safety standards, but that is because of the rigorous enforcement of the inspection of vehicles. We cannot, and I do not want to, complain about that. That is as it should be. Nobody should enter into this game unless his vehicles are in good nick and he can keep them in good shape. He must recognise the name of the game before he comes in. I pay tribute to those who have come in, who have learned their lesson the hard way, who are succeeding and who are determined to stay in.

It would be wrong to say that we have not had problems. There have been environmental problems, buses have bunched and have been standing over. However, in developing this Bill, my right hon. and hon. Friends have sought to overcome this problem. One can either throw the baby out with the bathwater and say that this problem is too difficult to solve, or one can say that the prize for solving it is enormous and therefore, solve it we must. There must be a constructive approach to resolve the difficulties that result from the nature of the competition. The provisions of clause 6 are essential in this respect.

What has been the competitive reaction? Midland Red (West), the National Bus Company in Hereford, set out to win the competition. It has massive resources and its buses were operating only on what were seen to be the effective routes. It improved its performance by 25 per cent. and its attitudes to the customers changed. People riding on buses in my part of the world say, "Do not let this go back to where it was because the bus operators will stop being nice to me." That is a small point, but it reflects through the whole ethos of bus operations. The customer matters. We should be thinking of him because buses are about customers.

The Midland Red (West) has tried hard to swamp competition, as has been said. Massive numbers of buses were poured in to try to swamp the opposition and wipe it out. However, if the company had to compete on all fronts it would not be able to pull buses in to try to obliterate the competition. As it is, the company underestimated the determination of travellers in Hereford to sustain two bus companies on routes.

At the moment we have what I am told by the Opposition is a disaster. Midland Red (West) tells me that it is making money like it has never made it before, without taking a penny in subsidy from Hereford. It also told the Select Committee and Ministers that. The independent companies have no wish to leave the scene. The ratepayers, via the county council, are paying less money and the level of fares is lower, so for the most part buses are serving passenger needs better and more efficiently.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) has had his 10 minutes, so there is no time for interventions.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): We are grateful to the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) for giving us his experiences. I think that he will agree that Midland Red (West) Ltd. accepts that it was providing a rather poor service before competition was brought in, but it has managed to pull up its socks since then.

I shall not attempt to argue that there is no need for competition in the bus industry. Nor shall I pour cold water on the idea of further experimentation to reduce the costs. These are obviously necessary. However, I seriously question whether a Bill running to 114 clauses and seven schedules is necessary to achieve those ends when we already have the Acts of 1980 and 81 on the statute book. Some of the remedies proposed in those Acts, certainly those of the Public Passenger Vehicles Act 1981 have not been fully tested.

It would be foolhardy to rush into this measure so soon after the publication of the White Paper, which was only last July, particularly in view of the huge numbers of concerned representations that have been sent in by the various and varied interested bodies. The Select Committee alone received more than 160 detailed depositions, and more are still coming in. It is regrettable that we could not get our report out before this debate, because I believe that there is a reasonable chance of achieving a fair measure of cross-party agreement on at least some of the proposals. I support the amendment so ably moved by the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry).

I am afraid that the Government, in their almost total but naive belief in market forces, think that such policies will solve all our problems. This measure will, however, unnecessarily destroy what is in many parts of the country a very fine bus network. I include the service in my constituency in that description. As far as I can discover, only The Times fully supports the Secretary of State. That is not surprising and is no commendation under that newspaper's present management structure.

It was claimed at Question Time recently that the Association of County Councils fully supported this measure, but its latest brief hardly bears that out. The Secretary of State has certainly stabbed the association in the back, despite the cosy chats at Marsham street with Councillor Ron Carrington of the Hereford and Worcester county council. Because he pioneered the Hereford area trial, the Department should have listened to his views. Once again, under this Government, locally elected representatives are to be made the unhappy whipping boys of the Department of Transport, while the real power passes directly to appointed bodies—in this case, the traffic commissioners.

As a member of a county council and a former representative on the ACC, I believe that it is high time the ACC took the gloves off in dealing with this Administration. As the association rightly says, it is a grave error not to give the counties the registration function with powers selectively to grant protection to subsidised services against the creaming off of profitable traffic by competition on the road. The co-ordinating role provided under the Transport Act 1978 is greatly weakened by the measures in the Bill, and the traffic commissioners' remoteness will not help.

The success—such as it was—of the Hereford trial area, even down to the publication of timetables, owed a great deal to the county, its chairman and officers. I accept that there are successes, but there are also disappointments. In fact, only two private operators are left, one of which is supposed to be pulling out. The Secretary of State should have taken much more notice of the county's representations. The county put a great deal of effort into that scheme and deserves some credit. Its co-ordinating role will be diminished to a large extent by the Bill.

It would have been far more sensible if a trial in an urban area had been pursued first. For example, in Plymouth outside consultants have been employed. In a detailed report, which I expect hon. Members have received, those consultants cast grave doubts on the costs and claimed advantages mentioned in the White Paper. They calculate that the proposed changes could increase rates in Plymouth by 22 per cent. They remark that Plymouth boasts a good bus system that costs the ratepayers relatively little. That is the case in many other parts of the country. Why destroy that system?

The outcry against cross-subsidisation is levelled especially at rural experiences. Insufficient attention has been given to the desirability of cross-subsidisation in urban areas. The changes will impose severe difficulties and certain cuts on my constituency. We unashamedly increase charges in the summer to pay for winter services. At present, about £500,000 of cross-subsidy comes from some of the profitable services whose profits are made in the summer months. That cross-subsidy, added to the £250,000 subsidy from the Isle of Wight county council, is needed to retain the uneconomic services. If the socially desirable services are to be saved by the Isle of Wight county council, the council would need to treble its present subsidy by taking money from the rate support grant. That could happen at a time when local authorities have less money available to them from central Government. The £20 million extra from the Government will do nothing to alleviate this problem. I believe that about £100 million would be more realistic. Even the Government's figures seem to show that at least £60 million is necessary.

Deregulation of taxi operators outside London is highly dubious. Such a scheme certainly did not work in parts of the United States. Privatisation of the National Bus Company by splitting it into smaller operating units is unlikely to be successful. I believe that the proposed break-up of the municipal public transport authorities is a retrograde step, especially in a place such as Tyne and Wear which, by common consent, has built up the finest co-ordinated transport system in the country.

The future of concessionary fares does not bear thinking about. It is time that the House insisted on the rest of the country being treated like London. Unfortunately, that measure was not written into the Tory manifesto at the last election. Undoubtedly, existing schemes and through booking arrangements are at great risk, especially if my Sealink experience is anything to go by—I suspect the members of the Select Committee expected me to make that point. Great difficulties have been experienced trying to maintain through bookings. Concessions for disabled drivers have been virtually removed.

I am concerned about the inclusion of clauses 94 to 100, which relate to rail services. I know those measures were included because of suggestions by a previous Select Committee. I believe that the time has come to halt all rail closures and even to reopen some lines. Our small overcrowded island cries out for a comprehensive rail network. The continuing chapter of hideous road accidents should persuade us of the need to preserve these priceless assets. We require more, not less, co-ordination; more, not less, co-operation; and more, not less, local involvement.

If enacted, the Bill will cause chaos. It will unnecessarily destroy what is good and replace it with an inferior product. It will lead to altercation and interminable disputes into which the police will inevitably and unnecessarily be drawn. I suggest that that is the position in Hereford. The Bill may lead to cheaper fares in the short run but, in the long term, the consumer, wherever he lives, will come to cuss the very mention of the name of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): I warmly welcome the Bill. We have seen an era of declining bus services and rising costs. They have been reflected in the rising subsidies that have been necessary.

I started in local government a long time ago at the age of 22 on St. Andrew's burgh council. During the first year in which I was a member of the council, Alexander's bus service, which is part of the Scottish Bus Group, asked for a subsidy for the first time. That bus company was given a subsidy. The next year it came back for more, and so on. No attention was paid to whether that service was provided in the best and most efficient manner possible. I believe that a stimulus is required to make such companies examine better ways of operating.

Not surprisingly, there has been a decline in rural services because of increasing car ownership. That has occurred partly because the ordinary public believe that it is desirable to own a car and partly because of necessity. There are unreliable bus services in the towns. I receive many letters—my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) has received such letters also—from constituents complaining that a bus due to arrive in their area of Hemel Hempstead did not turn up one morning. Sometimes the reason is a lack of drivers or maintenance, but often the reason is that a bus driver has slept in and has driven straight on to the next set of stops. That is unacceptable. When I ask people in factory canteens about the biggest problems in Hemel Hempstead, the inadequate bus service is their main criticism.

In contrast, we have the experience of the deregulation of the inter-city services. I am surprised that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State did not mention the incredible success of the commuter coach services, especially around London, which have been of great benefit to my constituents and have resulted in their being able to continue to work in London. They would not have been able to afford to stay in their jobs if they had been forced to rely on an out-dated and inefficient public transport system. That is the scene behind the White Paper and the Bill. Proposals have been made for extensive deregulation, but I believe that it is important to stress that we are not considering total deregulation. The proposals rightly pay attention to the need for more safety regulations.

There are, or should be, two objectives in our policy. We must have a more reliable, flexible and less costly service for the consumer, and secondly, we must make sure that we give the public the best value for money.

For the consumer, safety is probably the absolutely essential requirement, so I welcome the Government's commitment to an increased regime of safety requirements. I make two further points on that score. First, if the safety inspections are to be effective, the penalties must be swift and there must be no question of matters dragging on as a result of a contested appeal system. Secondly, I commend to the Secretary of State and to my hon. Friend a three-tier system in which an operator could lose part of his licence for one route or his licence for all the areas in which he is operating under this Bill, or could lose his operating licence for all bus services whether under this Bill or not.

On flexibility, much has been said about the ability to introduce taxis or minibuses as an alternative to buses, but little has been said about the possibility of co-ordinating rural bus services with the school bus network. Here, I believe, there are possibilities of real savings. During the past fortnight in my constituency, a rural route running from Potten End to Hemel Hempstead was cut by the county council. It was replaced immediately by a private contractor who, because he was operating on a school run, was very willing to continue during the rest of the day to provide a service for the ordinary passenger wanting to go and shop in the town. The service is now more regular than ever it was before the county council service stopped.

The evidence concerning prices is staggering. The most comprehensive report is the 1980 production by the United Kingdom Transport and Road Research Laboratory. It produced the statistic that the mean fare in areas covered by private bus services was 25 per cent. lower on rural and inter-urban runs than in areas covered by public sector contractors. This is hardly surprising. The reasons were that they used lower-cost premises, had greater flexibility of staff, including part-timers and mechanic-drivers, had more one-man operations and used more small vehicles —a correct response to the market.

As regards value for money, I believe that the prime consideration should be competition. If the same or a better service can be provided at the same or a reduced cost, that is the essential test of efficiency. But we must make sure that that competition is fair and frequent. It is no good having competition with municipal bus services if they are not putting their assets in their accounts at a proper valuation or are in various other ways seeking to lower the costs that would appear in a normal private sector company's accounts.

Similarly, it is no good having large undertakings able to buy routes. Therefore I welcome the proposals of my right hon. and hon. Friends for breaking up the National Bus Company. However, I must ask why this does not apply to London, where, above all, it is needed.

I want to put a question to my hon. Friend on creaming off services, which I hope he will reply to in winding up. How would the competition requirements work where, say, the middle part of a route might well be profitable whereas the two ends would, under the present system, be unprofitable? Surely the answer is to make sure that the route is treated as a whole and is subject to competition.

This Bill will be a tremendous advance for the bus passengers in my constituency. I am sure that they will find they have a better service, as has already been proved in the one area which has undertaken to operate a private sector service in advance of the Bill.

I commend this Bill to the House.

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): We have heard in this debate about the effect that this Bill will have on passengers, and I think that there will be quite devastating effects, particularly in rural and suburban areas. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) explained, quite rightly, the effect that this Bill is going to have on road safety. I should think that in the chaos that will result from the operation of this Bill thousands of people will be injured, maimed or even killed in the rat-race competition that will exist on the roads. It is the biggest setback to road safety that has ever come before this House.

I do not want to pursue those lines in the limited time available to me, because I speak as a sponsored Member of Parliament of the Transport and General Workers Union, which is the union most affected, and indeed a member of the passenger branch of that union. I want to talk about the impact that this Bill will have on the jobs of drivers, conductors and inspectors in the PTEs, in the municipal bus undertakings, in the National Bus Company and, not least, among taxi drivers, whether employees or owner-drivers. They have not been mentioned a great deal in this Bill and they are seriously affected by its provisions.

The whole Bill is quite explicit that manpower will be reduced, and it is my contention that this will be effected by severe reductions in services. Certainly the services will exist on the more profitable routes, as has been said in the debate, but in the rural and suburban areas services will disappear altogether—that will be the effect of this Bill—and jobs will be lost as a result.

On the question of manpower, the explanatory memorandum states:

> "Public sector manpower will decrease by some 50,000 as a result of the transfer of the operations of the National Bus Company to the private sector; a further decrease is expected as a result of improved efficiency in public sector bus operations."

What that means is that services will be cut.

On page ix, it is stated, in reference to the public sector:

"the transfer of the bus operations of PTEs and of district and regional councils to companies will involve transitional costs (mainly on professional fees) of about £1m. Where competition causes a reduction in the scale of some public sector operators, there may be redundancy costs."

There will be redundancy costs on a very large scale indeed. Let us take the 50,000 employees of the National Bus Company, that highly successful, efficient and profitable nationalised industry which the Secretary of State is aiming to destroy. Clearly the Government do not envisage that all 50,000 will merely change their employer. Jobs will go. The competitive successor companies will not run routes to rural villages. They will not run in the evening or on Sundays. It would be quite contrary to their purpose so to do because their raison d'être is to make a profit, not provide a service. So many more thousands of jobs will be lost in that sphere.

The same applies to the companies which will succeed the municipal undertakings. They will not be competing fairly with the privateers. The Secretary of State has seen to that in this Bill. They will be competing with one hand tied behind their backs, waiting for the day when the successor companies that he has created disappear again entirely into the private sector.

The privateers are in this business for profit, not for the comfort, safety or convenience of passengers. They will cut down to the bare minimum that they can get away with in questions of maintenance and cleanliness, because not to do so would reduce their profits. The people they employ need not be full-time bus men. As long as he holds a PSV licence there is nothing to stop a driver working for a number of firms or working in a completely different occupation at night or during part of the day and then moonlighting as a driver for low wages and in bad conditions. Does the Secretary of State know the sort of wages that many private coach operators pay their drivers? The men are often paid pin-money wages in the hope that they can make up their wages in tips. These are the people who will be the first to jump at the pickings to be had from becoming privateers under this Bill.

Indeed, the Bill recognises that there will be lower standards. Clause 81(3), which deals with tendering for subsidised services, says quite specifically:

"An invitation to tender under this section may not include conditions with respect to the terms of employment of persons to be employed in providing any service to which the invitation to tender relates."

They must not even look at service and the conditions of the drivers in the particular industry.

I have already mentioned taxis and taxi drivers and hire cars. Clause 14 takes away powers which have existed for nearly 140 years to limit the number of taxis. What will be the effect of this on, for example, the owner-drivers so dear to the Conservative party? Many people in my constituency invest their redundancy pay in taxis. Are we to have unlimited numbers of taxis plying for hire on the roads? Many will go out of business. Their owners will lose their livelihoods and their businesses. That will be the effect on them of unbridled competition.

Some of the Bill's provisions are ludicrous. Let us take the provision in clause 9 that deals with carrying passengers at separate fares. As a result, needless competition with buses will be created. I ask hon. Members to imagine the situation at 11 pm on a Friday or Saturday night, when four people sharing a cab all want to go to different destinations. Who will be dropped off first? Who will be dropped off last? Who is going to pay what? Which direction will the taxi take first? After squabbling and fighting with one another, the passengers will probably all turn on the poor taxi driver. That is the effect that clause 9 will have.

By any standards this is a bad Bill. I agreed with the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) that even if the Secretary of State wished to pursue his mania for privatisation, he could have done so in a far better way. For example he could have considered franchising. I would not have supported that, but the fact remains that he should not have wiped out road service licensing, as he has done in the Bill. The only thing that gives me some comfort is that if the Bill is enacted it will come into operation on 1 October 1986. It will take six to 12 months for the chaos resulting from it to come home to the people, and the effects will particularly hit those in the rural and suburban areas. That means that their dissatisfaction will coincide with the date of the next general election. Conservative Members will have many difficult questions to answer in those constituencies affected, and will probably lose them as a result of going through the Lobby tonight.

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North): Whenever I listen to trade-union sponsored Opposition Members, I reflect on what their forebears would think of them. Those who came in in the late 19th century full of radical ideas that were right for their time have been succeeded by people who oppose every change and are the most conservative Members of Parliament.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has rightly chosen the most radical option open to him — the introduction of competition into an area that has become almost synonymous with monopoly. Slowly and imperceptibly over the past 50 years the bus services have come to be run for the benefit of the operators and their staff and not for the benefit of the customer. Too often timetables are suited to vehicle availability and not to consumer demand. Too often urban and rural bus routes owe much more to history than to present requirements.

Nor is it surprising that monopoly operators' costs are considerably higher than those of the private sector. There is no spur to efficiency. Whenever losses increase, they simply go back to their sponsoring councils and ask for an increase in their annual subsidies. For them there is no danger of lost jobs or of a visit to the bankruptcy court. For many years there has been no true competition.

It is not only the operators whom we must blame. Far too often councils of all political persuasions have forked out subsidies without proper scrutiny. For some councils, particularly in the municipal areas, a subsidised and inefficient public transport system has become part of their political creed and has become necessary for dogmatic reasons, at whatever cost. Others have either bowed to local political pressure on routes or have simply failed to compare the subsidy required by their operators per mile with those of similar operators in other parts of the country. They have simply failed to use sensible housekeeping techniques.

We cannot say with absolute certainty what will happen as a result of the Bill. Competition breeds uncertainty and the market's reaction is unpredictable. However, like other hon. Members, I can say what is likely to happen. We know what happened with the deregulation of long-distance routes. We know that many new routes have come into being, that there has been a real fall in the level of fares and that there has been a dramatic increase in the number of passengers. We have heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) about the happy experience in the Hereford trial area. We know about the experience in Norfolk, where the same service was run for a considerably lower subsidy. We also know that the National Bus Company and other public sector operators have considerably higher costs per mile than their private sector competitors.

So the evidence is that there will be an increase in the services available and a decrease in the subsidies needed as a result of the Bill. Yet we must bear in mind that replicating the success of the Hereford trial area and of the long-distance coach deregulation depends crucially on the detailed implementation of the Bill. For example, there would be little point in simply denationalising the NBC as a whole. That would simply create a private sector monopoly where we previously had a public sector monopoly. If we are to obtain proper competition, the NBC must be split into a number of relatively small units. They must be small enough so that they can be bought by local management and employees, and so that their size and ability to absorb interim losses does not deter private sector operators from entering the market. Yet they must be big enough to compete with the municipal operators and the PTEs.

There is no ideal size for any one part of the country, but each different unit must be looked at from the standpoint of the market, and the competition in the area. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State must make it clear to the management of the NBC that he will judge its proposals on its ability to increase competition alone.

My right hon. Friend must also be careful about the way in which he allows councils to tender for routes. We have seen evidence in the NHS of the way in which tendering terms can be rigged to favour the in-house work force. There is a danger that unless my right hon. Friend is extremely careful, the same sort of factors will operate in tendering for bus routes. Through the tendering process, my right hon. Friend must ensure that we maximise competition. He must not be afraid to react very quickly to enforce the splitting up of the large municipal operations and the PTEs where that would increase competition.

I firmly believe that the Bill will result in better services, lower fares and lower subsidies, and that it will be good for the consumer, the taxpayer and the ratepayer. But the passage of the Bill will not, in itself, guarantee that. I look to my right hon. Friend to ensure that he takes every decision with a view to increasing competition.

Mr. Harry Cowans (Tyne Bridge): I apologise in advance to the House because I am a member of a Committee that is sitting upstairs and I shall not be here to listen to the Minister's concluding speech.

I would have found the speeches of many Conservative Members more credible if there had been some sign at the beginning that the reasoned amendment would be accepted. The Select Committee took evidence from passengers, operators and others involed right across the industry. The Secretary of State would have us believe that people really want the Bill. He could easily have proved that by accepting the reasoned amendment. All the evidence would then have been available to hon. Members, who could have made up their own minds on the matter. But the truth is radically different. If the Minister does not intend to accept the reasoned amendment, there is an onus on him to prove that the Bill will work.

On the balance of evidence presented to the Committee, at least there were expressions of grave concern, many of which came from bodies that normally support the Conservatives, and at worst there was outright opposition. But alternatives were proposed also. The amendment asks that the report of the Transport Committee be made available to all right hon. and hon. Members so that they can make up their minds on the evidence presented to it before the Bill is enacted. We are not asking for a great deal. I speak now as Chairman of the Select Committee on Transport. We worked long and hard and we took advice from everybody who asked to appear before us. The benefit of that evidence should be made available to the House.

What are we asking the House to do? The Committee will be in a position to present its report to the House within the next two weeks and all the evidence for and against could then be made available to hon. Members. That is all I wish to say as Chairman of the Committee.

If the Minster is not prepared to accept the amendment, I can draw only one conclusion, that he does not wish right hon. and hon. Members to have the benefit of this information before they make up their minds. When the Minister winds up, I hope that in his opening words he will say that he accepts the amendment.

I acknowledge that the Bill states that people can operate concessionary fare schemes. Of course they can. But what good is it to have a brand new pass tucked in one's top pocket or handbag if the service one wishes to use no longer runs? That is precisely what happened in Hereford. Five and six buses arrived together, with large gaps between the services. Conservative Members may laugh, but I shall quote one of their supporters, a busman who went to the other place. Referring to Hereford, he said:

> "There are not enough passengers to justify the number of buses which fill the narrow streets of Hereford, upsetting the shopkeepers and others. It is perfectly obvious that there is wasteful competition. The position is unstable and it must be a matter of surprise that it has continued in this way for so long."

That was one of the Government's supporters speaking, yet Conservative Members have the audacity to try to convince the Opposition of the rightness of their case. This same supporter said of the trial area in Hereford:

> "But, looked at as a prototype for the rest of Britain, scrutiny of this gem shows that it is no more than paste."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 October 1984; Vol. 456, c. 307.]

I think that we would all applaud that.

As to the Tyne and Wear metro, is it not ironic that there was a system that was the envy of the world—even the Minister and the Secretary of State thought that it was a marvellous concept, and have said so—yet the co-ordinated transport system which made it possible is to be removed from the local authority? Surely if one believes that something is marvellous, one does not remove the means of building it up.

There is no provision in the Bill to deal with the congestion that will occur in city centres. The objective of private operators is to make a profit, and they will pick up the lucrative routes and operate at the peak times. As a result, there will be a massive build-up in city centres with no controlling provision in the Bill. This will lead to a free-for-all. If the Government are so worried about the consumer, they might give a passing thought to the pedestrian.

There is no sense to the Government's argument on the rural lines. The Conservatives forget that it was they who changed the legislation. It was they who made it easier for a person to obtain a licence by application to the traffic commissioners. The only criterion applied by the traffic commissioners under the previous legislation was that, as long as it was not against the public interest, the applicant could be granted a licence. If that is so, where are the queues of people making application under the provisions of that Conservative legislation? I was a member of the Standing Committee which considered that legislation in its passage through the House. At that time, the Conservatives claimed that people would flock to apply for licences. The Conservatives sponsored that legislation, yet they now have the audacity to complain about the lack of rural services. That legislation did not work, so it is back to the drawing board. But I have news for the Government: this Bill will not work either, and it will be back to the drawing board once more. In the meantime, the people whom the Government are allegedly looking after—the poor, the weak and the disabled—will be deprived of services.

Who on earth wants to run a bus service that does not make a profit? Conservative Members talk about free competition. It is an irony that it is all right for the local authority to subsidise those services on which it cannot make a fast buck, but the Government will not permit competition in a free market. The Bill is concerned with hiving off the lucrative runs for private enterprise, with the local taxpayer having to pick up the leavings.

Even the Minister did not claim, as did the hon. Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar), that Hereford was a success. Nor, indeed, did the White Paper claim that it was a success. Does not the hon. Member for Enfield, North find it strange that not one trial was undertaken in a major conurbation, yet it is the major conurbations which will have these schemes thrust upon them?

I believe that, just as happened in the case of the Local Government Bill, it will not be long before this matter is back for consideration in the House when the Conservatives have mail bags full of complaints from people who cannot get buses, and once again it will be back to the drawing board.

It is not too late to amend the Bill and to consider the options that will emerge from a study of the report of the Select Committee. I have heard Conservative Members claim many times that they will put the country back on its feet. I did not realise that this was how they intended to do it.

8.10 pm

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): There were good reasons for the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans)—the Chairman of the Select Committee on Transport — not being able to visit Hereford and Worcester, and I do not criticise him for that. However, I went there and what I saw convinced me that the experiment in that area had been a terrific success.

I am a member of the Select Committee, as is my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry). I do not think that it was right of him to talk about Hereford and Worcester in the way that he did and about the reservations that some people expressed about some of the effects of deregulation, without at least mentioning that everyone to whom we spoke who actually used buses was convinced that the experiment had improved matters and did not want to return to the previous system.

Mr. Stott: When the hon. Gentleman visited Hereford and Worcester, did he speak to the planning officer of the city of Hereford and obtain his views? I have met that gentleman on no less than three occasions, and he maintains that the experiment in the city has put back environmental improvement for at least 20 years. He said that the experiment was a total disaster.

Mr. Parris: Members of the Select Committee spoke to many members of the council, and I think that the planning officer was a member of the panel that we interviewed. I asked the panel members whether they used buses. Not one of them did, other than a Liberal councillor to whom the other members deferred for experience of how services had improved under deregulation.

I shall not vote against the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough, because I, too, regret the fact that the Government are going ahead with Second Reading before they have had time to see the report that the Select Committee will produce shortly. However, I shall not withold my support for the Second Reading of the Bill because I am sure that deregulation will bring real benefits to the bus industry and its passengers.

Let us imagine that Britain did not have a system of free competition for the sale of food and household goods. Let us imagine that county council policy — quite understandably—was to seek to ensure that each locality was served by one adequate licensed grocer's shop. In return for the award of an effective monopoly, the county council quite properly attached to the licence conditions relating to the range, quality and price of the goods and the hours of opening of the shop. The argument for monopolies—quite plausibly—would be that it would be inefficient to duplicate facilities. The argument for attaching conditions to a licence—equally plausibly—would be to prevent the abuse of monopoly.

Let us imagine that it was common practice to grant licences to operate groceries in profitable populated localities on condition that the grocer was prepared to accept groceries in unprofitable areas where the shops met a social need, but where no reasonable profit could be made. Let us imagine that the Government of the day proposed to deregulate that market, allowing people to set up groceries wherever they liked, often in competition with each other, some even—if I may make such a preposterous suggestion—next door to each other. What would be the reaction? I think that I would be right to assume that deep alarm would be felt on both sides of the House and throughout the country.

A Select Committee, genuinely anxious to hear from all who wished to testify either for or against the proposal, would have invited testimony. Learned men would have volunteered—professors and retailing consultants. They would have explained why the supposed benefits would not have materialised. They would have said that the demand for over-the-counter groceries was not elastic—one either needed a bar of soap, or one did not. They would have concluded that prices ultimately would be pushed up, not down, as a finite volume of trade was spread over an expanding number of outlets and retailing hours.

The shop workers' union would have given evidence. The spectre of bucket shops, part-time grocers, amateur grocers and moonlighting grocers would have been raised. After that, the Committee would have taken evidence from the local authorities. It would have been genuine, earnestly felt evidence. The men who gave it would have been intelligent and hard-working people, convinced of the value of their labours. They would have told us how they were using their licensing powers creatively and imaginatively to promote standards of social provision, good practice, helpful service and adequate stocking.

Their evidence would have been persuasive. They would have told spine-chilling stories—true stories—of pirate corner shops overcharging, of cut-throat competition, of elderly people being confused about prices, weights and measures, and they would have raised the spectre of the get-rich-quick grocers creaming off the profitable passing trade in Tizer and fairy cakes, leaving the good old licensed stores to look after the old people, the housewife and the sale of pints of milk and loaves of bread where no easy profit could be maintained. They would have said that only a licensing system could sustain such practices. They would have assured us that it would be a mistake to put our faith in a free market for the sale of groceries.

Our faith would have been shaken further by a delegation from the Association of Trading Standards Officers. Its evidence would have been grave and sincere and full of foreboding. Disinfection, refrigeration, stock turnover and due respect for sell-by dates would all have been earnestly discussed. Salmonella would have been mentioned in passing. They would have suggested that food standards would be the first casualties in a trading war between grocers. They would have said that when the war was over the newcomers would revert to high prices and low standards, and the county would have lost its licensing authority to prevent that.

Hot on the trail of the counties would have come the metropolitan authorities. They would have explained the integrated retailing policy that they had developed in their areas — the right shops in the right places; shopper representation on the board of every store; consumer education to encourage wise purchasing policies by the shopper and a controlled distributive trade to ensure the minimum number of lorries to deliver efficiently. They would have detailed all those great benefits, and the eyes of the members of the Committee would have opened wide at the thought of all those great benefits being threatened by deregulation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough would have stepped forward, olive branch in hand and said, "Let us admit that all has not been as it might have been with the grocery trade. Let us confess that certain stores could be better run and that some supermarket chains have taken licensing authorities for a ride. But gentlemen, we can deal with that in a civilised way without all the vulgar instability of a free-for-all. Let franchising for the running of shops be put out to competitive tender. Let the bargaining and the cut and thrust of competition take place not on the streets with shoppers as the hostages, but in the smoking room, between county councils and the established grocers."

What would the Committee have concluded, having heard all that evidence? Would it be conservative and advocate the retention of the status quo, or would it have dared to be radical and recommend the excitement and uncertainty of competitive tendering for a grocer's licence? Only time will tell. All that can be said with confidence is that, having considered whether there should be a free-for-all in shopkeeping, with two or even three grocers competing for the same custom in the same area, the Committee would have heard little to convince it that such a regime could possibly be acceptable, and much to persuade it that it could not.

When members of the Select Committee were in Hereford and Worcester, seeing for themselves the effects of deregulation, as I came out of the meeting having heard an afternoon's evidence, a lady bus passenger asked me whether she could give evidence. I said that it was unlikely that the Committee would hear her unless she was part of a body or represented an organisation. She asked how she could tell the Select Committee that the bus passengers in the town approved of deregulation. I suggested that she asked people to sign a petition. She walked out of the hotel foyer, and in the next post to London came a petition with 100 signatures from people who used the bus service to that lady's council estate. All of them said that the service had improved immeasurably since Midland Red (West) Ltd. had lost its monopoly and that they did not want a return to the previous position.

I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State believes, as I do, in a free market, and I know that he has faith that the free market can bring benefits. One journalist says that he is batty. If to believe that human beings may not operate at their best when their efforts are not open to challenge by others makes one batty, I am proud to call myself batty, too, and to vote, as I shall, for the Bill's Second Reading.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston): I wish to oppose the Bill. First, let me declare an interest as a sponsored member of the Transport and General Workers Union and a former bus worker. In addition, in my constituency there are two bus garages — Parkhead, which is one of the largest in Strathclyde PTE, and Baillieston, which is a Scottish Bus Group garage. Many hundreds of my constituents depend upon the bus industry for their livelihood. Thousands more depend upon public transport, as many of them do not possess or have access to a car. In parts of Glasgow, 70 to 80 per cent. of the population have no alternative to public transport if they want to go anywhere.

In my constituency, adult unemployment is over 30 per cent. and goodness only knows what the youth unemployment level is. Good, reliable, cheap public transport is an essential if people are to have a reasonable quality of life.

In his opening remarks the Secretary of State referred to my prediction of five years ago. What the then Secretary of State failed to do, the present Secretary of State seems determined to do with this Bill — to destroy public transport in Britain. My prediction may not be so far out. Only time will tell.

There is a simple reason for the decline in the use of public transport. People who have the use of a car prefer to use it and the vast majority will continue to do so, even if public transport is free. The car is the most popular form of transport and there is nothing wrong in that.

However, it is those who do not have access to a car whom we want to attract on to public transport, and we want them to make as many journeys as possible. It is the Government's economic policies which have created over 4 million unemployed, which has had the greatest effect on public transport, in the past five years. Unemployed people do not travel to work and have a greatly reduced need to travel for leisure, recreation, culture, shopping, visiting, and so on. That, in turn, affects the viability of many routes and services as well as the entire community. Get people back to work and we shall see great increases in the demand for public transport.

Let me pay tribute to the hundreds of thousands of working men and women who operate public transport services of all kinds in this country—services which we all take for granted. Transport workers have a difficult job, working all sorts of hours in all sorts of conditions, such as the weather that we are presently experiencing, yet they seldom fail to operate the services. They face the continual stress and responsibility of driving in all kinds of conditions, serving the public, and, unfortunately, the ever-present threat of assault and abuse. In addition, most of them have to work overtime, including rest days, to earn a reasonable living. I should love to see the Secretary of State out at 4 am in freezing conditions or driving a bus until midnight on a Saturday and Sunday. It might even change his attitude to transport workers.

What is the Secretary of State's attitude to transport workers? What thanks are bus workers to get for providing over 50 years of relative stability in their industry? No thanks whatever. In fact, a kick in the teeth is much more likely. Clause 76 enables the Secretary of State to make regulations for compensating persons for loss of employment or loss or diminution of emoluments—in other words, redundancy or less pay and poorer conditions.

Privatisation will be a disaster for the bus industry. Proper co-ordination will become impossible, putting an end to integrated timetables, through ticketing, through services and nationwide marketing. Cross-subsidy will be impossible, so many services will be reduced or withdrawn. Over 50,000 bus workers will be transferred to the private sector without any choice as to who their new employers will be. Jobs will be lost, union agreements torn up, pension schemes, sick pay and holiday agreements put at risk, and hard-won terms and conditions of service thrown out of the window.

The sad thing is that all that is unnecessary. The National Bus Company is making a profit, has repaid Government loans and improved productivity. Its crime is that it is succeeding as a publicly owned company and that is unacceptable to the Secretary of State.

It is most unlikely that new small operators will purchase new buses. It is much more likely that they will buy reject old vehicles from the NBC or PTEs. However, if they do buy new vehicles they are more likely to be imported than is presently the case. Has the Secretary of State estimated the effects of the Bill on companies such as Leyland and Alexander's Coach Builders? How many jobs will be lost in that respect as a result of the Bill?

I wish to deal with some Scottish aspects of the Bill, in particular, the Scottish Bus Group and British Rail services within Strathclyde region and Strathclyde PTE. The Secretary of State has said that he has no plans to privatise the Scottish Bus Group at present. Everyone believes that it is only a matter of time before it will be privatised. Why does he not come clean and tell us his true intentions now? It is not in the best interests of the company, the work force or the passengers not to know how long the company will be allowed to operate as it is at present.

The Strathclyde rail review is the result of long negotiations between British Rail and Strathclyde region. The Bill could mean the disintegration of the review. That will lead to an adverse effect on British Rail's income so that it will have to find more and more ways of keeping costs down. Therefore, there will be more and more service reductions or withdrawals, especially in the evening. It will mean taking a new look at many services such as the electrification and investments proposed for the Glasgow to Ayrshire corridor. If the main routes between Ayr and Glasgow are to be ripped off by cowboy operators, what chance is there of improvement in real services? What is the point of British Rail spending millions of pounds if cowboy bus operators are to cream off all the profits?

There is also the unanswerable environmental aspect of the proposed electrification schemes. In addition, the A77 Glasgow to Ayr road is one of the most dangerous in Scotland and the last thing that we need are convoys of clapped out buses on that road. What will the Secretary of State for Scotland tell his constituents if the Ayr electrification scheme does not go ahead because of the Bill? It is most disappointing that he is not present in the House when matters affecting Scotland are being discussed.

Transport operators work from 4 am to midnight, not from 8 am to 6 pm as would be the case for many new operators. The effect on integration tickets, transcards, interlink services and feederlink services will be detrimental in Strathclyde.

If deregulation is the answer to all the transport problems, why is London being left out of the Bill? I am not arguing for it to be included, but is that not rather inconsistent? Or does not the Secretary of State believe in his own proposals? However, he is content to break up Strathclyde's transport system, and could conceivably cause 1,000 jobs to be lost in that area.

Strathclyde contains many uneconomic urban bus routes which will not attract the proposed subsidy for rural services. In October I asked the PTE for information on the costs of all its services in Glasgow. Let me quote from the director's reply:

"it is broadly fair to say that on the last available figures out of 67 services only 4 more than recovered their total costs, 4 were broadly break even while the balance required support. Of this balance of 59, 11 were of such a social nature that their revenue earned did not recover 50 per cent. of their costs."

What will happen to those services?

Strathclyde has the lowest level of bus support in conurbations throughout the United Kingdom. It is at the forefront of the development of microbuses in some of the largest housing schemes in Europe. Another new development is the swap body concept for rural transport. We also have the metroliner, new city buses and a door-to-door dial-a-bus service. Most important of all, it has the first specifically designed double-deck vehicles capable of carrying disabled passengers and operating on regular day services.

Strathclyde has a comprehensive system of concessionary fares. It covers 5,000 square miles and serves half of Scotland's population. I can foresee that literally hundreds of new operators will emerge as a result of the Bill. It will not be possible to have a properly operated system of concessionary fares. The public are bound to suffer as a result. Many rail services and bus innovations are at the development stage and need protection from predators if they are to succeed. They need time to become established.

If London is to be excluded from the Bill because of special circumstances, an equally good case can be made out for Strathclyde. Why does not the Secretary of State exclude Strathclyde from the Bill for the time being to give it the same opportunities as London? Will he give the House an assurance that he will reconsider the position of Strathclyde?

There are three main objectives behind the Bill, none of them concerned with providing better services to the public. It seems to undermine trade union organisation and solidarity in the transport industry; to undermine local government even further and to cut public sector manpower and create further reductions in public expenditure at the expense of those less fortunate members of the community—the non-car-owner, the non-driver, the old and the young, the handicapped and the disabled, the unemployed and the poor.

I am grateful to Councillors Laing and Meldrum of Strathclyde region for providing me with a brief of the effects of the Bill on the disabled in Strathclyde. Presumably, the disabled face the same problems in other areas. Time allows me to quote only one paragraph, but I should be happy to let the Secretary of State have a copy of this three-page document. It says:

"With the development of an uncoordinated system of public transport, with many different types of vehicle being used, it will be difficult for a disabled individual to plan a journey. For example, a blind person may not know whether he enters the bus from the rear or the front; a person with a locomotor impairment may not know whether he can get back from a journey if the bus changes from a low floor coach to a high floor coach. There is also the problem for the mentally handicapped, who may have been on courses to familiarise themselves with the bus system. After privatisation, they may have to use a more unfriendly service which creates a more hostile and stressful environment."

I urge the House to oppose the Second Reading.

8.30 pm

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I warmly welcome the Bill, and I shall confine my remarks to part I, which is concerned with bus deregulation.

Critics of the Bill argue that it will bring a loss of services. All that we have heard from Opposition Members today is that we must protect the status quo. We have heard nothing about how to improve rural, indeed any, services. Not even did the Liberal spokesman, the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross)—who has done the usual Liberal thing of making a short speech and scuttling off—want more than the status quo.

What is the status quo that Opposition Members want to perpetuate? Patronage of buses and coaches in Britain has halved since 1953, down from 82 billion to 40 billion passenger kilometres per annum. The demand between 1972 and 1982 fell by 30 per cent., that at a time when the overall demand for transport was increasing rapidly. During that time, subsidies rose enormously. As the editor of one of the two excellent newspapers in my constituency, the Cumberland News, wrote—[Interruption.] He wrote a balanced editorial and he would object to Labour Members suggesting that he edits a Tory newspaper, considering that he is the vice-chairman of the Guild of Newspaper Editors and will be at the House of Commons tomorrow night to lobby us on the question of VAT; Opposition Members can tackle him then, if they wish. He wrote in a balanced editorial:

"In fairness, the Government is facing reality. For even in these days when figures of money sound like telephone numbers, the increase in bus subsidy in 10 years, from £10 million to more than £50 million, is truly staggering—and it has not controlled fares."

I might add that it has not altered the decline in rural services, either.

Most criticism of the Bill has been about its effects on rural services. The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) quoted the National Federation of Women's Institutes. Mrs. Anne Harrison, the chairman of that body, was quoted in my other excellent local newspaper, the Cumberland and Westmorland Herald, last week as saying:

"We are concerned that this legislation sounds the death knell of the rural bus."

I respect the WI, but Mrs. Harrison's warning is 15 or 20 years too late. What rural bus is she speaking of? The newspaper reported her as saying:

"Commercial operators will swarm like bees round a honeypot to the busy town routes, leaving rural ones with no bus services at all."

I have the largest constituency in England, 1,200 square miles, and what she fears has happened already; large chunks of my constituency have no services, and those with services have completely inadequate ones.

Are our critics arguing that we should freeze matters at their present levels? That seems to have been what Opposition Members have been arguing today. They have not spoken of how to halt the decline in rural and city services, just that we should leave things alone and keep the jobs for the boys. Any hon. Member who is arguing in favour of the present system of regulation is inevitably arguing in favour of a system which will gradually lead to the complete disappearance of all rural routes.

One must speak to people of a much older generation than that to which I belong to find someone who has seen buses in rural areas on Sundays. I hear Opposition Members talking about Sunday buses being affected by the Bill. We have not had Sunday buses for years. They have all gone.

Opposition Members complain that there might not be an integrated transport system enabling people to get home at night when they come off the train at perhaps 10 o'clock or leave the cinema. In most parts of rural Cumbria we have not had late night buses for years. The present system has given us precious few rural routes, and those that exist charge exorbitant fares.

I respect Opposition Members having to toe the line of the Transport and General Workers Union. It is legitimate for them to defend the rights of their members, but they must not say that they are concerned with rural services and the decline in bus services generally and go on to make bogus arguments about safety, concessionary fares and so on.

When the trade unions and others say that we must not interfere with the present system, they mean that scores of villages in my constituency should be condemned to the present system of not having any buses, or those that have buses should continue to have inadequate services. I have in mind the beautiful little village of Kirkoswald, which even now has only one bus a day. However, that village is well off compared with the neighbouring village of Dufton, which has only one bus each Tuesday and one each Saturday. But even that is better than the village of Roadhead, which has only one bus each Wednesday, like the village of Newbiggin, which has one each Tuesday. Those who live in the village of Dundraw must walk a mile in the hope of getting a bus passing on the main road.

Mr. Peter Pike rose——

Mr. Maclean: I will not give way because I do not want to detain the House for more than a few minutes longer.

If Opposition Members are boasting that we are having the marvellous achievement of 50 years of regulation, since the 1930s, and that what we have is what state control and a fully integrated system has achieved, that is a hollow boast in my constituency—[Interruption.] I think I hear Opposition Members shouting that I shall not have my constituency for long. I assure them that my majority would have been 10 times larger had the Labour candidate not disappeared through the floor, so to speak, having lost his deposit.

We see the result of 50 years of regulation. Opposition Members should be ashamed of themselves for wanting to retain that. If the pattern of the last 10 years is repeated, most of the hamlets and villages in my constituency will not have any buses by 1995, even with massive subsidies, and the subsidy support over the years has been absolutely enormous.

In Cumbria, revenue support in 1974 was £115,000. In 1984 it was £2·345 million, an increase of 2,000 per cent. Even I do not condemn that per se. I would support an increase in subsidy of that extent, if it had worked and increased the number of passengers. However, in the same period the number of passengers using buses dropped by 23 per cent., from 88 million to 66 million, in the Ribble catchment area, which includes Cumbria.

Does anybody seriously suggest that that trend can be reversed? The answer is no. We have seen on the graphs how the number of people using the buses has declined: the line on the graph goes straight down. The line on the graph showing the number of passenger miles travelled also goes straight down. But the line showing the amount of subsidy support on an expotential curve goes straight upwards. Unless we take radical action now, we shall see the escalation of subsidies, fewer passengers and fewer jobs for bus drivers.

Cumbria has a population of 480,000, 26,000 of whom travel by bus to work. If the pattern from 1974 to 1984 was repeated over the next 10 years, by 1994 the bus subsidy for Cumbria would be £50 million. In other words, the subsidy given to each person travelling to work by bus would be £2,000 per person per annum. On that basis, it would be cheaper to buy each person a Mini Metro because over 10 years we should have given them £10,000 each to travel to work by bus.

Allowing for everybody else using buses, including those who travel socially, the subsidy would be £460 per person per annum. At that rate is would be cheaper to buy each of them one of Clive Sinclair's C5 trikes. Indeed, we could buy each bus traveller a new trike each year. It would be cheaper to do that than to pay the bus subsidy.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda) rose——

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman should contain himself.

Another criticism of the Bill comes from vested interest groups. The Transport and General Workers Union claimed that safety would suffer when cowboy operators took to the roads. My constituents and I strongly resent that criticism of so-called cowboy operators. Private operators are already operating buses on school runs. If Opposition Members are calling them cowboys, perhaps they would care to come to my constituency, name names and allow the council to take action against the so-called dangerous cowboy operators. Critics of the Bill also refer to jobs. Of course jobs will be affected. But for how long do Opposition Members imagine that we can guarantee the job of every worker in the National Bus Company while the number of passengers that it carries continues to fall rapidly? We can only guarantee those jobs, and the jobs of others working in public transport, by persuading more customers to use the services.

The level of rural services has been declining and will continue to decline. The Government's plans for deregulation represent the last hope of safeguarding and improving our rural services. The decline has gone on for far too long. I will do my utmost to make sure that rural services are maintained and improved. The best way of doing that is to vote for the Bill, as I shall do. I urge all my hon. Friends to vote for it too.

Mr. Terry Patchett (Barnsley, East): My constituency has a strong interest in seeing the Bill defeated. I would have preferred the debate to take place on some other day as, ironically, I have had to cancel a driving test in order to speak in it. However, in Barnsley, East, being unable to drive is no great inconvenience, thanks to the cheap, efficient service provided by the south Yorkshire transport executive. The financing of that service has been made an issue by the Tories in many local elections, and they have been rebuffed by the vast majority of the local electors.

Three main issues affect my constituency. First, by choosing to put the Bill through, the Government are ignoring the will of the people. The electors of Barnsley, East have spelt out clearly their support for the present system. My constituents are aware of the dangers in a Bill that makes concessions to get-rich-quick cowboys and hives off the lucrative routes without any compassion for those using the less profitable routes. My constituents also know about the subsidies required to maintain services over all the routes, and in elections they have given those subsidies overwhelming support. My constituents are also aware of the benefits to the less well off that are obtained through the cheap fares policy of the south Yorkshire transport executive.

It is big businesses and the better off who scream for tax cuts and rate cuts, and it is they who are listened to by this uncaring and cynical Government whose policies in every field ensure that the rich become richer and the poor poorer. These are strange days for democracy, when the Government overrule the wishes of the majority of the people.

[Mr. Terry Patchett]

The second issue is the service itself. We have sensible fares that people can afford, free travel for pensioners, and real services in rural areas where, as the Government know, no private company would dream of providing them. Will the Minister explain how an out-patient who regularly has to attend hospital in town for treatment, but cannot afford a taxi, is to get to the hospital if the rural bus service is disbanded? Will the ever-increasing costs be borne by the county's ambulance services while the Secretary of State for Health and Social Security is gleefully cutting hospital services?

The south Yorkshire transport executive has special buses to enable the wheelchair-bound to get into town. Do the Government really believe that a private company will provide such a caring service?

Thirdly, there is the question of jobs. There are two main bus depots, one in Shafton and one in Wombwell. The depots employ several hundred people, whose jobs will be put at risk by the Bill. That will be another wound to a community in an area where the Government and the coal board are seeking to destroy the traditional mining jobs and where a disastrously high rate of unemployment is rising still higher. There will be an effect on jobs in the town centre as well, because of the infrequency of services and the higher fares that will be extracted for the benefit of private profit.

I am sure that other right hon. and hon. Members will tell us more about the issues in the Bill and the effect that it will have on the quality of their constituents' lives. I can only hope that the House will stop selling out to the greedy and start caring for the needy, by voting against the Bill.

8.45 pm

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): Buses are a vital form of transport. Many people depend upon a bus service, as four households out of every 10 lack the use of a car, and yet the story of the bus service has been one of decline. Bus fares have increased by 30 per cent. more than either motoring costs or the cost of living, while, at the same time, services have diminished by some 15 per cent. Because there are fewer services and higher fares, fewer people take the bus. That vicious cycle can and should be reversed. The Opposition have attacked the spirit of competition. They will not squarely face the challenge of public bus transport provision. The Government will not shirk that responsibility. I support the principles enshrined in the Bill.

In two respects, the Government have the success of deregulation on their side. The long-distance coaches, attacked by Labour, have been set free, and that has resulted in some 700 applications for new services. That fact has been referred to only briefly by my hon. Friends and not at all by the Opposition.

Secondly, local bus deregulation has been shown to have worked in the trial areas of Norfolk, Exeter, Hereford and Worcester. The present system is not good for the bus user or the taxpayer. The Opposition say nothing about the limits on resources. The subsidy is hidden, for no one can see how much financial help is given to any specific route. The subsidy jumped from £10 million in 1972 to more than £500 million in 1982. Surely it is far better that we should see where the taxpayers' money is going. The subsidy should be visible and should go to needy services. Those services should not be hidden through inefficiency.

The present system stifles competition. The need for each local bus route to be licensed dates from 1930—the year of birth of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). After 55 years, the hon. Lady should recognise that it is necessary to move with the times. The title of the popular song of that year seems appropriate. The hon. Lady may recall it—"Time on my hands". That is exactly what the hon. Lady will have, as she waits for service under the present system.

The Opposition have not made one constructive suggestion for reversing the present decline. They are devoid of ideas. They will shore up inefficient, loss-making, overmanned monopolies rather than allow competition. Route licensing acts like a straightjacket. The present mini-monopolies stifle initiative. In York, for instance, the West Yorkshire Road Car Company tried —though it failed—to block a new service for tourists wishing to visit that fine historic city. The present operators have an air of self-satisfaction. They try to prevent the extension of services. I want more routes, better servicing and better safety standards. Over one fifth of buses fail their inspection stage, and that shows that the latter is essential. The Bill should make all those aims possible.

Hon. Members should consider the hidden subsidy on their own local services. How many York electors and York bus users realise that the present restricted service is subsidised by the taxpayer? How many realise that the subsidy has more than doubled from £162,000 in 1983-84 to £361,000 in 1984-85? Those figures do not take account of the £320,000 for old-age pensioner concessions. How much better it would be to offer concessionary fares to all operators. The Opposition do not mention that. That would help senior citizens and the disabled.

We need more flexibility in public transport. York has a park-and-ride scheme—a Socialist sop to a council that will not provide adequate car parking or encourage more effective modes. Private taxis and minibuses would have cost York ratepayers less than the council's bus undertaking.

There is a major area of bus policy that is not recognised in the Bill—a duty to ensure public bus mobility for the disabled. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take this matter on board. When county councils issue tender documents, they should ask what provision bus operators have made for the disabled through improvements in vehicle design, in the provision of routes and in staff training. When a person gets on a bus, he is often confronted immediately by a high step or a lack of handrails. The layout of the bus might be unfamiliar and a blind or partially sighted person might not know how the seats are arranged. There should be greater use of the system in Coventry where tactile symbols on the bus entrance indicate the type of layout that passengers can expect inside.

We should encourage the low step to be found on some buses and training to assist the handicapped. The special funds that the Bill envisages will, after enactment, enable such steps to be taken to make life as normal as possible for the disabled. A switch to different varieties of transport should not be allowed to be a step backwards to older and less appropriate vehicles for the disabled. Present design improvements should be pursued, such as, from the point of view of visually handicapped people, the use of clear contrasting colours to help passengers find their way around bus layouts and good lighting and bells that can be found without unnecessary difficulty. There should be a duty on operators to consider the needs of the disabled in bus design and route provision.

The provision for shared taxis in the Bill is good news for the disabled. It is another area in which concessionary fares will apply. Staff attitudes can be trained. Hon. Members should imagine the plight of a blind person waiting at a bus stop in an unfamiliar area. A bus sails past because it is a request stop and the blind person does not know. Things might be different if the driver is trained to stop at the sight of a waiting passenger with a white stick and if a notice with tactile symbols is posted on the stop.

Local authorities are responsible for bus stops and the commission that accrues from advertising. They should use special grants that are available to assist the disabled through aids such as the talking bus stops in Western-super-Mare which tell the time and the estimated arrival time of the next bus and announce its approach.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich said that no experienced operators support these proposals. She shows a complete lack of knowledge of the industry or no care for public transport by making such a statement. The hon. Lady prefers to talk to the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) than to hear the facts, but I shall nevertheless quote no less an authority than Mr. Stuart Appleby, the president of the Bus and Coach Council. He says:

"People have been dictated to far too long. The quality of service has been dictated by the operator."

In response to comments by the Transport and General Workers Union, he said:

"I understand their concern for rural transport but I do not think that they need worry. The services they were talking about will continue operating."

If the Opposition prefer the objective view of bus users, I shall quote the Welsh Consumer Council:

"The present public transport system cannot continue as it is very much longer . . . A new way forward is needed. The Government's proposals provide a framework within which we believe a new and better transport system can be built".

We should reverse the system that has produced declining services and increasing blanket subsidies. The machinery of state regulations of more than half a century ago is more than creaking. The time has come to ensure a proper service at a reasonable cost. That means competition with the safety valve for truly uneconomic but socially necessary routes. I welcome the Bill and ask all right hon. and hon. Members who truely care about the provision of public transport to support its Second Reading.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): I am a senior member of the Select Committee on Transport and recently went to Worcester and Hereford. The House has heard about Worcester and Hereford but nobody has yet mentioned the woman leader of the Tory minority on Hereford city council, which opposes the Bill because of the way that city has suffered. I understand that the council's planning officer has conveyed that view to hon. Members in preparation for today's debate. Hereford has had a ghastly experience, but that is not to say that lessons have not been learned or that the strengthening of the licensing system would not prevent some of the excesses that have been experienced in the Worcester and Hereford trial.

The hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory) said that he had heard no constructive suggestions from the Opposition. He will get positive comments from the Select Committee report. We shall try to produce an objective report—that is why we have tabled the amendment. Every right-minded hon. Member, including Conservative Members, should consider the cruel logic of the amendment. It would enable the House to have the benefit of the enormous information collected by the Select Committee. The study has been exhaustive.

The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) made an outstanding speech. The House should learn from what he said as nobody doubts his great experience in these matters, especially in regard to buses because of his association with the National Bus Company. He mentioned how the small operator can easily be put out of business. The man who runs the highly acclaimed Primrose service in Hereford and Worcester says it is not sufficiently profitable and that he is thinking of pulling out. He told me that wear and tear of vehicles is far greater in the stage carriage business than on long runs. If it were possible the operator would prefer to confine his business to holiday runs to the south of France. All sorts of skullduggery has arisen from that competition. The Midland Red is running services that it did not provide previously to drive the innovative service off the road. There has been a scramble for the bus stop in the heart of town, and because the buses cannot get on the roadway, they have been using the pathway.

Hereford city centre is extremely attractive, and I was glad to be there. We talked to members of the city council. The woman leader of the Labour minority asked pertinently why the White Paper did not apply to London. As a Londoner I could tell her that all hell would be let loose under the Bill's crude proposals. I cannot imagine what members of my union, the Transport and General Workers Union who are London busmen, would do if there was complete privatisation of buses of all sorts, sizes and qualities.

Members of the Select Committee talked to the traffic commissioner there. Although he did not disagree with the Bill as a whole, he said that he was afraid that as takings decrease as a result of competition with bigger operators —there will be bigger operators if the NBC is privatised — and profits decrease, safety will suffer first. Regulations about the interior of buses, such as those forbidding loose carpets and loose panelling will be affected. The test on public service vehicles that carry passengers is more severe than that on commercial vehicles. Some commercial operators may think that they can switch to buses on the cheap, but they cannot as they will discover in time. The traffic commissioner admitted that the rigidity of the safety standards, which we all want to see, would go.

In Committee the excessive nature of the Bill will become clear. Most of it is false arid doctrine, not wet doctrine, which appears from time to time from hon. Members on the Benches below the Gangway. Those hon. Members will take over the Tory party before it faces the next general election.

The proposals in the Bill are mad. I hope that the Bill is trimmed down. We could ensure that, if the House had the benefit tonight of the Select Committee's massive evidence. No one with practical experience of transport seems to like the Bill. There is a conflicting attitude about the effects that it will have on rural services. Privateers will not run services in rural areas merely for the love of it, merely to break even, nor if it provides a small profit, but only if it provides a big profit. Those are the only conditions acceptable to them. When they discover other forms of road vehicle operation they will suddenly pull out altogether and leave people stranded.

The hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) talked lovingly of having met a woman who said that the experimental area had been a great success, and that buses were more frequent than previously. But in the end bigger operators will drive out smaller operators. They could even run buses free of charge for a period. Predatory pricing would go on under privatisation and the struggle of the public service operator. That is going on at present, and will continue into the future unless there is a one-owner-driver vehicle.

There will be problems such as moonlighting. Drivers will not receive adequate medical attention. At present taxi drivers in London and elsewhere must undergo a stringent medical test. There will not be the present level of supervision, or the same wages standards and conditions, including pension arrangements. That is not true competition.

The taxi trade does not like the Bill. Taxi drivers are flexible. Taxi drivers outside London and many in London, although they have mixed feelings, think that it is possible to have taxi sharing, but do not believe that it can be done under the present system of hailing a taxi at the roadside. They believe that filling a taxi must be done by prior arrangement, which can be done at present. They do not mind an increase in those arrangements. One of my hon. Friends mentioned the position of women out at night, many of whom wish to take taxis because they feel safer doing so. I do not know why the Bill includes a taxi provision. For a long time taxi drivers have wanted special regulations that would properly assess their costs. It is the only transport service that is not relieved of VAT, which is one reason why taxi fares tend to be high.

I cannot discuss every facet of the Bill tonight, and I am aware of the promise to be reasonably short. However, I should say that the MVA Consultancy document on Plymouth estimates that under the Bill's crude arrangements, the rates in that area—which is a Tory one—would have to increase by about 22 per cent.

The Association of District Councils has got it right, and it represents authorities of all political colours. I hope that the Standing Committee will have available to it the considerable evidence heard by the Select Committee. The House should have had that evidence before this debate. I hope that many hon. Members will accept the logic of the work of Select Committee. Why do we have them? If they are not to obtain agreement among the parties on matters of common sense, they mean nothing. The Leader of the House said that he was proud of the work of the Select Committees. The work of the Select Committee on Transport will have been snubbed unless the House carries the amendment of the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry). If it does, the Bill will have to stand still until we receive the Select Committee's report in about a week or two.

9.6 pm

Mr. Michael Knowles (Nottingham, East): I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) would have wished to be here this evening if he were not abroad on parliamentary business, because we have discussed the effects of the Bill on Nottingham on various occasions. What has come through from the debate is that we have not heard one solid counter proposal from the Opposition. There are always a hundred reasons for doing nothing. What has come through is their love for the nanny state and of bureaucratic control for its own sake. The present system is a typical example of the 1930 ideology of rationalisation. It did not work well before the war, and it led to a 30-year decline in the bus industry. Everyone knows that it has continued for 30 years, but when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State proposes to do something about it, the immediate reaction is that his proposals are wrong and radical. But something must be done if the industry is not to die.

We heard precisely the same arguments a few years ago about the inter-city bus routes, and we need only consider the benefits that competition has brought there to see what can be within our grasp.

The inflexibility of the present controlled system means that when problems arise, we look only for further controls. As politicians and bureaucrats control the system, they have a vested interest in further controls. Nottingham's history is an example of that. Apart from introducing the bus lanes which beset every large city as a means of squeezing cars off the roads and forcing people into buses, before 1976 the Labour-controlled Nottingham authority introduced a mad scheme called the "zone and collar scheme". The idea was that if the authority could reduce the access points into the city and control them with traffic lights, which were always at red, it would force everyone to get out of their cars and use the buses. Of course, it did not work and was rejected by the local electorate, but it cost £800,000. But it is not untypical of other lunatic schemes introduced from time to time by transport authorities.

The council also planned to increase the bus fleet from 360 to 600 buses. Those buses were not needed, but the council was slavishly devoted to the idea of publicly owned transport. Fortunately, the Labour party lost control there in 1976, so its plan was held up. The bus fleet was reduced to 360 buses, which could more than cope with the demand.

Despite that experience, Nottingham bus services are now mostly sensibly run. Therefore, taken in isolation, one could probably make the case that it did not need the Bill. It is a pity that Nottingham did not volunteer to be a trial area, because it would have been a better trial area than some of the others. It has a catchment area of about half a million people. Nottingham has the largest municipal bus undertaking with 360 buses, the largest private bus operator with 264 buses, one of the larger units of the National Bus Company in Trent and a medium sized private operator in south Nottinghamshire, which would have been a better system for a trial. When it comes to open competition, those four major operators would be able to cope with any small additional operators. Of course, others would come in round the fringes, but those operators should maintain a successful network, almost certainly at lower fares than we have now.

I suspect that the biggest effect could be on taxis. Although people say that this will grow slowly, I suspect that there will be a very quick development of the taxi system. It will have a dramatic effect. We have to accept that this system of control has failed. Siren voices always proclaim that the end of controls, rationing and bureaucracy is dangerous and precipitate. They are right. Freedom is dangerous to a bureaucratic state. That is why I shall support the Government.

9.10 pm

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): My right hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Concannon) indicated in his speech that he would volunteer for the Standing Committee. I have to tell my right hon. Friend that we have an embarrassment of riches. My hon. Friends are queueing up to be members of the Standing Committee. It shows the importance we attach to this measure.

I should like to congratulate the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) upon his excellent speech. He gave the reasons that underlie his amendment. We should not be debating the Bill until the Select Committee has reported. His speech was delivered in a true House of Commons manner. It compared well with the lamentable performance of his hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) who used the most fatuous example of grocer's shop economics that I have ever heard.

During the debate on the Local Government Bill on 4 December 1984 the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) described the contribution of the Secretary of State for Transport as "a pathetic image of a speech." — [Official Report, 4 December 1984; Vol. 69, c. 190.]

The speech made this afternoon by the Secretary of State for Transport was, if anything, even worse than that. He was totally unconvincing and unpersuasive. When the Bill reaches the Standing Committee we shall make sure that he is made very well aware of our view.

I am not complacent, nor is my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). Public transport is suffering. There has been a decline in public transport. There has been a decline in the provision of public transport in our rural areas. That decline began in 1979 when this Government came to power. Since 1979 there has been an acceleration in the decline of our transport system. An increasing number of people find themselves condemned to virtual isolation. That has been said by many hon. Members during this debate. In particular, women, children, the elderly, the low-paid and the unemployed who depend upon public transport to get to their jobs or to see their families and friends are being denied that essential service.

Where it is provided properly, that service is, in my view, one of the most emancipating elements in the lives of ordinary people. However, those services have declined as a consequence of the transport policies of this Government since 1979. Local authorities, in particular Labour-controlled authorities, have been subjected to ever tighter squeezes on expenditure and public transport has suffered as a direct consequence. The transport supplementary grant has been reduced not only this year but by 23 per cent. since this Government came to office. Across the country we see what has happened to public transport. The National Bus Company ran 80 million fewer miles in 1983 than it did in 1979 when this Government came to office. There has been a positive decline in public transport since this Government came to power. When democratically elected Labour councils have tried to support public transport, the Government have tried to stop them by introducing cuts in grant and attempting to impose spending limits. This has recently been reinforced by the rate-capping legislation.

Not content with this catalogue of disaster, the Secretary of State is now introducing his Bill to deregulate and privatise Britain's bus industry. He bases this legislation on his own theoretical experience and on a small and inconclusive experiment in Hereford and Worcester. We have heard about the Hereford and Worcester experiment from all sides of the House, and I have taken careful note of what people have told me about their experience of that scheme. As time is short, I cannot pay full attention to all the matters that have been raised in the debate, but I advise the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) to read the speech of Lord Teviot, a former busman, who, in the other place, described his experiences when he visited Hereford and Worcester. He concluded:

"The city council regard the trial area as a disaster".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 October 1984; Vol. 456, c. 307.]

Mr. Colin Shepherd rose——

Mr. Stott: I cannot give way because I have a lot to say.

The Hereford and Worcester trial has been a total disaster. It is the wrong premise upon which to deregulate stage carriage bus services, to break up the PTEs, to break down the municipal operators into smaller units, to prepare local authority bus services for private ownership and to prevent direct subsidy for network services.

The White Paper which preceded the Bill shows that the proposals are based on the assumption that deregulation will bring new operators to the industry, lower costs, reduce fares and provide scope for new services. A thorough examination of the Government's proposals, and the evidence claimed to support them, shows that they are based on a crude economic theory of free market forces. That distorts the cost comparisons between private and public sector operations, and between the PTEs and the National Bus Company. There is no logical reason on the evidence available to support the Government's assertion that subsidy leaks into higher operational costs or that the industry does not benefit from economies of scale.

The evidence quoted and experiences in the trial area and from abroad, are highly selective, incorrect and will not stand the test of scrutiny. Clauses 81 and 84 oblige local authorities that wish to subsidise bus services to go into open competitive tendering. Those proposals are impracticable in a totally unregulated framework of operation. If the conditions of the contracted services are not protected from competition there is no way in which the operator who enters into a contract can know how long that contract will remain viable.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman rose——

Mr. Stott: No, I shall not give way. We have heard that argument from the hon. Member for Wellingborough and if Conservative Members are not prepared to believe me, they should at least give him the benefit of the doubt.

These proposals are really about reducing revenue support to meet public expenditure targets. A combination of the elimination of cross-subsidy, the cutting of revenue support and the other measures that have been put before us tonight will not work. They will not provide the services that the Secretary of State requires, but will do extremely severe damage to our bus industry. If hon. Members on the Government Benches refuse to believe what I say, perhaps I could refer them to the evidence taken by the Select Committee. The hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) should not shake her head. I am referring to the evidence given by the National Bus Company. My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Bagier) was questioning two gentleman from the National Bus Company, and I would not impugn their integrity, even if the hon. Member for Hereford does. My hon. Friend asked them about the reduction in revenue support. Mr. Beetham answered:

"It would almost certainly lead to a very severe reduction in the level of revenue-supported services, which may be provided by operators."

My hon. Friend then asked:

"You mean increased fares or less services?"

He replied:

"Both. How far a county could, from its own resources, make up that reduction in central government funding is another aspect of the situation, but there the county might face difficulties in other aspects, like rate capping which would affect that. I think there would be grave difficulties."

Mr. Brook, the chairman of the National Bus Company, just appointed by the Secretary of State, came into the argument at that point:

"I would be loath to see increased fares as a solution to this problem, because the fares are at levels already which are hardly bearable. It would require very substantial increases in fares and we would encounter great passenger resistance. My option would be to go for reduced services."

That is what the chairman of the National Bus Company said about the provisions of the Bill; those are not my words but his.

So far no one has referred to section 20 of the Transport Act 1968, which gives the passenger transport executives the right to pay to keep local railway lines open. This is a very important issue, particularly in Greater Manchester and in Strathclyde. No one has referred in the debate to the problems that are likely to occur if the Bill goes through as drafted. The activities of registered operators will clearly have implications for local rail services, where there is irect competition between the two. Registered operators may well draw a proportion of passengers from the local rail network with the effect of undermining further the financial viability of individual lines. Faced with these difficulties and a declining availability of revenue support, the authority is likely to be forced to withdraw support, with closure of the lines as the most likely outcome. This could effectively prejudice major investment proposals designed to improve the public transport infrastructure. There is no doubt that the proposals in Greater Manchester for a system of light rapid transit could be a casualty of this process.

Putting aside the practical operational implications of deregulation, there will be major problems with the forecasting of demand for revenue and concessionary support. In advance of deregulation the authority will simply not know what its revenue support requirements will amount to. Even when this is known, the activities of registered operators are likely to produce an unstable pattern of service for a number of years. I have already mentioned this. Concessionary support raises substantial difficulties of its own, not least the bureaucracy that is likely to be involved in preserving a system of permits and passes for those entitled to benefit. Again, forecasting of the demand for support is awkward in the absence of firm knowledge of who will participate in any scheme.

This is a highly complex area but it is important to put it on the record now. The proposed arrangements for concessionary travel within the general rate support grant structure require attention. At the moment children's travel is deemed to be financed from general rate support. There will have to be adjustments between the grant-related expenditure assessment for revenue support and the GREA for concessionary support.

For 1984-85, the Greater Manchester passenger transport executive estimated that its revenue support is £49·2 million. Of this total, at least £15 million, on the basis of revenue forgone by the executive, is attributable to children. Bearing in mind that much of this travel takes place during the peak times when costs are at their highest, the estimate is probably an understatement of the true cost. To put this issue in context, the current GREA for elderly concessionary travel in Greater Manchester is about £10 million, but the cost of providing that travel is £22 million. I suspect that other PTEs have similar figures.

If we are getting locked into highly complicated calculations about rent support grants, GREAs and concessionary fare travel, I suggest to the Secretary of State that this is such a crucial issue that we shall have to spend a great deal of time in Committee getting assurances that concessionary fares will not be undermined. The Labour party feels that if these provisions are passed as they are, there will be severe damage to the concessionary fares in the PTE areas.

In totality, the proposals remove from passenger transport the long-held status of a strategic industry with integrated networks such as Tyne and Wear. It is being relegated to a "use it or lose it" industry. If the current Government thinking is correct, the rest of the world is wrong. No other Government of any developed country are prepared to place the business of moving millions of people daily at the mercy and the inconsistency of the free market forces. The Secretary of State knows that and that is why he has excluded London from the Bill, and will not extend its provisions to London.

To placate some of his Back Benchers who have grave doubts about the Bill, the Secretary of State has said that the contents of the Bill when it has been passed will not be operational until December 1986, or perhaps early 1987. However, whether the Bill's provisions become operational sooner or later, these issues will become an election issue next year in the county council elections, and in the general election. People will have a clear choice. They can believe in a Secretary of State for Transport who continues to inhabit the higher astral planes of lunacy, and who will be solely responsible for the destruction of our bus services if these measures go through, or, on the other hand, they can take our alternative. The Labour party will be campaigning in those elections, putting our alternative strategy and our alternative transport policy. We shall tell the people that we shall restore local democratic control over their own affairs and that we shall preserve their bus services.

My hon. Friends the Members for Crewe and Nantwich and for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) and I have been addressing meetings up and down the country since the Secretary of State first produced his White Paper on the buses. I tell him and the House that these proposals do not have a friend anywhere——

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Rubbish.

Mr. Stott: —apart from one or two sycophants on the Government Benches. The pity is that the municipal operators, the National Bus Company, the well-established private operators, the Taxi Drivers Association, the Bus and Coach Council, the National Federation of Women's Institutes, Transport 2000, Rural Voice, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of District Councils and the general public —the customer, the people who matter—have shown their objections to the Secretary of State's proposals.

The Secretary of State has displayed his usual characteristic of imitating the dodo. If one were to walk through the deepest recesses of his mind, one would not even get one's feet wet. The right hon. Gentleman has contemptously dismissed the voices of experience and reason. Before we are through with him, he will wish that he had never been born.

I know of no political commentator who has described the tenure of office so far of the Secretary of State as a howling success. The policies that the right hon. Gentleman has tried to pursue of late have hardly enhanced his reputation. In fact, they have merely confirmed what most of us believe—that the Secretary of State not only walks but thinks in concrete. As a consequence, he has shown a monumental display of incompetence in dealing with almost every aspect of policy he has so far put before the House.

The Secretary of State for Transport is a paradox. He possesses characteristics that are not necessarily exclusive to him, of being, on the one hand, intellectually stupid and, on the other hand, artistically brilliant. I suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should do us all the favour of doing what he does best and leaving transport to other people. If he does not, I guarantee that he will receive not only in the House, but in the other place, the biggest mauling of his political career. I invite hon. Members to join me this evening in starting that process.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) has asked for a delay of the Standing Committee sitting until the Select Committee reports. The Select Committee has also asked for time to publish its evidence. I gather that the Select Committee can do that by 21 February. The Government are prepared to delay setting up the Committee until Thursday 21 February. I hope that that concession will satisfy my hon. Friend.

On 28 November 1984 the Chairman of the Select Committee wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and said that the Committee hoped to publish its report in early February.

Mr. Leadbitter: The hon. Gentleman is not providing a concession. The timetable which he has announced does not give hon. Members any time to study the Committee's report.

Mr. Mitchell: It certainly is a concession, because the Committee was due to sit on 19 February. There is, therefore, a delay. I think that it is likely that the Committee will be able to publish by then.

The Select Committee's Chairman expected to publish his report in early February. It is now near the middle of February, and I am sure that the Select Committee will agree that the Government are in no way responsible for any delay that has occurred.

Mr. Oakes: The hon. Gentleman says that the evidence will be produced on 19 February. That is the day on which the Select Committee meets. Will the report be available to us on that day?

Mr. Mitchell: That is up to the Select Committee. It would not be right for me to speak for it.

Mr. Parris: As a member of the Select Committee —the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) and the right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) are not —may I say that my hon. Friend's concession will be greatly appreciated by all members of the Select Committee on Transport. We are extremely grateful to him.

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point.

The question of a Special Standing Committee is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. I understand that the procedure is generally applied to non-controversial Bills. I doubt that the House would consider that that applied in this case. I hope that, in the light of this concession, my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough will feel able not to press his motion. I certainly would not be able to advise my hon. Friends to support him were he to do so.

Throughout this debate there has been very clear recognition of the enormous importance of buses to a large number of our fellow citizens. The elderly particularly, students, the lower-paid going to and from work, women, especially those isolated by their husbands' taking the car —all of these are enormously dependent on the bus for getting around, and 39 per cent. of households have no regular access to a car. Therefore, the quality of life for many of our fellow citizens very much depends upon the success of this industry, but it is in a state of decline.

The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) suggested that that decline started in 1979.

Mr. Stott: Accelerated.

Mr. Mitchell: I can tell him that it has been going on for 30 years. Thirty years ago 40 per cent. of all journeys were done by bus. It is now down to 8 per cent. and passenger mileage has come down by 50 per cent. in that period. Indeed, in the last 10 years, while fares have gone up 30 per cent. above the rate of inflation, there has been a 28 per cent. reduction in passenger journeys. So what we have here — and the House should realise this — is another sunset industry in the making if nothing is done to revitalise it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) was absolutely right when he said that no responsible Government could sit and do nothing while the situation continued to deteriorate. Subsidy has been tried as a solution. In 10 years it has gone from £10 million a year to no less than £522 million in revenue support. That has nothing to do with concessionary fares or other aspects. Nobody could claim that this huge increase has resulted in any significant improvement in the services provided to the public.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): Can the hon. Gentleman rightly say that about south Yorkshire? For the last decade in every year there has been an increase in the number of passengers carried, and by every objective test the operation has been shown to be the most cost-effective. Indeed, in 1982, when the Secretary of State's Department put into operation a survey, again it showed the most balanced approach to transport. We are now seeing over 350 million journeys each year for a population of 1·3 million in south Yorkshire. The operation has been shown by every objective test to be the most cost-effective.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman has his own views and quite clearly south Yorkshire is in many ways a law unto itself. He may think it is that good, but in south Yorkshire the costs per bus mile are among the highest of all PTEs in the country—over £2·07. They are 11 per cent. above those in the west midlands. The south Yorkshire PTE is alone in having more than 30 per cent. of its buses without one-man operation. In other words, it is not as efficient an operation as the hon. Gentleman is telling the House.

I could hardly recognise the Bill from some of the things which the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said about it. She suggested that 50,000 jobs would have to go. What she means is that 50,000 jobs will be transferred from the public to the private sector. So it is a half-truth, and a damaging one, which she is trying to peddle when she suggests that 50,000 jobs will go. She told the House that as a result of the White Paper the women's institutes were so fearful that a survey was conducted in Oxfordshire. I have to tell her that the survey in Oxfordshire predated the White Paper by a considerable time.

She says that in Hereford and Worcester the rural services were cut back as a result of the Government's trial area there. My hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd), giving evidence to the House this evening, has already demonstrated that not only were they not cut, but they were extended by 2 per cent. That is a valuable improvement in the situation.

The Bill is not a charter for unscrupulous politicians to frighten old-age pensioners. I think, particularly, of the worries raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman). Only last week I was in Birmingham, and heard of thousands of old-age pensioners who had been frightened into believing that the Bill would do away with concessionary fares. But the Bill is not concerned in any way with concessionary fares other than to ensure that they are available to more citizens through allowing any operator to participate in the scheme.

Mr. Leadbitter: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend the Member for——

Mr. Leadbitter rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister is not giving way.

Mr. Leadbitter: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Mitchell: I have already given way several times. My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough asked a sophisticated and thoughtful question, as did the right hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Concannon). They asked whether it would be possible for concessionary fares to be provided without having to have tokens, through some system of bus passes and so on. I asked my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough what sort of numbers caused him concern. He wanted to know how people could manage if there were four or five operators in the scheme. I should point out that in Birmingham there are 32 operators in the scheme, and at present they do not use tokens. I hope that that will be of some reassurance to him.

Several hon. Members, including my hon. Friends the Members for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) and for Wellingborough and the hon. Members for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) and for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) mentioned cross-subsidy. We tend to think about the beneficiaries of cross-subsidy and not to recognise that there are payers as well. Many constituents are being taken to the cleaners by the excess profits that are taken from the better routes. When the Bill is enacted, there will be lower fares and more services on the better used routes.

Thoughtful people will recognise that over-reliance on cross-subsidy has been a major factor in the industry's decline. For every 10 per cent. increase in fares, 3 per cent. of the passengers are lost. The industry is cross-subsidising to the detriment of its major potential customers on its better routes. That means that the blame for much of the industry's decline can be laid at the door of the system.

Mr. Leadbitter rose——

Mr. Colin Shepherd rose——

Mr. Mitchell: I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Shepherd: Can my hon. Friend confirm that the ending of cross-subsidy will not lead to an increase in direct subsidies paid to operators of unprofitable routes at the expense of ratepayers?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall be happy to take the House through what will happen. First, a considerable degree of cross-subsidy will continue. But it will be commercial cross-subsidy and not the present form of cross-subsidy. That will go on because operators want to maintain their goodwill, to protect their brand image, to hold off competitors, to position vehicles and so on. Therefore, cross-subsidy will continue to provide the part of the network that is not viable. But any operator will admit that operators have nearly always got a large block of marginal routes. If nothing happened, those routes would drop off after three, four, five or 10 years, and areas might be left without any services if we allowed things to continue. On those marginal routes, once competition operates and the bus companies start to become more efficient, they will be able to operate those routes without making a loss. My hon. Friend the Member for Hereford knows very well that the Midland Red bus company when faced with competition improved its productivity by no less than 25 per cent. That kind of improvement turns a marginal route into a profitable one.

Then there will be new operators who will come in with minibuses and such like, often not town-based services going out to the country but minibuses starting in country villages and running services into the towns.

Mr. Steen: When my hon. Friend visited South Hams last weekend, did he get the impression at the public meeting that he addressed that the constituents of South Hams were excited by the prospect of minibuses going from the country into the market towns or that they were disenchanted at the prospect of the application of the Bill to their area?

Mr. Mitchell: When I visited South Hams, there was a great deal of complaint about villages like Princetown which have no bus services but now see the prospect of having such services.

Finally, there will be those routes which will not be economic on any basis. For them, the subsidy available to the local authorities will be appropriate, but by means of competitive tender. By using competitive tender, they will find that their money goes much further than it does at present. What now takes place is a bilateral deal between the county council and the largest operator and nobody knows whether there is value for money. When this was put to competitive tender in Hereford, 38 per cent. of the ratepayers' money was saved. When it was attempted in Norfolk, the National Bus Company wanted £500,000 for a block of routes. When it was put out to competitive tender, it cost not £500,000 but £150,000, which was a huge saving for the ratepayer.

There is, of course, the option in the hands of the county council not to save money but to extend the network. Hon. Members who are worrying about the rural areas will realise that county councils will have plenty of opportunity to extend and maintain the network, if that is the wish of the people in the area concerned.

In addition, we are providing for the rural areas a £20 million transitional grant and £1 million a year for innovation.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Oh!

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Lady says "Oh", but that £20 million is in addition to the substantial sums included in the grant-related expenditure assessment to councils for expenditure on subsidising the services.

The attack of the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) would have some strength in it if there were no room for improved efficiency as a result of competition. But I have already mentioned that Midland Red, faced with competition, saved 25 per cent. by improving productivity. The National Bus Company's operating costs averaged 25 per cent. below theose of the passenger transport executive. The Leeds study of four current National Bus Company agreements demonstrated that the crew operating costs varied from 23 per cent. to 77 per cent. above the level in other areas. These are within current systems operating in the National Bus Company—huge opportunities for improved efficiency.

The private sector costs are even lower than those of the National Bus Company, that is, some 20 per cent. below, as the Guildford and Cranleigh studies show. In travelling round the country and listening to local councillors and transport undertakings, I have noted the enormous variations in costs, in efficiency and in load factors—in Manchester only 13 persons per bus — with great differences in miles driven per year by drivers and in manpower per bus.

Mr. Bidwell: The Midland Red said that it had been stimulated and shaken up by the competition. Its managing director accepted that. It is entering into some arrangements with private operators. That is not competition, but an arrangement. This applies particularly to the company to which I referred in my speech with regard to the run-in periods, sharing routes and so on. That is what it is getting up to, and it is not competition. The Minister is not giving an accurate description of matters. It is the scale of privatisation to which they are opposed.

Mr. Mitchell: In Hereford, Midland Red was able to concentrate a huge number of vehicles on one front in order deliberately to drive the competition into the ground. It even went as far as running free services. That will not happen when we apply deregulation to the country as a whole. No major operator will be able to concentrate on one front as it will be assailed on all fronts. That means that there will be a much more even balance of competition than in the trial area.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough put the case for competitive franchises. That would be some improvement on the present position, but it has the inherent disadvantage that the pattern of services is decided by county transport planners, not by the market. Under franchising, we would never know how much the market could do on its own. The franchising system would lack flexibility and, worst of all, once a franchise was awarded the competitive pressure would be off. Therefore, although it would be some improvement, it would be nothing like enough to revitalise the industry.

I urge those thinking about the advantages of franchising to consider what would happen in, for example, Manchester if the NBC won the franchise and the PTE lost it. How many bus drivers and other people would be out of work as a result of that? Before advocating franchising I urge them to think carefully about how dangerous that course would be.

Throughout the debate we have heard complaints about safety. We have been told that there is a cowboys' charter. That was mentioned by the right hon. Member for Mansfield and the hon. Member for Hartlepool. The right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) said that thousands of people would be maimed. I have never heard such hysterical nonsense. There is no evidence to show that the private sector is any worse than the public sector in the safety of its vehicles. The annual tests show that the NCB has a pass rate of 60 per cent., the private sector a pass rate of 56 per cent.—a little worse, but not much—while the PTEs have a pass rate of only 49 per cent. and London Transport of only 47 per cent. Therefore, no one can say that the private sector is worse than the public sector.

I shall go further and say that recently a random check was made on 5 per cent. of London Transport buses, and 51 per cent. were put off the roads immediately with prohibition orders as unsafe. I hope that no one will suggest that public sector vehicles are safer than private sector vehicles.

Mr. Fry: Does my hon. Friend accept that two distinct sets of statistics published in Hansard were rather contradictory? Does he recall that I tabled a further parliamentary question, the answer to which showed that after some minor adjustments the public sector was able to pass a higher percentage of its vehicles than the private sector—and my hon. Friend answered that question.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is correct. The reason is that most of the public sector operators have their tests carried out on their premises while most of the private sector operators have to take their vehicles several miles to the testing stations. Therefore, if a light bulb does not work the fault can be repaired immediately on the premises when the tests are being carried out; and that facility is not generally available to the private operator.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough asked for an assurance on the number of inspectors. We are recruiting more inspectors and we shall devote sufficient resources to ensure that there are enough to cover the extra number of operators.

When the House debated the deregulation of long-distance coaches we had all the arguments about cowboys, people being maimed, and so on. But since deregulation took place for long-distance coaches their accident involvement is down by 20 per cent.

My hon. Friend asked why we did not have the same financial requirements for a bus operator's licence as for an HGV licence. I can assure him and the House that we do. They are identical.

Eliza Doolittle, in that famous line, said

"In Hertford, Hereford and Hampshire hurricanes hardly happen."

But in Hereford they certainly have, as has been made clear to the House. The county council found a 2 per cent. increase in rural mileage and a 38 per cent. saving in ratepayers' money. There were lower fares, more people travelled by bus and there was an end to the complaints which have been a recurring feature of the debate from many of my hon. Friends. Indeed, I wonder sometimes whether the story which appeared in Marketing on 17 November 1983 was entirely apocryphal:

"A local authority, told that its bus drivers were speeding past queues of people with a smile and wave of the hand, replied, 'It is impossible for drivers to keep to their timetables if they have to stop for passengers'."

One of the features that has become increasingly apparent as the debate has progressed is the change in attitude which is brought about by competition and that is one of the things which has become most clear in the case of Hereford. The town council complained about bus siting difficulties, fumes and congestion; but the passengers loved it. I have talked to many people there. For example, it has been said:

"They come in one heap—two Midland, one Primrose and another Midland Red;"

and

"I prefer Primrose, they are more entertaining, the drivers more friendly;"

and

"They are cheaper now. There is a bit of rivalry. It means the service is better;"

and

"They run to a schedule now, not just when they like."

A young man, visiting from west Yorkshire, said:

"Where I come from the buses do not run so late and they cost more. I do not use them often but it is cheap and the last bus is after 11 o'clock at night".

I could go on with example after example.

What I can say, without any risk of contradiction, is that there is no doubt that the people of Hereford, having tasted competition and the advantages which it has brought, do not want to go back to the old system of monopoly.

The hon. Member for Wigan said, wrongly, that these proposals are built on one trial area. That is not true. They are built on three principles—privatisation, opportunity and competition. I do not expect Labour Members to support privatisation, but Conservative Members believe fundamentally in spreading power, wealth and decision making throughout the community, not concentrating it in the hands of the state. This privatisation will give a lot more people a chance to be shareholders, participators and owners with a stake in Britain's wealth. It represents opportunity because it will provide for the removal of barriers to new bus operators and enable small businesses to be born and to grow, providing a service to the public. Competition is the surest way to improve service to the customer, which is what the Bill is for. I ask the House to give it full support tonight.

Mr. Fry: In view of the concession made by the Government—and as I have made my point on behalf of the Select Committee on Transport and on behalf of all Select Committees—I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: In view of that reaction, I must put the Question.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—
Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Transport Bill, it is expedient to authorise the extinguishment of liabilities of the National Bus Company in respect of sums lent to it under section 20 of the Transport Act 1962 and the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) any expenditure of the Secretary of State—
  (i) in connection with the dissolution of the National Bus Company;
  (ii) in respect of the salaries or remuneration of traffic commissioners and persons acting as their officers and servants;
  (iii) in respect of the remuneration of members of the Transport Tribunal and the other expenses of the tribunal;
  (iv) in making grants to persons operating or proposing to operate public passenger transport services in rural areas in Great Britain; and
  (v) in making grants to the British Railways Board in respect of their costs in securing the provision of bus substitution services;
(b) any increase in payments out of money so provided arising from any increase in administrative expenses of the Secretary of State attributable to the provisions of that Act; and
(c) any increase in payments out of money so provided under any other enactment.—[Mr. Ridley.]

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): In discussing this money resolution as a Welsh Member of this House, I should be remiss if I did not express the concern and consternation that is felt in Wales both among the employees of bus undertakings, local authorities and officials and among the elected representatives about the provisions of the Bill. They will increasingly affect ordinary members of the public.

As for the money resolution, it seems to me that the objective of the Secretary of State is to cut out subsidies altogether or severely to reduce them, entirely irrespective of their merit. It is a doctrinaire approach on the part of the Secretary of State.

There is a financial provision in the Bill, clause 89, which enables the Secretary of State to make grants to operators of public passenger transport in rural areas. The amount is fairly negligible and is certainly quite inadequate to meet the problem that will be confronted. Already a non-partisan body, the National Federation of Women's Institutes, has pointed out that the effect of deregulation on tendering will be disastrous for those people who live in rural areas. A small concession has been made, but presumably this is only because of the pressure exerted by bodies like the National Federation of Women's Institutes.

I think of the pensioner on the outskirts of Newport who wrote to me:

"I am a pensioner. I am also disabled. Our local council has done a wonderful job in the circumstances. Our bus service is excellent."

What a tribute, bearing in mind all the attacks that bus undertakings have received from the Secretary of State.

From my experience I endorse the sentiments of that pensioner. Where a local authority is providing a good bus service, surely it should be left alone. The local authorities have operated in difficult circumstances. They need every possible encouragement and not the punitive measures that are contained in the Bill.

The Secretary of State proposes to hive off local authority bus undertakings into separate companies. As I see it, the wish is to make them insolvent, so that they can then be sold off cheaply to private operators. As a result, undoubtedly it is the needy and the less affluent members of society who will suffer.

Another provision concerns the National Bus Company. The intention is to privatise it—or, rather, to split it into smaller units. That organisation has functioned successfully in difficult circumstances. How much does the nation stand to lose if it is sold off? I hope that the Minister will give us facts and figures tonight.

Another financial provision, contained in clause 90, empowers the Secretary of State to make regulations restricting the payment of grants towards duty charged on bus fuel to operators of local services. Likewise, clause 91 provides for a reduction of fuel duty grant where services are unregistered or unreliable. I do not doubt that there will be many unreliable services if the Secretary of State's proposals come to fruition.

When history is written, the Government will be known by the slogan, "If it moves, privatise it." This sort of policy is unsound politically and economically. Certainly it has done the country immense harm. Anyone who believes that the proposals in the Bill and the money resolution will provide a better bus service for the citizens of Britain must live in cloud-cuckoo-land.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I wish to assist my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport by saying that I believe that this money resolution follows the Second Reading of one of the most exciting developments that is likely to occur in public transport. It is imaginative and visionary and gives new hope for the consumer and new scope for operators. The proposals will sweep away the rules and regulations, free the public monopoly and build up opportunities for competition.

The Bill is about deregulation of an industry, allowing it to revert to normal business practice without Government intervention. We know, that with public funds and finance, the more that the Government intervene, the more they distort. For example, Liverpool has been buffeted by successive Governments constantly pouring money into a city that has declined the more that that money has been poured in. The more money that is poured in, the greater has been the distortion that has taken place, and the more difficult it has been for private enterprise to flourish.

Through the Bill, the money that is being poured into the bus industry will be released, revived and altered so that the progressive decline will be halted. That is the message. More public money does not result in better services and better value for money. In the most subtle and enterprising way the Secretary of State is trying to stop the intervention that has resulted in the decline of bus services.

Where does my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State see the role of the community bus? At the moment, this service gets a lot of help from the local authorities. It gets funding from the public sector by way of a bus, and then volunteers drive the bus. There is a good example of that in my constituency, the Coleridge bus, which serves Kingsbridge. The Exe Market Valley bus serves the Tiverton constituency, and the Tavistock community bus serves the elderly in Tavistock who face difficulties with the steep hills in that area. All these services are non-profit-making, so will my right hon. Friend explain how this will work, because they have an important and valuable contribution to make?

What will be the financial implications for taxis? Taxi operators have, in many cases, spent large sums of money on their licence plates. It would be helpful if my right hon. Friend will say whether he believes that some transitional arrangements can be made so that those who have invested this money in the industry will not find themselves penniless. It would also be helpful if he said something about taxis operating as buses. Will there be any financial help for the taxi operators who want to develop their services, perhaps by getting larger taxis and running a bus service from some of the villages around the market towns? That would be welcomed in my constituency.

One of the criticisms of the financial provisions as they are set out concerns some of the big bus companies such as Western National, which have withdrawn some of their central services. One of the constant complaints is that Western National has withdrawn its coast service from Plymouth, Salcombe, Dartmouth and Exeter because it was not profitable. The money resolution will affect this company. Does my right hon. Friend see some of the small new enterprises starting in such a way that the people of these towns can look forward to a new, entreprenurial service running along the coast? Is my right hon. Friend thinking of issuing directions on planning regulations to the district councils so that those who start one or two-man businesses from their homes will not be prevented from doing so by district councils saying "You are running a small firm, and you need planning consent." Some opportunities must be provided in that respect.

Will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State say something about the marginal and fat routes? The fat routes will attract competition. We must be careful to ensure that that competition does not result in closed shops, with the operators doing deals with each other. It would be helpful if my hon. Friend ensured that private enterprise is allowed to develop and compete and ensured that deals are not struck between operators on the fat routes. Unless the operators on the thin routes are given a chance to compete on the fat routes, they may not survive.

The Bill is a cracker. It will crack the monopolies. It will awaken a moribund sunset industry. It will crack restrictive practices. It will crack artificially high fares by allowing healthy competition and the operation of market forces. The Bill will breathe new life into the transport industry and herald a new era for all those wishing to use a better, more flexible and more competitive bus service.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): Probably every hon. Member knows that transport fares in south Yorkshire are extremely low. For the past 10 or 12 years, the county council's policy has been to transport people around the county in a convenient and attractive way. This model has been developed with the consent of the broad spectrum of the people in south Yorkshire.

The fare for a two-mile journey in south Yorkshire is 5p, in Manchester and Leeds it is 30p, and in Birmingham, it is 32p. The fare for a 10-mile journey in south Yorkshire is 15p and in Manchester, Leeds and Birmingham it is 70p.

The Secretary of State has said that the number of passengers has declined. The latest available figures for south Yorkshire show that there are 350 million journeys a year, 264 million of which are provided by the PTE. The population of south Yorkshire is 1·3 million. There has been an increase year on year in the number of passengers carried by the PTE. I believe that the call of the industry is, "The object is to put bums on seats." We have been extremely successful in doing that.

A substantial part of the Government's case for the introduction of the Transport Bill, as outlined in the White Paper and ministerial statements, is based on allegations that the large public operations in general, and PTEs in particular, cause an unreasonable demand for massive increases in subsidies, their operations being inefficient and showing no economies of scale and south Yorkshire being an outstanding example.

Many studies of the bus industry have been made to determine its overall efficiency and the related efficiency of individual units in that industry. The studies include "The Efficiency of British Urban Bus Operators", Transport Studies Group research report No. 8, which was published in December 1982; the Transport and Road Research Laboratory's reports; the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on stage carrier services; and the annual inter-PTE comparisons. These have revealed numerous yardsticks by which the industry can be measured. The efficiency of the industry—which has come under some criticism, to say the least, from the Government Benches this evening — ought to be considered very seriously when we draw these comparisons. Of all these yardsticks, the best for comparing similar types of bus operation is the cost per journey. The total cost per journey includes traffic operation, servicing, repairs and maintenance, management, welfare, training and asset utilisation. The south Yorkshire PTE's cost per journey on this basis is 26·4p, which compares with the average for other PTEs of 30·3p. The costs used to calculate these figures come from the inter-PTE comparisons 1983-84.

The Secretary of State for Transport claims that the cost of PTE operations is rising rapidly. The total direct operating costs for south Yorkshire rose from £67·35 million in 1982-83 to £69·64 million in 1983-84, an increase of 3·4 per cent., which is less than the rate of inflation for this period. The real cost of direct operations has, therefore, fallen. In the case of London, which, ironically, is excluded from the delicensing and tendering provisions of this Bill, the increase in direct operation costs was 5·1 per cent.

Developments are taking place in manpower productivity and vehicle maintenance organisation which will produce further savings. The service, repair and maintenance costs in south Yorkshire have been reduced from 48·1p per vehicle mile in 1982-83 to 46·4p per vehicle mile in 1983-84. With the exception of Tyne and Wear, south Yorkshire's costs in this area are the lowest of the PTEs—81 per cent. of London's costs.

The buses White Paper attaches considerable importance to unfavourable comparisons of PTE costs with those of the National Bus Company. A careful study of the appendix to the White Paper shows that the percentage figures quoted are derived from national cost per mile statistics. This is a ridiculous basis of comparison since it involves a massive rural mileage—there was plenty of reference to this in the earlier debate this evening—run by the National Bus Company, where costs per mile are inevitably very low compared with costs per mile in urban centres where average traffic speeds are low and bus stops are much closer together.

The only true basis on which NBC and PTE costs can be compared is where both are run in the same territory. A comparison on this basis can be obtained from the inter-PTE comparisons summary of county operations 1982-83. This shows that in south Yorkshire PTE direct bus operations costs were 5·46p per passenger mile, while NBC costs were 5·78p per passenger mile. If the Secretary of State continues to insist that the comparison with NBC costs is a useful yardstick of efficiency, it should be pointed out that in the London Transport operating area London Transport's direct bus operation costs more than twice as much per passenger mile as NBC's costs; and London, I say once again, is excluded from the Bill.

A particular criticism made by the Secretary of State is that south Yorkshire spends too much in subsidising cheap fares in relation to the amount it spends on improving its services. An attempt to produce some scientific justification for this criticism of PTEs in general and south Yorkshire in particular was made by the Department of Transport—the Secretary of State's own Department—where work was carried out by the Economics Local Roads and Transport Division using a model developed by Dr. Stephen Glaister of the LSE. The report of this study was published by the Department of Transport in December 1982 and was entitled "Urban transport subsidies: an economic assessment of value for money"—something that I know is very dear to the Secretary of State's heart. This shows the changes in fares and services required so that subsidies could be more effectively employed in the PTE areas and in London.

It is notable that south Yorkshire was the only PTE which was shown to have a correct balance between fares and subsidies, and indeed services. In London, in order to obtain the best use of the subsidy then being provided, a reduction of 11 per cent. in fares and an increase of 19 per cent. in expenditure on services would be required.

The Government attempted to devalue the Glaister model as a means of comparing the efficiency of south Yorkshire's policy with that of some other areas by reducing the fares elasticity factor used in the formula from 0·3 to 0·15 elasticity. They sought to justify this by claiming that at lower fare levels there was lower elasticity. However, the Transport and Road Research Laboratory's study of fares elasticity could not find a corelationship between fare level and demand elasticity that was required to justify this. It could not be disproved that south Yorkshire had the right balance. The Department's 1982 study probably stands as an authoritative justification of the south Yorkshire policy in terms of cost-benefit analysis.

I ask the Secretary of State seriously to consider the south Yorkshire model, which has existed for more than 10 years. We have heard a former Member of the European Parliament speaking tonight from the Conservative Benches. Even the European Parliament's publication held up the south Yorkshire model as one to be followed, as a cost-effective benefit for transportation. I ask the Secretary of State to take on board the contributions from south Yorkshire Members and to use the south Yorkshire model when he is costing his policy.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): No one can say with certainty that the Bill will produce enormous savings, dramatically increase public usage and be responsive to all customer demands. However, we can say with conviction that the current system is expensive, inefficient and largely unresponsive to what the public require. Therefore, change is necessary.

Revenue support in Avon has increased over the past 10 years from £66,000 to over £4·5 million, an increase of 6,800 per cent., or 21 times in real terms. At the same time services have been declining. Given the necessity for change, it is essential that we have a system that rewards the making of savings, increases public usage, introduces lower fares and provides services where they are wanted. If it is not implemented, the improvements to bus and taxi services that we all wish to see will not happen. Like it or not—I recognise that some Opposition Members do not like it—the system of reward that is called profit is the cost effective method yet devised for encouraging success.

The essential thrust of the Bill is right. By creating smaller service units, each as a profit centre geared by commercial necessity to public demand, we ensure that what is wanted prospers and what is inefficient, expensive or incompetently run fails.

I am less sure about some of the details of the Bill and the consequent revenue implications. It is essential to get the detail right because insufficient attention to detail will ruin a good and necessary measure.

First, I turn to the taxi provisions and the revenue implications. My right hon. Friend has already heard my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) talking about the problems of taxi drivers. Owner drivers have spent either considerable time or money in obtaining their licences. In Bristol, for example, it takes about seven years to obtain a licence. In other places it will cost about £7,000 to obtain one. It seems that when the Bill is enacted that investment of time or money will count for nought. Indeed, the Bill will penalise the professional and encourage the amateur taxi driver. Under clause 14*(2)*, a district council will be extremely limited in its ability to refuse licences. For instance, a district council will not be able to demand that a taxi driver knows the area before he plies for hire. The Bill will permit a man who has driven the maximum permissible hours in an HGV transporting baked beans round the country to get into a taxi cab and start driving people round the country.

The Bill as drafted will destroy the livelihood of the full-time cabbie because it will allow the part-timer to get into a car which will not necessarily be of the required standard, to take that part of the day which is profitable and to leave the less profitable part to be covered by the professional full-time cabbie.

Mr. Steen: Would my hon. Friend agree that the taxi driver will be able to use his taxi as a bus and therefore that some of the taxis may well develop into small bus services, leaving more room for others, which may be a profitable development?

Mr. Sayeed: What my hon. Friend says is correct, but a longer transitional period is needed in which to allow him to develop that type of expertise. In my hon. Friend's constituency, as, indeed, in the constituencies of most hon. Members, professional cabbies have to work long hours to make a livelihood. We must be careful not to destroy that at a stroke.

I therefore favour the extension of the use of taxis, and I am sure that the current provisions are far too tight. I am sure also that the provisions in the Bill are far too lax. These lax provisions will undermine the fundamental aim of the Bill by adversely affecting the professional driver financially, thus destroying the ability of cabbies to earn a living and to move to larger vehicles and to provide a bus/taxi service.

I deal next with the Hereford and Worcester experiment, which has certain revenue implications. It has been a success, but not a totally unqualified one. First, it is important to recognise that three out of four of the new operators have had their licences revoked at one time or another.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): That demonstrates clearly that the inspectors are doing their job in identifying faulty vehicles. That is what they are paid to do, and it is what they will continue to do.

Mr. Sayeed: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for having made that point, and I will deal with it now. We cannot all be as satisfied as she is.

Even with the present limited number of bus companies, passenger service vehicles are not being inspected in accordance with the law. I should like to know the revenue implications, and how my right hon. Friend seeks to ensure that, when there are more vehicles on the road, with more companies and more depots—some of which might be hard to find, to put it politely—they will be adequately inspected. I suggest that there is a good case on the grounds of safety alone—in addition to protecting passengers from the unprofessional operator who many have charged, and been paid for, season tickets for his service—for ensuring that the asset backing of any company wishing to take on a route is reasonable in relation to the operation that he seeks to run.

My hon. Friend has argued that cross-subsidies allow inefficiency to flourish. He is quite correct. Currently bus companies do not know how much they are losing on a route, and it is obviously essential that they quantify this. If one does not know how much one is losing, one cannot determine the necessary measures to take.

I am not convinced that the proposal to couple deregulation with tendering will assist in providing long-term and efficient services. There needs to be a sensible degree of control over the route licences issued. I ask my right hon. Friend to look at that matter again and determine the revenue implications.

An operator may tender for a route from 6 am to 11 pm and be paid £5,000, but someone operating a school bus takes the profitable part in the morning and evening and destroys the tendering basis of the person who tenders for the whole day. We need some regulation to maintain necessary services. We also need contract terms of sufficient length to encourage investment in modern equipment. Were there the time, I would want to know about bus stations, the construction of bus stops, about timetables and through ticketing services.

The Bill is a good measure. Previously we have had pious hopes and exhortation, which have failed—but not through want of trying. Legislation is necessary, but there needs to be some amendment before Third Reading.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): Will the Secretary of State say a few words about the position in Tyne and Wear? We have heard a great deal about the experiment in Hereford and Worcester. It is about time that a tribute was paid to the experiments not only in south Yorkshire but in my area of Tyne and Wear.

The Bill will effectively destroy £283 million investment in an integrated, modern public transport system in Tyne and Wear, with a metro system that is the envy of the world. How on earth can we run a concessionary travel system, when passes go through metro barriers, with any number of different operators? How can we operate a system of through ticketing—we call them transfers—from bus to metro? Fifty-eight per cent. of passengers on the metro use a bus before or after their journey on the metro. How can that system be run with any number of different operators?

For several years, at great but worth while expense, Tyne and Wear has pursued a policy to integrate, integrate, integrate. This Bill will disintegrate the public transport system. A quarter of a million people signed a petition the last time that the Government tried to destroy public transport in that area—out of a total population of only 1 million. They wanted to keep their system. Conservative Members spoke of petitions from rural areas signed by 100 people. It is an insult to the people of Tyne and Wear, who want to maintain the integrated system, that the Secretary of State cannot explain why he is introducing a Bill that will destroy the years and years of patient work and negotiation, when the NBC and the PTE have got the workers to learn new ways and about new machines, and with all the investment in the new ticketing system.

I wish to protest in the strongest possible terms that we have heard more about areas such as Hereford and Worcester than about Tyne and Wear, south Yorkshire, west Yorkshire, the west Midlands and the cities where the mass of our people live.

11.4 pm

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): The Secretary of State showed in our earlier debate that he is quite unaware of the disastrous effect that the Bill will have on public transport, especially for the elderly, those in rural areas and those who depend on off-peak and Sunday services. He has also failed to understand the financial consequences of the Bill.

The Government propose to break up the National Bus Company into separate companies. In doing so they will not get the full valuation of that undertaking, which is based on its integrated services throughout the country.

The Government have failed to estimate and understand the financial implications of ensuring that the pension provisions of the employees of the National Bus Company are adequately safeguarded. If the Secretary of State considers the serious financial implications to the Government of the privatisation of the royal ordnance factories for which legislation was enacted in the last parliamentary session to the detriment of employees' pensions and conditions of employment he will see that they will also apply to the National Bus Company.

The Secretary of State has failed to realise the Bill's implications for concessionary fares. They are important to the elderly and disabled people who depend on them and it is not good enough to say that local government will have the right to continue to provide concessionary fares when the reorganisation takes place.

Once the Bill is enacted, the present system of passes which is operated in most areas will cease to exist and tokens will be introduced which will give a much lower value to the people receiving that concession. If fewer tokens are given there will be serious financial implications for the transport undertakings.

Tendering will be based on low wages and bad conditions. The ending of cross-subsidy and deregulation make it difficult to understand which companies will bid for routes of which they will not have exclusive use.

The Secretary of State must tell us the financial implications of redundancies for local authority transport undertakings. Every service that is lost will mean a reduction in employment. That will have implications for pension contributions and the maintenance of superannuation schemes and will have serious financial implications in the years ahead both on transport undertakings and local authorities.

I regret that I was unable to speak in the previous debate. All aspects of the Bill that the Government are forcing through have serious financial implications.

11.7 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): In the brief time that is available to me I shall try to answer as many of the points that have been raised as possible. The hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), although describing this as a "punitive" measure, could not explain why the people of Hereford seemed to enjoy it quite so much, but he did ask the likely value of the National Bus Company, as did the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). The debt of the NBC to the Government is currently £128 million. If the various parts are sold for more than that, there will be a net profit. If the various parts are sold for less than that, there will be a net loss. I am not at all sure that it would have been possible to float the National Bus Company in its present form before even the White Paper was published because it would not have been attractive to the stock market.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) asked about community buses. I can assure him that I too have an excellent community bus in my constituency, called the villager bus. Such buses will in future probably be eligible for innovation grants, and for the rural bus grant, and they will most likely be able to tender for subsidised services to the county council. However, my villager bus operates without subsidy and provides and excellent service to a large number of villages. It is the most wonderful new form of innovative village transport, which we want to see spread and encouraged. There will be nothing but help, assistance and encouragement to such arrangements under the provisions of this measure.

My hon. Friends the Members for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) and for South Hams asked about taxi plates. Clause 14 sets out the conditions under which a local authority may or may not grant an extra licence. Exactly how long it will take for a taxi plate to reduce under those conditions is not easy to predict. It will reduce over time, not immediately.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East should note that there are licensing requirements. If a local authority exercises its power to license taxies—some do and some do not—it will also have power to supervise the quality of the vehicle and the driver in the sense to which my hon. Friend referred, of knowing the geography of the city and so on. Some local authorities do not restrict taxi licences or have a licensing system; of course, they lose the power to control and supervise. It is a matter for local discretion and I believe that it is right to leave it that way.

I was asked about taxis operating as buses. That will be possible under the Bill. They will be able to register services, in which event they will have to comply with all the requirements of a registered stage service. If they are in country districts, they will be eligible for the various forms of assistance in the Bill. They become, to all intents and purposes, buses.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) and——

It being three-quarters of an hour after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted Business).

Resolved

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Transport Bill, it is expedient to authorise the extinguishment of liabilities of the National Bus Company in respect of sums lent to it under section 20 of the Transport Act 1962 and the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) any expenditure of the Secretary of State—

(i) in connection with the dissolution of the National Bus Company;

(ii) in respect of the salaries or remuneration of traffic commissioners and persons acting as their officers and servants;

(iii) in respect of the remuneration of members of the Transport Tribunal and the other expenses of the tribunal;

(iv) in making grants to persons operating or proposing to operate public passenger transport services in rural areas in Great Britain; and

(v) in making grants to the British Railways Board in respect of their costs in securing the provision of bus substitution services;

(b) any increase in payments out of money so provided arising from any increase in administrative expenses of the Secretary of State attributable to the provisions of that Act; and

(c) any increase in payments out of money so provided under any other enactment.

WAYS AND MEANS

Transport

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That any Act resulting from the Transport Bill ("the Transport Act") may provide—

(a) that section 16(1)(a) of the Finance Act 1970 (which excludes precept income and grants in computing the profits of a Passenger Transport Executive chargeable to corporation tax) shall not apply with respect to any accounting period beginning on or after the passing of the Transport Act;

(b) that, in computing for the purposes of the Corporation Tax Acts the profit or loss of a Passenger Transport Executive for any accounting period beginning on or after the passing of the Transport Act, the loss of any earlier accounting period shall be computed as if section 16(1)(a) of the Finance Act 1970 had not been enacted; and

(c) for the payment of sums into the Consolidated Fund and for increased payments into the Consolidated Fund under any other enactment.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): I shall not detain the House for long. That is not a promise to the Secretary of State but a threat, because we expect him to answer quite a number of questions which were not dealt with earlier on Second Reading. If the Secretary of State does not give those matters attention now, I assure him that the debate could well exceed three hours.

The ways and means resolution is rather tightly drawn but touches on several major and important issues. The first is the level of fares with the implications of clause 105 which cuts tax relief resulting from section 16(1)(a) of the Finance Act 1970. Other important issues concern the assets and disposal of the National Bus Company. The Secretary of State touched on that this afternoon in terms of the outstanding debt, but we should like to know more about how the NBC will be broken up and disposed of for sale. Thirdly, the resolution affects the break-up of the passenger transport executives. Again there are considerable implications for various parts of the United Kingdom, not least Strathclyde. It is important that the Secretary of State should give more details to the House about the effects that that will have.

The provisions seem to suggest that the Secretary of State is more interested in helping the Treasury than the travelling public. The cost of transport will increase, notwithstanding the introduction of more competition and privatisation. When comments were made earlier about the availability of bus transport, I thought that the remarks of the late R. A. Butler were apt. He said that those who miss the bus must resign themselves to walking. In many areas the travelling public will have no choice.

What is the effect of clause 105(1), which makes provision to cut tax relief? If it is removed, there will clearly be an extra charge. When the Minister replies, will he tell us what that will cost? The Government have made a great deal of the importance of rate-capping legislation. It is important that the Minister tells us how the Government will keep down bus fares, which have a considerable effect on the social and economic life of the country. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) spoke earlier about dependence on public transport, which exists in areas such as Strathclyde and especially in Glasgow, where 70 per cent. of households have no car. It is essential that the Minister clarifies those arrangements.

Under clause 51, the Secretary of State will have powers to extinguish past loans to the NBC, and to use the proceeds of sales to repay debts. The Government have been singularly unsuccessful so far in their attempts to push parts of the NBC into the private sector. It will be useful if the Minister tells us what restructuring lies ahead. As a Scotsman, I am bound to say that listening to some comments made by English colleagues, there could be a not inconsiderable change in many parts of the country.

Moreover, it would be useful to know what is meant by the maximisation of the proceeds to the Treasury. It is the Chancellor of the Exchequer rather than the consumer who will benefit from the sale of the assets of the National Bus Company. I understand that the NBC board will be required to submit a disposal programme to the Department of Transport. I wonder whether the Secretary of State would enlighten the House as to what discussions have taken place so far, and how he sees the hara-kiri ahead in terms of the dismemberment of the National Bus Company.

The Secretary of State might also comment on what will happen with the break-up of the passenger transport executives. The shattering of the structures, which is ostensibly intended to assist the travelling public in those PTE areas, carries with it an ominous message of higher fares and redundancies, and a worse service in many communities. I want a little more information from the Secretary of State on that, and on what will happen to the money from fees and fines that is received by the traffic commissioners.

Earlier this evening, the Under-Secretary of State gave us elocution lessons and referred to "Pygmalion", but as he was talking what came to mind was the word "chameleon". I listened to the speeches of some Conservative Members, and although in principle they had some good things to say about the Bill, they always had qualifications. They always asked the Secretary of State to protect this, or reimburse that. It did not surprise me that not one Scottish Tory Back-Bench Member had a good word to say about the Bill, because not one of them spoke in the debate, and precious few of them were here this afternoon.

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Watford): Yes they were.

Mr. Craigen: The Whip obviously does not know all the Scottish Back-Bench Members, or he would not have made that statement.

I know the Secretary of State only too well, and he may recall that in a previous incarnation, when he was Minister of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, he was planning to sent me on a long boat trip to St. Helena to carry out an employment exercise. However, it was impossible to go there because of the poor boat service. This afternoon, when he was telling the bus industry that its motto should be "Take a bus", I thought that the Secretary of State was taking the House for a ride. The Bill will not do much for the travelling public — [Interruption.] It did not surprise me when I read the appendix — I hope that the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth), who I believe comes from Glasgow, also read the appendix—that the Department of Transport had to search for information in Australia to prove its case on the privatisation of buses. Page 61—I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows it chapter and verse —states:

"While there is no direct UK evidence, some guidance can be obtained by considering a study of private urban bus operators in Australia, in towns where they accounted for 46 per cent. of buses in use."

I do not know whether the Department had to go to Alice Springs to obtain the information that the Department believes will be relevant to the running of bus services of the United Kingdom, but when I looked at the serried ranks on the Government Back Benches, I thought, "There cannot be a body of men and women who know less about travelling on buses than that lot over there." The Scottish Office Minister who is responsible for buses travelled recently on a bus. He did so only because the convener of Lothian regional council had been chasing him all over the place saying that the Bill would be disastrous for Lothian regional transport.

The Secretary of State must address himself to these significant points, or we shall keep him here for quite a long time, although not for quite so long a time as he was going to send me to St. Helena. However, we shall expect the kind of answers that he did not give the travelling public this afternoon when he introduced the Bill.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I am delighted to try to assist the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) by answering some of his questions. I may find it easier than I did on the previous money resolution when I believe I had four minutes in which to answer the points made by a number of hon. Members.

First, the hon. Gentleman asked about clause 105, which contains the tax provisions that are being effected in relation to the passenger transport executives. The clause does three things. First, it removes the exemptions which the PTEs currently enjoy whereby the income which the PTEs receive from the passenger transport authorities is excluded in computing the profits of the PTEs for corporation tax purposes. As they were two public bodies, the grants from PTAs to PTEs were not treated as income and taxable in the hands of PTEs. When they become arm's length companies and normal commercial rules apply, any income they receive—the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) will be steeped in the fact that it will only be income received through the tendering process and not through direct subsidy—will be part of income, and if they make a profit their profits will be subject to corporation tax, just like those of any other company.

Secondly, clause 105 removes the accumulated tax losses which have resulted in the past from this exemption. We had the example of south Yorkshire in the previous debate which is now receiving £69 million a year from the PTA. That is an accumulated tax loss of £69 million a year. Perhaps by now it is hundreds of millions of pounds just for one metropolitan county. There would be little merit in allowing these tax losses to pass into the period when the PTEs become companies because they could be of value to them in making money by completely extraneous purposes, as there has been a tendency to happen already.

Thirdly, it prevents the liabilities for capital gains tax and development land tax from arising on transactions which are to be brought about by the provisions in the Bill and which involve no significant change in ownership. Just because a PTE becomes a company, it will not in any sense be liable for capital gains or development land tax. Those provisions make the position entirely fair both as regards the transition and as between the PTE companies and private sector companies when they are competing with one another in the open market.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman asked me for details of the break-up of the National Bus Company. I have written to the board of the National Bus Company asking it to prepare a number of options which will have to bear in mind the need for obtaining competitiveness and at the same time the possibilities for sale and the lively proceeds of sale as well as the management of the company in the meanwhile.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Will the right hon. Gentleman also bear in mind the viability and the size of the units? Will this be an element, or is he simply intent on forcing them into the private sector without regard to whether the companies concerned are viable units?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Lady may have misheard me. I said that I asked the National Bus Company to work out options—three, four, five, two, one; I do not know how many—which it believes will meet the criteria which I put in my letter to the company. One of those criteria is competition; another is the return to the Exchequer; a third is the ability to manage. The hon. Lady will find it all in Hansard. If a company is to be saleable, it must be viable. Nobody will buy a company if it is not thought to be viable.

The hon. Member for Maryhill also asked about the maximisation of proceeds from the sale of the National Bus Company subsidiaries. This will be very much part of the consideration in deciding between the options. As I said on a previous occasion, I am not certain that the National Bus Company is saleable as an entity. I suspect that we will get a different type of offer by selling it in smaller units. I hope that offers will come from managers and employees working on employee buy-out schemes, as happened with the National Freight Corporation.

Mr. Craigen: Does that mean that when the Minister is taking a decision it will be the highest return to the Treasury rather than the greatest service to the local community that will be the deciding factor?

Mr. Ridley: Both the letter which I wrote to the chairman of the National Bus Company and the priorities in the clause in the Bill, which he should read carefully, set out that the prime consideration is that a competitive situation should result from the sale of the assets so that when the National Bus Company subsidiaries are sold they are neither too dominant nor too small to be able to compete with the private sector, the PTEs and the municipal undertakings. That is the prime consideration.

Mr. Craigen: That does not answer the question.

Mr. Ridley: It answers the question entirely. The main priority in the sale of the subsidiaries will be competition. It is clearly set out in the Bill.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the PTEs. He will notice that the first priority in the Bill is that the PTE bus operations should be put into an arm's length state as separate companies. If a PTE is thought to be too large and dominant to make for proper competition, there is power in the Bill for me to ask it to put forward a scheme to break up the operation into smaller units. It does not follow that in all cases or in any case we will do that. It will depend on the competitive situation which will result from the making of the companies. Some PTEs may want to do that of their own volition; some may not.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I am most interested in what my right hon. Friend has said. Is he aware that there are more than 3,000 buses in Manchester? Is it not right to give an indication to the House that there will not be in Greater Manchester one organisation with that large number of vehicles if he is to insist in all other parts of the country that units of the NBC or other PTEs will be split up? Is it not right to make it clear whether 3,000 will be too many? If he accepts it in Manchester, he should accept it elsewhere.

Mr. Ridley: We must first see whether Manchester PTE puts forward proposals to restructure its own operation which might well fit in with the criteria. Manchester may not do that, in which case we will indeed have to do as my hon. Friend suggests. I hardly think that it is right to design a new scheme for the Manchester PTE companies on the Ways and Means resolution, as it is not entirely relevant to whether we should pay money from these various operations into the Consolidated Fund.

The hon. Gentleman asked me what would happen to fees and fines raised by the traffic commissioners. The answer is that they will be paid into the Consolidated Fund.

The hon. Gentleman quoted the words of the late Lord Butler. "Those who miss the bus will have to walk". However, the situation has changed and now those who miss the bus will take the car. There is competition, and the bus service has to be able to win back that traffic. One way in which that will be done is the way about which he asked me—by keeping fares down. There are two ways to do that: first, by subsidy, which is how it is done in south Yorkshire; secondly, by competition. When subsidies are used, money has to be taken out of other people's pockets. When competition is used, the efficiency of the operators does it. That is what will happen to fares—they will come down. I commend the motion to the House.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That any Act resulting from the Transport Bill ("the Transport Act") may provide—

(a) that section 16(1)(a) of the Finance Act 1970 (which excludes precept income and grants in computing the profits of a Passenger Transport Executive chargeable to corporation tax) shall not apply with respect to any accounting period beginning on or after the passing of the Transport Act;

(b) that, in computing for the purposes of the Corporation Tax Acts the profit or loss of a Passenger Transport Executive for any accounting period beginning on or after the passing of the Transport Act, the loss of any earlier accounting period shall be computed as if section 16(1)(a) of the Finance Act 1970 had not been enacted; and

(c) for the payment of sums into the Consolidated Fund and for increased payments into the Consolidated Fund under any other enactment.

London Regional Transport (Levy)

11.55 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I beg to move,

That the draft London Regional Transport (Levy) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 17 December, be approved.

I think I should first explain to the House some of the detail of this draft levy order.

London's ratepayers are being asked to contribute £212 million towards the estimated grants to LRT of £323 million for the financial year 1985-86. Two hundred and twelve million pounds is equivalent to a rate of 10·8p. Of course, those who get a rate rebate also get a rebate on this amount.

The Government's approach is certainly in stark contrast to that of London Transport's old masters. They thought that by taking more and more money from the ratepayer they could conceal from passengers the rising real costs of providing public transport services in London. Between 1970 and 1983, the total grant from taxpayers and ratepayers rose from £6·5 million to £400 million, including the concessionary fare grants. Despite this, fares were over 30 per cent. higher in real terms after the GLC's last fares change in May 1983 than they were at the beginning of 1970, when the GLC was first given responsibility for London Transport.

The first step that we took on taking control of London Regional Transport last summer was to signal an end to the upward spiral of costs and subsidies, and we made an early start. On 20 July, three weeks after LRT came under Government control, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to the chairman of LRT setting out clear objectives for the next few years. He made it clear that there had to be a limit on the amount of public resources under the transport system but within the total available there should be a substantial shift away from revenue subsidy into productive capital investment, to enable lasting improvements in public transport facilities to be made and to make the system more efficient.

Accordingly, my right hon. Friend set two specific targets for LRT. The first target was to reduce unit costs by at least 2·5 per cent. a year in real terms and, secondly, to reduce the level of revenue support required from £190 million in 1984-85 to £95 million cash in 1987-88. This is less than 40 per cent. of the level of revenue support proposed by the GLC under its plan for 1987-88. At the same time, we made it clear that the Government were prepared to provide for a substantial programme of capital investment to save costs and improve facilities for passengers, including the interchanges between modes.

I am pleased to acknowledge the progress which LRT management has already made under Keith Bright in transforming the outlook for LRT. LRT's annual business plan for 1985-86 makes encouraging reading. I know that some Opposition Members will be disappointed, because they like to claim that efficiency improvements are a pipe dream and that passengers will have to pay a heavy price if subsidies are reduced. However, the annual business plan utterly refutes this defeatist attitude and I recommend it to any hon. Member who wants to know what is now going on.

Instead of the swingeing fares increases which we were accused of plotting, LRT has raised fares by 9 per cent. on average from 6 January. That 9 per cent. puts it back to the same level in real terms as in May 1983 after the GLC's last fares changes. In fact, fares are 10 per cent. lower now than they were in 1981, when the present GLC took office. LRT has introduced the new Capitalcard which extends the benefits of the very popular LT Travelcard to include British Rail's services in the London area.

Hon. Members who have studied the annual business plan will be aware that there are encouraging developments in passenger services. London Regional Transport has improved bus service reliability in 1984-85 and hopes to achieve further improvements in the coming year. As a result, it forecasts that average waiting times will show some improvement in 1985-86 despite a slight reduction in total bus mileage and that service levels will still be substantially above the proposals in LT's 1983 plan.

In his introduction to the business plan, the chairman of LRT states:

"Total public transport mileage by road in London might, in fact, increase if demand can be stimulated by the development of new routes and different kinds of services, operated by London buses or other operators under contract to LRT."

So the future has some bright prospects, with good management.

A slight increase in total operated mileage is forecast for the underground system. The Heathrow terminal 4 extension is scheduled to open towards the end of 1985. There are no proposals for station or line closures and LRT plans to continue with its ambitious programme of station modernisation.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): The move towards one-person operated buses has been much greater under LRT than under the GLC. Will this not adversely affect the reliability of bus services for passengers, on the ground that these buses take longer to complete their journeys for the obvious reason that there is only one person to handle the operation and not two?

Mrs. Chalker: From the information that I have to hand from different places round the country, some of which already have 100 per cent. one-person operation, I do not find that to be true. I do not have any information to that effect; if I did, I would tell the hon. Member. If I discover any information, I will let him know.

The one–person operated buses, once people are used to the operation, do not have the same hold-ups as are involved in getting both members of the crew to start off or the purely operational problems that sometimes occur with a conductor and a driver as opposed to one person doing the entire job.

LRT's annual business plan shows that it has made a good start towards better services for less subsidy. It has managed to reduce the revenue support requirement from £190 million this year under the GLC to about £130 million for 1985-86, a reduction of nearly one third, but without a large increase in fares or major cuts in services. This achievement is attributable partly to the continuing success of its marketing policies, especially Travelcard. But a key factor is the improving efficiency. LRT now expects to exceed its budgeted unit cost reduction target this year by a wide margin as a result of the initiatives agreed by the new board to improve productivity across the whole range of LRT's operations. In 1985-86, it expects to reduce unit costs by a further 2·8 per cent., which is significantly better than the target of 2·5 per cent. which my right hon. Friend has set.

This progress has enabled LRT to achieve a dramatic switch of resources into worthwhile capital investment, which I believe all hon. Members should welcome. Examples include the modernisation of bus and rail engineering facilities, increasing automation of ticket sales and collection on the underground and progressive conversion of the bus and train fleets to one-person operation, as the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) mentioned. In addition, nearly one third of underground investment for 1985-86 will be devoted to an expanding station modernisation programme.

In sum, LRT's plan shows that in 1985-86 it will have made a good start on the way towards better services for less subsidy. It is odd then, even if predictable, that the latest message from across the river is that ratepayers will be worse off financially under the new arrangements. It is worth my taking a few minutes to examine the credentials of that claim.

It was of course the GLC's high-spending policies which led to it receiving no block grant in 1984-85, so the only contribution from the taxpayer towards the GLC's grants to London Transport came by way of the transport supplementary grant. On a pro rata apportionment of the transport supplementary grant between the various items of accepted expenditure, the GLC received under £80 million of transport supplementary grant this year towards the total budgeted to London Transport of £340 million. Over three quarters of the GLC's grants, therefore, fell to be met by ratepayers in the financial year 1984-85. By contrast, the levy order before the House for 1985-86, which I ask hon. Members to approve, provides for a rate payers' contribution of less than two thirds, and the total grant has been reduced from £340 million to £323 million. I ask any hon. Member who is good with a pencil and paper or a calculator at this hour: how can two thirds of £323 million be more than three quarters of £340 million? Hon. Members may well ask. The answer is that, from across the river we have had a new form of maths—I dare not call it new maths, because that would be unfair to new maths—by which it seeks to prove its figures.

Until just over a year ago, the GLC was funding capital investment by LRT on a pay-as-you-go basis. This is a method appropriate for investment which is unlikely to generate sufficient profits to cover even borrowing charges. On this basis, the share of the GLC's budget for London Transport this year, which was not covered by Government grants was £263 million—£50 million, or some 2½p in the pound more than the Government's proposed levy for 1985-86.

Because that shows the GLC's policies in a bad light, the GLC has been desperately trying to demonstrate that it has borrowed to finance LT's capital grants. In order to provide some basis for that claim, the GLC switched an arbitrary £300 million of external debt from housing to public transport in December 1983, when the London Regional Transport Bill was at Second Reading stage in this House. Hon. Members will not be fooled by this ruse; nor will ratepayers. To make it worse, not only does the GLC claim that it has kept its rates down by spreading the costs of its policies over future years; at the same time it seeks to blame the Government for the £70 million of debt charges that are now attributed to public transport as a result of its own transfer of that £300 million from housing to public transport. I am not surprised that that is happening, but we will not have the wool pulled over our eyes or over ratepayers' eyes. I must say, accustomed as I am to the sort of stories which are cooked up in county hall, that that one really takes some beating.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I want to understand the Minister. I do not want to be a party to dealing in false figures. Will she tell the House whether the debt charges of £69 million are debt charges on previous London Transport borrowing? In cash terms, how many million pounds are being contributed by ratepayers to London Regional Transport?

Mrs. Chalker: The answer to the first question is no, and to the second is the figure that I have already mentioned—£212 million of grant, almost two thirds of the total of £323 million.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): We can become blinded by figures. The Minister could helpfully tell the House what percentage in the coming year of total money spent on LRT will come from the ratepayer, as opposed to the current year, which, subject to certain alterations, is under the control of the GLC. It is always the proportion between rate contribution and central taxpayers' contribution that people can most easily perceive, rather than the figures given by the Minister.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall return to the figures when I reply to the debate, but off the top of my head I believe them to be 65·6 per cent. and 75 per cent.

In closing my remarks, I need do no more than draw the attention of the House to the GLC's policy to increase the revenue subsidy for LT alone to £245 million by 1987-88 — more than two and half times the level proposed by the Government. In contrast, our policies, which have already begun to deliver substantial savings for London ratepayers in the first few months of LRT are beginning to bear fruit. The outlook is that those savings will increase. Furthermore, our approach, with the backing of the LRT management, will bring very substantial benefits for the whole community in terms of improved services and facilities for less money. That is a far cry from the decay and neglect that was predicted by our opponents following the Government's takeover of LRT. The prospects for London's public transport system, those who use the popular Capitalcard and those who pay for it through the rate levy order have never been better. I commend the draft order to the House.

12.14 am

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): It is a disgrace that a major order, which is putting an extra cost on to London ratepayers, should be taken at this hour of the morning. The Government are perfectly well aware that such a measure will be unpopular and they are anxious that it should not receive too much publicity.

It is enlightening that the Secretary of State has not moved the order. I notice that that task has now been downgraded to the province of Minister of State — I have no desire to be rude to the hon. Lady—whereas before the right hon. Gentleman was at least prepared to come here and wave his arms about in an attempt to defend some of the decisions that he has taken.

It is clear that there is a basic inconsistency in the right hon. Gentleman's political ethos. We have just spent one parliamentary day debating the fact that the right hon. Gentleman wishes to set free the transport system throughout the rest of the United Kingdom, yet now he is operating in a completely different way in relation to London Regional Transport.

The right hon. Gentleman got himself into this situation because he levied an amount on the GLC, which, according to the judge who tried the case, was illegal and irresponsible. He is now anxious that we should push forward this levy tonight because as soon as the London ratepayers suddenly realise how much they have been conned they will add to the voices raised in the House not only against the abolition of the GLC but against the arbitrary way in which the right hon. Gentleman has now taken London transport into his pocket to run like some personal little train set round and round his office table.

I am perfectly prepared to stand here tonight and bandy the most complicated statistics with the Minister of State if she seriously thinks that that will in any way enlighten ratepayers. It is frightening that Conservative Members should come here at the behest of the Secretary of State, who has been found guilty of asking for more money than he legally has a right to, and then talk to us about creative accounting. We are told that the GLC has been fixing the figures because it has used creative accounting to shift through an entire book-keeping operation, money out of one vote and into another and that that is why LRT is faced with such difficulties. That is nonsense and the Minister of State knows that.

The purpose of the order is to levy a 10·8p precept on London boroughs to pay for part of the cost of financing public transport in London. As long as that is realised, and as long as we have a little plain talking so that we do not pretend that somehow or other some magic accounting procedure has left LRT with debts which it did not expect and was not supposed to hold, we shall get somewhere near talking about the reality behind this levy.

We are told by the Minister that the Government are charging far less than happened under the GLC. That is not the way the ratepayers of London will see it. They will see it in a much simpler way. They believe that the 9 per cent. rise in fares that has taken place since the LRT took over is an extra imposition. They believe that not only the increase in the levy but the clear sign that some of the ways in which the payment is operating across the capital are manifestly unfair, since the outer areas are not contributing the proper percentage of the moneys, and are worse than the situation that existed under the previous London Transport. They do not intend to be in some way persuaded that they are getting a much better system and that, although they will have to pay more and have worse services, that is part of some cloud of misunderstanding on their part, a miasma created by the wicked people across the river in the GLC.

The Minister has come here late at night to levy on Londoners a tax for a transport system run not by elected councillors—not by those over whom they have some control — and not even by those who pretend to demonstrate a certain expertise, but by a quango that will decide not only the rate of fares and developments but the effect on staffing and services.

Does the Minister really believe that the people of London do not understand that? They may not be expert at creative accounting. They may not have the right Etonian-type accents when they complain about the removal of services which they desperately need. But one fact they understand clearly. While the Secretary of State says that the rest of the United Kingdom must have competition, he wants London's services to be run by a quango, which he controls from Whitehall. What is worse, he wants to charge the ratepayers of London more for the privilege of having their services run by one of the most ill-informed Secretaries of State for Transport that this country has had or is likely to have.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I have sat through many debates at county hall when the budget has been under discussion. Compared with those debates, it is a travesty tonight to witness the way in which matters affecting the services and costs of London transport are being decided.

Throughout our deliberations on the London Regional Transport Bill, we were continually told by Ministers that the democratic accountablility of LRT would be assured through the means of the debate on the levy order. We are now undertaking that exercise, but it is a miserable replacement for the GLC's lengthy debates of all matters concerning London transport.

It was not a question of Tory members of the GLC bandying statistics before the transport committee. Papers were circulated and the figures were worked out. All the necessary information was available for all to see, and, what is more, the opposition could move amendments, whereas we are faced with an unamendable order and we have one and half miserable, rotten, stinking hours in which to debate it at gone midnight.

Who is here to discuss it? At the GLC there was a great deal of press interest in the lively debates about the future levels of London Transport services and fares. In the Chamber tonight we have perhaps a dozen hon. Members who represent London constituencies. I am not suggesting that this side of the House is any better than the Government side in that respect.

It is clear that hon. Members have become so fed up to the back teeth with being dragged into the day-to-day running of local government that they are voting with their feet, staying in the bars and disappearing into the night, leaving a few of us to debate issues for which we should have no responsibility and about which few of us have real knowledge.

There is no point in quoting many statistics, and I assure the Minister that I am not trying to score cheap points, but when she replies to the debate, will she explain how my information is incorrect, if it is? My figures, coming from county hall, do not accord with her statistics, coming from her advisers. I understand that this precept represents a 35 per cent. increase for London ratepayers. I will explain how I have arrived at that figure, and perhaps she will explain how I have got it wrong, if I have. Let us compare the 1984-85 transport budget with LRT's budget for 1985-86.

First, there was revenue support direct to London Transport of £190 million. Added to that were debt charges of £59 million, paid from the GLC precept, giving a sub-total of £249 million. To be deducted from that sub-total was £41 million received in the transport supplementary grant from central Government. Therefore, in 1984-85 the total burden on the London ratepayers was £208 million. I can gladly provide those figures; they are not secret. They were produced by the advisers to the GLC transport committee.

As the Minister correctly says, the total subsidy to London Regional Transport is £323 million. The hon. Lady also correctly says that the ratepayers will contribute £212 million of that through the LRT levy. That is already more than the £208 million that they paid last year, but one must add to it another £69 million for debt charges on previous London Transport borrowing, paid for through the GLC precept. Therefore, in 1985-86 the total burden on the ratepayers will be £281 million compared with £208 million in 1984-85, an increase of 35 per cent. Will the Minister please tell me, and the House, where my figures disagree with hers?

Why are the ratepayers of London being asked to pay that larger precept? The main reason is that Ministers have changed the way in which London Regional Transport pays for its capital spending. London Transport used to pay for capital expenditure by borrowing. That method was perfectly reasonable. It spread the cost of improvements over a number of years. London Regional Transport, on the other hand, is now required by Ministers to load the whole cost of capital equipment on to the year in which it is purchased. In 1985-86 there is a large hike in the cost to ratepayers consequent upon that change in policy.

The new policy makes neither good financial sense nor good economic sense. As in the case of water provision, the Government have asked for increased capital expenditure and they have also asked that all the expenditure should be financed in the year in which is incurred. That is a complete change from the way in which local authorities and nationalised industries have normally dealt with their own capital expenditure.

The new policy makes no sense, because future Governments might want substantially to increase the capital spending of London Regional Transport. If the present accounting system is maintained, London ratepayers will pay dearly for capital investment that will benefit subsequent generations of ratepayers as well as themselves.

Mr. Deakins: In the case of both water and public transport in London, is not the Government's aim to make a profit for themselves rather than to relieve the burden on the ratepayers?

Mr. Banks: The Government certainly appear now to be using charging in nationalised industries as a way of increasing indirect taxation. That is a dishonest and behind-the-scenes way of doing things.

One of the benefits to the Government is that few people realise that the sleight of hand has taken place. When one is faced with a whole range of precepts and bills, it is difficult to work out what is going on. The Government are seeking to throw sand in the eyes of the ratepayers and taxpayers. In doing so they hope to get away with a massive switch from direct to indirect taxation. The ratepayers of London are being asked to pay more for a much worse service.

The Secretary of State has set several targets that will lead to a deterioration of services in London. There has been a proposed reduction in the level of revenue support from a budgeted £190 million by the GLC in 1984-85, to £95 million in cash terms by 1987-88, which is £82 million in 1984-85 prices, assuming 5 per cent. inflation. There is a proposed reduction of 2·5 per cent. in unit costs in real terms each year during the next few years and the Secretary of State has confirmed the setting up of separate bus and rail subsidiaries to be operational by 1 April 1985. He has also given LRT responsibility for people with disabilities. That is fine, but we need to know the costs involved.

[Mr. Banks]

We have witnessed fare changes which, as the Minister rightly said, rose by an average of 9 per cent. on 6 January 1985. I welcome the fact that she also said that fare levels now are still 10 per cent. in real terms below what they were in 1981. The GLC can be thanked for that. It was that part of the GLC's policy which proved popular with ratepayers in 1981 and, were we to have an election in 1985, would prove so again. There will be no election, of course, so we shall never be able to put the matter to the test. No doubt the Government are greatly relieved at that.

The fare increases from January hide several factors that the Minister did not bother to touch on. The biggest increases were for short distances. The short hop fare, which accounts for 30 per cent. of all fares, rose by 25 per cent., from 20p to 25p. The two-zone travel card increased by 17 per cent. and children's fares rose by 50 per cent., from 10p to 15p. The Minister should not try to throw sand in our eyes as well by trying to suggest that this modest 9 per cent. increase, which is double the rate of inflation at the moment, does not hide a far more serious series of larger increases that affect certain groups of people.

I notice that the fares to Heathrow remained unchanged or were reduced. Why? Can the Minister give a reason? Those are the types of question that the transport chair at the GLC would have had to answer. He would not have been able to get away with it by trekking through a summing up, hoping that we would all go away satisfied. The chair would have been held to account by the committee and the opposition.

The Minister made great play of the success of Capitalcard. I think that she is anticipating something. Capitalcard, despite its fetching jingle that we hear every morning on Capital radio and LBC, has been operating for only a short time. I think that she has got it confused with Travelcard, which was the major reason for the GLC ensuring that LT produced a £35 million operating surplus last year. Capitalcard has only just started and will not be as successful as Travelcard. Let me tell the Minister why. First, it is different from the GLC's scheme, for which £5 million was provided in the London Transport Executive budget for 1984-85. The GLC's proposal was to extend Travelcard to British Rail users at no extra cost.

Mrs. Chalker: At no extra cost to whom?

Mr. Banks: At no extra cost to those who bought the travel card.

Mrs. Chalker: Ah!

Mr. Banks: Of course. There is no such thing as a free lunch, even for Conservative Members. I understand that, and an awful lot of free lunches are eaten in this place. At least the ratepayers of London were able to decide through their elected representatives and the ballot box whether their rates should be used to subsidise cheap travel in London. The Minister knows that it was electorally popular and successful. All the records show that. I admit that it was not free, because there is no such thing as something free in this world. I am sure that if the Government could tax the air they would do it.

In contrast to Travelcard, Capitalcard prices are set at a premium. — [Interruption.] I am delighted that the invisible man has paid us a visit. The Secretary of State may be interested to know that I was trying to explain to the Minister the difference between Capitalcard and Travelcard as she seems to get them confused. He has probably not heard of either.

Capitalcard prices are set at a premium above both Travelcard and the British Rail season ticket rate. Obviously that limits its application to passengers who previously used LRT and BR. Capitalcard is up to 37 per cent. more expensive than the GLC's proposals. It is unlikely to attract many takers because of the premium, and is likely to achieve only limited operating improvements and efficiencies. The Minister must acknowledge those facts. It is no good claiming that Capitalcard will be or is a great success when it has not been operating long enough to be evaluated. She must also accept that it is considerably more expensive than Travelcard, and therefore likely to prove that much more unpopular.

I realise that I am going into great detail, but this is how we used to conduct debates about London transport at county hall. I admit that we had only five minutes in which to put points, but we could return to the subject. Moreover, large numbers of people could make points, and we had a transport committee. Now we have no way of questioning officers and members about policies because our time has been reduced to an hour and a half's debate late on an evening that the Government choose.

There have been many service changes since July 1984. There have been changes to 38 bus routes, and some improvements to the night bus network, which are welcomed. However, major bus service changes are planned for February, and service reductions of 2 per cent. have been announced in LRT's business plan for 1985-86, despite an increase in patronage of 10 per cent. Why on earth LRT plans reductions of 2 per cent. when patronage is increasing, I cannot fathom. Perhaps the Minister will explain when she replies.

The GLC plan for bus mileage in 1985-86 was to be 168 million, but LRT's business plan for 1985-86 envisaged only 164 million. If the GLC had been allowed to continue, bus mileage in the 1987-88 would have increased to 170 million, but LRT's business plan envisages only 159 million. Therefore, there will be a constant reduction in bus mileage in London. That cannot be good news for London's ratepayers. They are faced with a 35 per cent. increase in charges for transport next year, and can look forward to fares increasing by what the Minister called a modest 9 per cent. No doubt it will be a modest 15 per cent. later and a modest 20 per cent. after that—and all the time bus mileages are decreasing.

Finally, when we had a transport Committee where we could discuss such matters, we could also get details of the day-to-day running of London transport. How can we find that out now? The Minister refuses to answer questions about it because it is normal practice for nationalised industries. How is that good for ratepayers and hon. Members? How can we possibly have the democratic accountability that the Secretary of State promised us during discussions on the London Regional Transport Act 1984 if we cannot ask about the day-to-day services of LRT?

Our constituents ask us about bus frequencies—about what has happened to the number 25 or the night service —and we cannot answer their questions, because the Secretary of State and London Regional Transport refuse to answer such questions. The press and the public used to be able to attend the GLC transport committee's meetings. They could listen to what was said and questions could be asked. Will London Regional Transport let the press and the ratepayers attend its meetings? Of course not. In Committee on the London Regional Transport Bill, the Secretary of State would not accept an amendment to allow the press and the public to attend LRT's meetings.

The Minister should not try to kid us that this miserable, squalid one-and-a-half-hour debate that the Government have so generously provided is any substitute for the democratic accountability of London Transport as it used to be run under the wisdom, the good guidance and the economic efficiency of the Greater London council.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): This is a funny business indeed. When one considers the figures—I have examined the Minister's contributions in Committee on the London Regional Transport Act—one discovers that, last year, the Minister said that the ratepayers' contribution to the subsidy to London Transport was about 70 per cent. This year, under this order, the ratepayers' contribution will decrease to 65·63 per cent. Those percentages are directly comparable. However, to a great extent, the ratepayer is the user, and the fares will increase by 9 per cent. We are always being told that the total budget of London Regional Transport is decreasing, yet we are told that the service of London Regional Transport is increasing and that the contribution is producing a better return. The figures do not make sense.

This is another example of the House not being told clearly what the position is, and of the Minister and her Department adding another sorry chapter to the saga of their muddled dealings with London Regional Transport. My party and I have opposed from the beginning the concept of taking London Transport, uniquely in Britain, out of local democratic accountability into the hands of the Government, thus making a nationalised industry out of a local transport system. We opposed the Bill in Committee. We did not defend uncritically the position of London Transport, but at least it was run by people who were elected to run the service. We could have sacked the transport authority if we did not like what it was doing. In 1981, when the elections for the GLC were last held, transport was a major issue and the cheap fares policy was a determining factor in the success of the present administration.

Under the new situation, I am one of the people who reside in London boroughs whose rate will be levied by the Secretary of State, not by a group of councillors whom I can elect. I have no power to elect or to sack the Secretary of State. Therefore, I will be taxed, as will other hon. Members who are London ratepayers, by the Secretary of State. He will add to my burden as a ratepayer. I already have one such burden because of an historical anomaly —I must pay money for the Metropolitan police through an official on its behalf. Again, I have no say in that. I pay my rates to other authorities after democratic decision and, inasmuch as the Government have not inhibited it, democratic debate.

There are no other ways than this debate in which we can express our views. We cannot amend the proposals. We either take them or leave them. There is no option. The problem over that is that there is no real accountability or any real responsiveness to the needs of the consumer and the ratepayers. But what is far worse is that we are being asked to decide on the budget for the next financial year before the Secretary of State has sorted out his budget for this year. Next week we were to debate the London Regional Transport (Amendment) Bill, yet the Secretary of State is still sorting out, because of a mistake he made, the budget for this year. How one can calculate, plan and organise the budget for next year when one does not know what this year's budget is may strike some hon. Members as somewhat bizarre. Even most creative accountants might find that difficult to comprehend.

The reality is that the Secretary of State went to court, where the judge declared that he had acted illegally and had exceeded his powers. He did things that he could have avoided doing if he had taken our advice in Committee, but he chose not to do so because he and his colleagues knew best. Even though the Secretary of State gave notice that he was going to appeal against that decision, eventually he backed down. It is an important constitutional principle that the Secretary of State should not come before this House to request it to pass this order assuming, when he has no constitutional right to do so, that the London Regional Transport (Amendment) Bill will be passed.

I seem to remember that the same Secretary of State introduced the Civil Aviation Bill. It did not appear to get very far. It failed on take-off. It might just be that his little London Regional Transport (Amendment) Bill does not get through this House and the other place unamended. It could be that hon. Members do not like the idea of retrospective legislation—to correct mistakes that only the Secretary of State and his Department have made. If that is the case, we shall tonight be deciding on a budget for next year when no budget has been finalised for this year. As has been said, this is unconstitutional and, in London Transport terms, without precedent. In the past we went through a democratic procedure. We were able to look at figures and to listen to debate which has been open to the public. We did not have a little draft order which provided no explanation and no relevant figures. We are being asked to give a blank cheque to the Secretary of State without knowing the state of his current account.

I ask the Secretary of State, or his Minister of State, whether they might not accept that in law, order and constitutional propriety they should withdraw this draft order until they have been able to get through Parliament other legislation relating to this year's budget. If they get that legislation through the House—I hope they do not —then let them come back with the order that we are considering tonight.

I have already made the point that this is taxation without representation, which as a matter of principle, is unsatisfactory. It is also pretty high taxation. It will increase the amount that ratepayers will be contributing to London Regional Transport. On the other hand, we are being asked to pay more in fares. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and other hon. Members will be aware that the figures do not add up. By this order, the Secretary of State will levy £212 million from ratepayers. He is also going to add the £69 million, as the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said, that the GLC will have to find to cover their outstanding debt resulting from capital projects, debt which the Government would not take over, although they wanted to nationalise London Transport. They would take over the advantages but they would not take over the disadvantages.

Therefore the bill, as has been said, will be £281 million. This is higher than the bill would have been if the Greater London Council were running London Transport. It had a three-year plan and announced its figures. Therefore the Secretary of State is planning to outspend the council that he decided to replace. Unless the Secretary of State intends to practise more creative accounting, the cost is increasing, even though in Committee day after day, week after week, month after month he kept saying that the Government were going to make London Regional Transport more cost-effective. All I can say is that, if that is the way London Regional Transport is to go on, it does not say much for its accounting or for its level of service.

The future of London Regional Transport is shrouded in the normal mist that surrounds all the activities of the Department of Transport under this Administration. The business plan for London Regional Transport is good as far as it goes. I might remind the Secretary of State that if it had not been for pressure from Opposition Members in Committee there would not have been a business plan, because we were not to have such a series of documents with figures when the matter was originally proposed in Committee. There was to be no accountability in advance.

We are also entitled to know what sort of budget is planned for future years. Is it to be a slippery slope downwards with fewer services, more costs and higher fares, or is there to be a turning of one of the corners that the Government seem to reply upon to fulfil their best expectations? [Interruption.] Yes, indeed, they may have to rely on the exchange rate to enable them to do something.

The plan in the business document envisages a cut in revenue support over the next few years from about £190 million to £95 million or £85 million—a substantial cut. Yet we are being told that there will be minimal service reductions and fares increases consistent only with inflation. Nobody has been able to show how that equation can be made, and where the efficiency savings will be found remains fundamentally unclear. It looks as if the Secretary of State and his Department will claim that they will be able to square the circle, but they are not willing to come up with the evidence to support that claim.

London Transport, particularly in the area that I represent, is grossly under-funded. It does not need cuts or higher fares. People need to be charged less so that more people can use the services to generate more revenue so that we can have more capital investment for better public transport, fewer cars, less clogging of our capital city, a better service and generally a city that works.

The signs are that this doubly incompetent start by the Department has no good news for Londoners, whether ratepayers or passengers, and that there is no secure long-term plan for London Transport. If the Secretary of State is determined to go on with this half budget and creative accounting, I must place on record the fact that he does so against all constitutional standards of decency and propriety and without even coming to the House to tell us his reasons.

Unless we hear his reasons before the end of the debate, not only will we have to vote against the order tonight but we will be required to point out to the public that the arguments advanced last year were a con and that the Secretary of State has not done any of the things that he maintained he would achieve in his stewardship for London Transport and its users.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) explained vividly the difference between the review of London Transport's activities and its future prospects that one might expect in a debate in county hall and in this brief debate. What he did not mention—I make no complaint about it—is that the supervisory function has passed from professionals responsible to councillors at county hall to civil servants in Whitehall accountable to the Secretary of State, who is accountable to the House.

I recall asking a question when the London Regional Transport Act 1984 was being debated about the number of people additional to those already in the Department of Transport who would be needed to administer the affairs of London Regional Transport. If I recollect correctly, the answer was in excess of 20 and perhaps up to 50. Perhaps the Minister will tell us the number. I think the answer was that the equivalent of at least 20 full-time people would be required in Marsham street.

I wish to emphasise the point made by my hon. Friend about the effect of the capital arrangements. He said that the Minister is requiring London Transport to get its capital requirements out of money levied by rates. If that is true, and the Minister must either deny it or agree to it, it means that there is a tax on transport in London paid by the ratepayers because they are paying more than they would under alternative methods of paying for that capital. If I have it wrong, I am sure that the Minister will correct me, but is she cannot, and if the Secretary of State for Transport is doing what the Secretary of State for the Environment is doing to sewerage and water supply, we are having to pay more for transport than we should be doing. This is the Government who say that they wish to reduce rates. Therefore the Government are being double-faced, if that is their position.

The Minister mentioned improvements to interchange. I warn her that if London Regional Transport or others trumpet the improvements for interchange such as that trumpeted in a recent article in the Sunday press, saying that there will be through-running between, for example, Paddington and the City, they should bear in mind that when that railway was built well over 100 years ago, it was built with through-running in mind. Such improvements are not improving absolutely, but only reverting to services of yesteryear. Any puffed-up, jumped-up exaggerations such as this will be viewed for what they are worth.

London Regional Transport and the Minister will have to face a major problem in the next few years, which hitherto has not received the attention that it deserves. That is the trend of employment in central London, and the effect that that will have on London transport, its finances and the quality of life in London. Some time ago, I asked the Department of the Environment to estimate the amount of empty office space in the Cities of London and Westminster, and in the rest of the GLC area. It did not reply because it said that such figures were not collected, and it would not collect them.

Another Bill, which we are considering in Committee, will destroy the strategic planning responsibility of the GLC, and put in its place an advisory planning commission to the Department of the Environment. I invite the Minister, the Secretary of State for Transport, and the Secretary of State for the Environment to have a look around the City and the West End to see the number of boards up saying, "To Let" and "For Sale". They are extraordinary and unnerving in number. There have not been such boards in the City of London in living memory, and they are now sprouting in every back and main street in the City and the West End. There is a rapid emptying of office space, which means that the numbers of people working there, and the numbers of people travelling to work, are going down, quite apart from the electronic revolution, about which we have all heard, and the effects that that will have. This will mean that there will be much less use of work journeys on London Transport in the coming years. All this will make a great difference, as it will change the income that LRT derives from this important source. Inadequate machinery will have to face this challenge. In wishing to break up the GLC—the Secretary of State may not achieve this aim — its strategic planning function and the interlocked relationship with the administration of London Transport, we shall be in great difficulty. I am not convinced that the Government's plans, as instanced by Capitalcard, will help. We could have had a good scheme with the Capitalcard, because London's railways operate for between 15 and 18 hours a day, irrespective of demand. It would have been beneficial to have costed that card in a way that would have enabled the transport system to be used to its maximum capacity. I believe that the Minister of State and the Secretary of State should at least modify their structural plans so that the flight of work from central London and the West End is reversed, so that it is worth while for people to work in and sometimes to live in central London, and so that our capital resources are used to the maximum extent. Unless the Ministers do this, they will not use the existing resources to their maximum and will not encourage all aspects of London — be it shopping, entertainment, leisure or visits to friends and relations—to the maximum extent. We shall, therefore, not use the facilities that were available in pre-1914 London to the maximum extent. The relationship between transport and social use makes public transport what it should be.

This debate is an instrument to deal with the finances of, and matters involved in London Transport. I have sketched out the strategic problem only briefly. I believe that the Minister of State should examine these aspects, because, although we deplore the Government's policies, at least, with a bit of warning, we should be able to examine this matter so that when we consider the next levy order in a year's time, we shall not only comment on and oppose the order but examine how well Ministers are discharging their trust and responsibility for the type of methods that I have outlined.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I should like to endorse the comments of my hon. Friends the Members for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) that it is undemocratic for London's transport matters to be decided in an hour-and-a-half debate when Conservative Members do not represent London constituencies and chatter their way through the debate. If they wish to continue their discussions, the bars are still open, and I am sure that the bars would welcome the trade. The issue of democracy in London transport deserves far greater attention in the House that it is likely to receive tonight or at any other time.

I refer to the points that many hon. Members made day after day, week after week, during the Committee stage of the London Regional Transport Bill. We pointed out that about 55 per cent. of households in London owned cars. In the poorer areas of London, which are represented by the Opposition the rate of car ownership falls to 40 per cent., 30 per cent. and, in some cases, to less than 25 per cent. That means that often 75 per cent. of all households rely on public transport for their transport needs. In those households that have access to a car, usually one person —a man—has access to the car. Women are, therefore, reliant entirely on public transport. Those arguments washed completely over the Secretary of State. He did not seem to comprehend what we were talking about.

We suggested to the Secretary of State that membership of the London Regional Transport Authority should reflect the high percentage of women users of transport, and the needs of the disabled, the minority ethnic communities and the elderly. The right hon. Gentleman dismissed those ideas out of hand. On taking over London Regional Transport, the right hon. Gentleman's first act was to sack most members of the board, especially those who had been appointed by the GLC because they represented specifically those types of interests. At one stroke he showed his contempt for the majority of the people of London who are users of London Regional Transport Authority services.

There is a further inadequacy about this type of debate. While we are discussing the London regional transport levy for the forthcoming financial year we ought to be discussing the Secretary of State's other plans for transport in London. It is inextricably linked with road planning, lorry bands, ring ways, motorways and airport development. But, no, we are restricted to discussing the London Regional Transport Authority levy while the same Secretary of State has cast a pall and a blight over a very large part of London by his proposals for studies for new road building schemes through east London, north London, south London and other places. These issues ought to be debated along with the levy.

We are going down a ludicrous path in London, contrary to the movements in transport thinking in every other city in the world. We seem to be blessed with a Secretary of State——

Mr. Tony Banks: Cursed.

Mr. Corbyn: My hon. Friend says "cursed" and he is quite right. We are cursed with a Secretary of State who has no vision whatsoever of how most people live and work in London; who has not the slightest understanding of how people get around and, judging by his various idiotic remarks about one-way systems which should be abolished, traffic lights which should all be permanently on green and parking meters which should all be taken away, seems to think that one can continue to encourage commuter motoring in and out of central London and then be surprised that there are traffic jams and when people suggest to him that it is not such a good idea to demolish homes and businesses to make way for roads but is much more efficient to put people on buses and trains at a price they can afford, as was happening when the Greater London council had control of London's transport but is not happening now.

There was a short period after the Fares Fair scheme was introduced when the use of buses in London increased for the first time for many years, the number of people travelling on the underground increased and the number of people interchanging on to British Rail increased. But the Secretary of State could not stomach that, so he passed his nasty little Bill, which brought great danger to the streets of London and encouraged more cars and more lorries to come on to the streets of London. So we end up with the sort of ludicrous position that we are in tonight.

I hope that when the Minister replies—if he or she can be bothered to listen to some of the questions that are being put, because their attitude shows that they hold a lot of Londoners in great contempt—he or she will answer some specific questions.

First, how many bus routes will be cut during the next year from the London Regional Transport Authority's timetable? Secondly, how many miles of bus route will be lost in the forthcoming year? Thirdly, will they give us an undertaking as to what the fare increases will be in the forthcoming year and the year after? Will they also tell us what estimate they have made of the cost to the public purse of bringing in one-person-operated buses? With his rather curious ideas of efficiency, the Secretary of State seems to believe that it is more efficient to sack the bus conductors in order to make the buses slower, thereby creating a greater traffic jam and also making the buses considerably more dangerous, particularly for women passengers at night. It is something that he might not understand because I do not suppose that he or the hon. Lady travels on the buses late at night or at any other time. I suggest, however, that they consider the fear that is going through the minds of many people who are employed by the London Regional Transport Authority at the moment: those conductors who are about to lose their jobs—550 in the next month; the 3,800 jobs on London Transport that are due to go by the end of 1987; and the threat of privatisation that hangs over the London Regional Transport workshops, the maintenance gangs, the building department and all the other departments that have loyally served London Transport and given us a very good and potentially extremely efficient transport system throughout London.

But the Secretary of State flies in the face of all logic about London's transport needs, road planning requirements and the future needs of Londoners. He seems hell bent on driving more roads and motorways through London, taking buses off the roads and taking trains off the rails. He wants to cease to give the support that is needed to British Rail and to London Transport trains.

The elderly suffer who cannot find a bus to travel on while they still have a bus pass. The Government might tell us what plans they have for the bus pass for the elderly and whether they intend to extend the concession to British Rail trains. Another group which suffers are those who live in inner city areas who have no possibility of being able to buy a car or of being able to travel on any form of public transport other than buses. They have to rely on LRT and they are being treated to every-decreasing services, ever-lengthening bus queues and an ever-more expensive service. In the end it is not the Secretary of State or other Ministers who suffer, for they ride around in chauffeur-driven cars—[Interruption.] This is an example of the sort of debate that ensues when a group of public school hooligans, who find that they have nothing else to do, wander into the Chamber in the middle of the night merely to demonstrate their contempt for those who cannot afford to buy and run a car and who need a bus service to allow them to travel in London.

The evil days of this Tory Government are numbered. When the Government have been removed from office, a democratically elected Government will take their place. A Government will be elected who are determined to provide for the needs of all the people in London and our other major cities by establishing a decent, cheap and safe public transport system. The Secretary of State and his sidekick have shown themselves completely unfitted, unsuited and incapable of providing such a system.

1.12 am

Mrs. Chalker: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall reply to the debate. I have rarely heard such a lot of clap-trap as that which came from the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). In that respect he even put the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) in the shade.

A number of false remarks have been made, as one would expect in this debate. I exclude the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) from that remark, because he made an important contribution on future strategic planning. He asked me to consider what he said, which, as he knows, I shall do most carefully. He knows as well as I do, however, that no one can look into a crystal ball to ascertain the form of future transport planning. Instead, we can examine the developments that are taking place and put resources and capital investment into schemes such as the docklands light railway, which is being undertaken by LRT with the London Docklands Development Corporation. We can provide for those areas that are to be expanded in future. That is exactly what LRT is required to do and is doing. Indeed, it is progressing ahead of its schedule.

I shall not go wider than that because on this order—the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich seemed to believe that it was part of a Bill which is to be brought before the House next week—there is a good deal to be said. I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. Lady that the order is complicated. However, it is important to get the basis of fact absolutely right, and that I shall seek to do in my answers to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks).

First, I ask the House to remember something that I said in my opening remarks. Between 1970—when the GLC first became responsible for the running of London Transport—and 1985, total grant from taxpayers and ratepayers rose from £6·5 million to £400 million. That is where the problem had to be tackled. We were faced with a problem of upward spiralling costs with no great improvement in the service for those who needed to travel. We must also understand in this difficult calculation what figures we are considering. I shall try to follow through on the same figures that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West used, and explain where and why we differ.

First, he was busy claiming that the precept by the GLC for London Transport for 1984-85 was a total of £208 million, which was lower than the Government's proposed levy of £212 million from the ratepayers for the coming financial year. Let me explain why the GLC's calculation is different from the Government's in two important respects. The hon. Gentleman claimed that 35 per cent. more would be paid by ratepayers in the following year, but this is wrong. The GLC has assumed debt financing for capital investment rather than the pay-as-you-go financing that LRT will use. The GLC has also allocated a disproportionate amount of transport supplementary grant to London Transport as compared with other transport services. The effect of doing that is to use debt financing to spread the costs of capital investments over a longer period. The charge on the ratepayer is reduced in the current year when the GLC is responsible for the precept, but in the long run the large debt charges incurred are met in future when the levy is raised by the Government on the London ratepayer through the London Regional Transport legislation. In the longer term, the borrowing thus becomes more costly.

The GLC this year has claimed the credit for keeping down the transport precept. How has it done this? It switched that £300 million of external debt from housing to transport in December 1983. Now it seeks to blame the Government for the debt charges that have resulted from the policy.

The GLC cannot have it both ways. If it says that it borrowed to finance LRT, it has to bear full responsibility for landing ratepayers with debt charges to finance unprofitable investment. That is in marked contrast to the debt-free condition in which London Transport was transferred to the GLC in 1970.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am grateful to the Minister for taking time to explain the difference. She has not said that the GLC's figures are wrong, but that there is a difference. The big difference is the way in which the Government now want to finance capital borrowing. It is normal, in local government she must accept for one to spread capital costs over a period of years rather than to pay for them all in the one year. Who would buy a house and pay for it in one year? Some Conservative Members might be able to afford to do so, but the majority of ordinary people do not finance their borrowing in that way.

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman can argue as hard as he likes about this, but what the GLC would do by its manner of financing is to put up the overall cost of borrowing, and that is an additional cost that would have to be paid for by the ratepayers of London in the years ahead.

In addition, the GLC has also attributed £100 million of the total transport supplementary grant of £142 million in the current year to London Transport. That is disproportionate, given its responsibilities. That is why I said earlier that, on a pro rata basis of allocation of transport supplementary grant between LT and the other services, the GLC received roughly £76 million towards its total budgeted grants to LT of £339 million. The remaining £263 million fell to be funded by the ratepayers. That is about £50 million more than the proposed levy for the 1985-86 equivalent of a 2·5p rate.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West went on to ask about the £69 million to service the historic debt for London Transport in addition to the new Government levy. This is all part of the GLC's total historic debt. It is that which the GLC has recently chosen conveniently to call public transport. That is the £300 million of which I spoke a moment ago. It is the only institution of which I can think that could possibly seek to hold someone else responsible for the debts that it has incurred.

The hon. Gentleman then claimed that because there was a £208 million rate precept in 1984-85 that meant there was a 35 per cent. increase in the coming year. Since the new board of LRT took over we have managed to allow the capital grant provision to be increased by about £45 million at a time when the revenue support has been reduced by the productivity and efficiency of LRT. That has brought the total grant down by more than £15 million. On a comparable basis, that is why I have said before and say again tonight that the proposed levy is £50 million less than the GLC's budgeted grant to LRT in 1984-85, which fell to the London ratepayers to finance.

The hon. Gentleman made a number of remarks—and attributed things to me that I have not said, but that is not unusual—about Capitalcard. He sought to say that the fare changes in January were unreasonable. I said that Capitalcard is better and cheaper than the alternative——

Mr. Tony Banks: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not wish to draw any unfavourable comparisons, but in a debate on London Transport in county hall the chairman of the council would have drawn to order members who were shouting so that one could not hear the speaker.

Mrs. Chalker: Capitalcard is cheaper than the alternative British Rail point-to-point season combined with LRT's Travelcard. I have never said, on a one-for-one basis, that the Travelcard was not a good idea. Of course, it gives good value. The point is that the Capitalcard, which gives good value for money, is already proving popular and will, I am sure, continue to be a great success. It preserves the element of public choice and ensures that the costs are borne by those who benefit. The new card was introduced as an additional facility for the benefit of travellers at no additional cost to the ratepayers and taxpayers, which was unlike the proposal that the GLC was considering.

A number of hon. Members have made other claims about fares. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) did not agree with the figures that I gave in response to his intervention. Those figures were correct. The percentage contributed by the ratepayers through the GLC grants to LRT was 75 per cent. out of a total of £340 million. In the next year, 1985-86, London ratepayers will contribute 65·6 per cent. out of a total of £323 million. When the hon. Gentleman reads the record he will see why and how my earlier figures were correct.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West commented on short hops on buses being more expensive than the 9 per cent. overall increase. Where there is fare staging in 5p and 10 stages, obviously some increases will be greater than the specific 9 per cent. That is why I have always said an average of 9 per cent. Some will increase by more than others, some will remain steady, while some will increase by less than the average. The Government have asked LRT—and I am confident that it can maintain this—to keep peak fares broadly in line with prices generally and with fares on British Rail's London services. It shows every sign of doing that and giving the passenger a good return.

The demand for bus services is expected to decline, not because of the short-term effect of the fares increase but because of the long-term changes in the market. There are shifts in car ownership and population. Wherever a service seeks to meet the demands on the ground there will be changes.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West asked about specific bus changes. A maximum 2 per cent. in service levels for 1985-86 will reflect the decline in demand but the encouragement for new types of services and the bidding for provision of services under the London Regional Transport Act is encouraging. We shall see total public transport mileage by road increase provided that demand is stimulated by flexibility and the development of new routes as well as new kinds of services.

Measures to improve service reliability are important. That means that we must get rid of the lost mileage and LRT says that it can reduce lost mileage from 5·1 to 4·8 per cent. Therefore, there will be an improvement in the average waiting times, which is much wanted. The hon. Gentleman also compared the three-year plan and LRT's annual business plan. The provision of information, both through the annual plan and the other methods, is plentiful. In addition, plenty of information is available through the London regional passenger committee.

We have sought, in presenting the levy to the House, to be fair to ratepayers in London because it represents good value for money and LRT's management is now on course to giving passengers and ratepayers better value in the future. That is in sharp contrast to what has occurred. The GLC's policies would have meant presenting London ratepayers with a bill for £245 million for revenue support alone in 1987-88 before any grant for capital had been allowed for.

I know that hon. Members are concerned about the interests of those who use LRT's services and those who help to finance them. We need to see a balance between those who are paying the fares and those who are paying the rates and taxes. I commend the draft order to the House.

Resolved,

PETITION

Human Embryos

1.37 am

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I beg leave to present, on behalf of nearly 1,500 residents of my constituency and neighbouring areas, a petition for the protection of the human embryo. It was presented to me recently at one of my advice centres by a large number of the people whose names are appended to it. It is signed by many of my constituents, including many people associated with local churches and with hospitals, including Guy's hospital, and many personal friends of mine.

The petitioners affirm their belief that the newly fertilised human embryo is a real, living, individual human being. They oppose all practices that discriminate against the embryo and violate his or her human dignity and right to life.

I know that this petition is one of many, and that all the petitioners are looking forward to the debate on the subject that will take place at the end of the week. Therefore, the petition is presented at an especially opportune time.

The petition ends:

Wherefore Your Petitioners Pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment . . . And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

International Fraud

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

1.39 am

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): The major international commercial and maritime frauds of the 1970s and 1980s have shown up the alarming deficiencies in the criminal codes of the countries involved. The codes were drawn up before the explosion in modern technology, especially in communications, and have proved to be woefully inadequate in bringing offenders to trial and ensuring that justice is done and seen to be done.

There is no doubt that international marine fraud has been carried out worldwide, the primary victims being less sophisticated Third world countries. It is now reaching epidemic proportions. A few years ago, Lloyd's estimated that marine frauds cost it £100 million a year. Figures released by the International Maritime Bureau this week show that the maritime nations have been defrauded of $13 billion a year—more than the cost of Trident, about which there is so much hullabaloo and the cost of which is spread over 20 years.

It has been asserted that the major reason for maritime fraud being the nearly perfect crime is its international nature. I should like to quote Mr. Eric Ellen, the chief executive of the International Maritime Bureau who has said:

"The diversity in today's fraud affects virtually all parties to an international trade transaction, with the involvement of anything between four and ten countries, thus hampering investigation, extradition and prosecution of offenders."

Maritime fraud takes many forms. There is documentary fraud, involving payments made on forged documents, charter party fraud, in which the fraudster disappears with freight, simple deviation of a ship to sell a cargo in a remote port and fraudulent insurance claims. International non-marine fraud is just as devious, crossing international frontiers and going through many bank accounts, often aided by new technology which makes the task of detection, let alone prosecution, more difficult.

It has become blindingly obvious to me that there are extreme deficiencies in international codes for bringing the perpetrators of these frauds to trial, either through inherent limitations on national police and prosecution forces or by legal immunities nationally or internationally. Fortunately, the world has woken up to the epidemic proportions of the difficulties. In February last year, the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development convened a conference in Geneva to get to grips with the problem. After a few initial difficulties, there was an unusually harmonious meeting. The agreed final resolution called for action on a national, international and international organisation basis. Although the international organisations are taking positive steps to get to grips with the problem, I should like to concentrate on the contribution that Governments can make on the national and international front.

The first part of the UNCTAD resolution called on national Governments to tighten their legislation to ensure that effective measures are available to prevent maritime fraud, to investigate such fraudulent acts and to prosecute persons who commit such fraud. In that regard, I have three suggestions. First, the Home Office should look [illegible] greater national co-ordination of regional police forces. If a major maritime fraud is unearthed in a remote port, the regional police force investigates. Without any disrespect to the regional police force, there is often too little local expertise in investigation of major frauds. There is no central co-ordination such as there is in anti-drug-running organisations. Serious consideration should be given to establishing a federal agency to fight crimes of this type.

Secondly, there are deficiencies in our prosecuting policy. Although not officially admitted, it seems to be the policy of the Director of Public Prosecutions not to bring actions against criminals engaged in fraud when they are foreign nationals and when the victims are also foreign nationals. It was reported in the press only recently that German nationals in the United Kingdom are soliciting investors in Germany, then defrauding them of their money when they invest it over here and that the DPP is not prosecuting those fraudsters, because Germans are fleecing Germans. It seems that the only steps that the police are prepared to take are those necessary to hold them for extradition purposes. With Germany, that is a possibility, but with Spain and many other countries with which we have no extradition treaties, that is impossible.

The matter boils down to a simple question, which is whether we are prepared to prosecute other people's criminals. There is one overwhelming reason why we should. The City of London is the financial service centre of the world. With the decline of our manufacturing industry, the contribution it makes to the economy in its invisible exports and earnings is now significant. I do not blame the DPP for his present attitude, because he does not have the money to investigate crimes committed overseas, as the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the United States has. However, the Government should consider using some of their mammoth earnings from the City to step up policing, in a serious attempt to eradicate from these shores those who see the United Kingdom as a haven from prosecution, whatever their nationality. I am sad to say that in the recent White Paper on investor protection the difficulty of international operations and protecting overseas investors was ignored.

There is a substantial lacuna in our law of jurisdiction. In many cases the DPP, even if he wanted to commence a prosecution and could prosecute an offender in the United Kingdom, could not bring a prosecution because of the location. If the Minister and I were to conspire to commit a crime in the United Kingdom we would be prosecuted whether we committed it or not. However, if we conspired to sink an over-insured vessel outside territorial waters and to claim against Spanish underwriters, it would not be a crime. As we do not have an extradition treaty with Spain, the Spanish authorities cannot extradite us to Spain.

In the past, jurisdiction laws have been found to be inadequate. As a result of certain conventions, universal jurisdiction is now claimed for crimes against international order, such as terrorism. Similar claims have been made in respect of specific crimes such as drug trafficking. In the circumstances I hope that the Minister will refer that point to the Law Commission for review. After all, to quote the words of a leading judge:

"It would be of no benefit to this country if it became a sanctuary for conspirators provided only that they concluded their unlawful plots abroad."

The second part of the UNCTAD resolution calls for [illegible] at intergovernmental level to examine in depth the various proposals put forward before and during the UNCTAD meeting, which included the possibilities for international co-operation in the investigation of fraud and subsequent legal action. If any progress is to be made at that level, the only satisfactory solution would be an international convention on maritime fraud and a parallel international convention on jurisdiction and extradition.

The United Kingdom does not have a good reputation for extradition. The difficulties and frustrations that some foreign states experience when they request surrender of a fugitive from the United Kingdom is exemplified in the case of Spain, which recently tore up a treaty entered into in 1977. Substantial improvements have been made in the extradition climate with the 1984 House of Lords decision in the Government of Denmark v. Neilson, and the Government of the United States v. McCaffery.

Despite those recent decisions, our reputation for extradition is so bad that it is the firm opinion of many leading authorities on extradition that we should sign the European convention on extradition. We stand apart with only Malta, as one of the two countries that have failed to sign and ratify it.

The United Kingdom's reluctance to sign and ratify the convention is due to the requirement of a requesting state that it does no more than submit to the requested state a statement of the offences commited, their legal descriptions, and a description of the person claimed. Englis?. extradition law has always required that a requesting state adduces evidence in support of its request of a standard that would warrant committal for trial of an accused, if his offence had been committed in the United Kingdom.

That is a commendable attitude and is in line with that of many states that are reluctant to surrender their own nationals without proper evidence and which have been able to sign the European convention. On signing the convention they take advantage of article 26 by making a reservation that the state requesting the surrender of a fugitive must submit sufficient evidence to establish a prima facie case. Countries such as Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Israel have made such a reservation and their municipal law retains the prima facie case requirement. I understand that a Green Paper on extradition will shortly be published, and I hope that that point will be recognised in the paper and that Britain will be able to sign and ratify the convention. However, signature of the European convention must only be an interim measure. We should work with UNCTAD towards a convention on jurisdiction and extradition for maritime fraud.

It is clear from what I have said that many problems exist and that the current laws on jurisdiction and extradition are inadequate to deal with international maritime fraud. Consideration should be given to linking the extradition obligations to any expanded jurisdiction capabilities so that a state must either prosecute an offender in its custody or extradite him to the requesting state. With such an alternative obligation, the risk of offenders finding refuge from prosecution for lack of jurisdiction, and extradition because of being a national of the state of custody, would be eliminated.

Although at first sight such a suggestion for an international convention on maritime fraud may appear extraordinary, clear precedents can be found in existing conventions designed to cover specific acts. For example, the spate of aeroplane hijacking in the 1960s resulted in the convention for the suppression of unlawful seizure of aircraft in 1970. Some may submit that if a convention on jurisdiction and extradition for maritime fraud is justified, it cannot be developed in sufficient time to provide relief. In this respect, I draw the attention of the House to the hijacking convention, on which work began in 1969. The diplomatic conference for its adoption took place in 1970, and it came into force in October 1971.

There are many other proposals for combating maritime fraud which an international convention might embrace. The international nature of the problem must be recognised and the national police forces must work together. In this sense, the nations of the world must put together an international co-ordinating organisation. Agencies such as Interpol, while doing an excellent job, are little more than communications centres. We need an international co-ordinating centre which acts as a fast communications base, an international information exchange, an international register of shipowners and ship movements, and an organisation that will work with national groups towards the elimination of international maritime fraud.

Tonight I have only touched on the tip of the iceberg of this massive subject. The points that I have raised require action from the Lord Chancellor's Department on jurisdiction, from the Department of Trade and Industry on investor protection, from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on extradition, and last, but certainly not least, from the Home Office on policing. I hope that they will all appreciate that we are fighting a worldwide problem that needs a worldwide organisation to cope with it. The United Nations Conference for Trade and Development deserves a response to its proposals, and I hope that at least the Departments can get together to discuss them.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): Notwithstanding the late hour, I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) for raising in such a cogent way what is plainly an important subject. Although he represents—unless my geography has wholly deserted me — a landlocked constituency, he has properly drawn our attention to problems on the high seas. Those who read his remarks will be as troubled as he is by some of the points that he made. As I have no doubt his constituents are aware, my hon. Friend is an experienced maritime lawyer, and we have good reason to be grateful to him for bringing his expertise not just to his speech but to the valuable study of maritime fraud that has been carried out under the aegis of the Society of Conservative Lawyers and under my hon. Friend's chairmanship.

My hon. Friend clearly demonstrated many of the problems and said that frauds take various forms, ranging from the purely documentary to the extreme case of scuttling a ship at sea. The illegal act may be the forging of a bill of lading, when the intending buyer of goods discovers that he has purchased a non-existent cargo. Alternatively, the cargo may simply be stolen. I understand that a familiar device is that a ship, instead of going to its destination port, is diverted and the cargo sold at another port. The ship's name is then changed, and it thus becomes untraceable. In some extreme cases, the ships involved in deviation frauds may be reported as sunk, and a further fraud is committed by making a claim on the insurance for the ship and its cargo.

Hon. Members will recall the notorious Salem incident, which was perhaps the most blatant example of that practice. The ship was chartered to carry crude oil from Kuwait to Genoa on behalf of an Italian trading company which sold the entire shipment to Shell International in mid-voyage. Instead of proceeding to the Mediterranean, the cargo was sold in South Africa and was replaced by sea water to give the impression that the ship was laden. The Salem was then sunk by the crew off the coast of Senegal. It does not take much imagination to see that there is in such criminal activities the potential for very large profits indeed. Certainly when one gets into the position of scuttling a ship and claiming its full insurance value one is dealing with very large sums indeed.

Even recognising that, it still comes as something of a shock to hear, as my hon. Friend rightly reminded the House, that the International Maritime Bureau, a very responsible body, points out that known losses perhaps amounted to as much as £12 billion last year. That is a truly staggering figure. British interests are very much at risk, because particularly in the insurance industry, British interests have been among the worst victims. However, a more insidious factor that may have grave financial consequences is confidence. It has been alleged that a number of these frauds have been engineered partly through the mechanisms of the London markets. Even though in most cases British subjects are not criminally involved, we must be aware of the risk of damage to the City's international reputation.

My hon. Friend referred in particular to the contribution of UNCTAD. Maritime fraud does of course affect trade and we therefore very much welcome the interest that UNCTAD has shown in combating this problem. Its paper analysed the various forms of maritime fraud and the various means of combating it. Its paper formed the basis of a useful discussion by an intergovernmental group which unanimously agreed a number of resolutions calling on Governments and commercial interests to co-operate with each other, exchange information and review laws and law enforcement procedures. We already liaise with the industry on this problem, but the Government will do all in their power to help to provide the information that will be required for the various studies that are being undertaken by UNCTAD.

However, as the resolutions recognise, self-regulation by the commercial interests concerned must play an important and perhaps crucial role in combating fraud. I know that the industry takes this problem seriously and has done a lot of work to try to minimise maritime fraud. The setting up of the International Maritime Bureau is a case in point. I know that the bureau has already played a valuable role—I believe my hon. Friend is of the same opinion—in combating maritime fraud. I am sure it is only when all the parties concerned can get together to consider this problem that maritime fraud will be turned back. It is the provision of a forum in which such parties can meet that has been the most useful role performed by UNCTAD.

As I have said, I have looked with interest at the report of the sub-committee of the Society of Conservative Lawyers which was chaired by my hon. Friend. I have looked with particular interest at those sections directly involving Home Office responsibilities. I see that in its second proposal the sub-committee suggests that the Law Commission should review whether conspiracy in this country to commit a crime overseas should become a criminal offence in this country. In fact, the Law Commission is engaged at the moment on an extensive review of the law relating to conspiracy to defraud and will present its findings in due course. I hope that the commission will take careful note of what my hon. Friend has said and of the report of his committee before giving us the benefit of its conclusions.

On the general question of conspiracy to commit a crime overseas, and without wanting to pre-empt the Law Commission's findings in any way, I wish to make two points. First, there are considerable evidential difficulties involved in detecting any conspiracy, because clever plots are not hatched in meticulously kept records. Secondly, the law already provides that a conspiracy is indictable in this country when conspirators in England agree to do an unlawful act in England with intent to defraud persons abroad. To that extent, there is not a hiatus in the law. At least, that is my understanding of the case of Regina v. Hornett in 1975, although I appreciate that there is still some difference of view between the committee and Hornett on the ambit of the law and that the committee would wish the law to go further.

I want to take up three other points that were raised by my hon. Friend. Perhaps I should properly begin with police action. It may help if I set out briefly the arrangements for the investigation of fraud by the police and the liaison which exists to assist them. Often there is an interest in the United Kingdom in the investigation of a suspected maritime fraud because of the insurance aspect. Both commissioners of police for the City of London and the metropolis take most seriously indeed their personal responsibility to investigate fraud affecting London's financial institutions. There exists in London a joint fraud squad for the two forces, under the command of a metropolitan police commander. This commercial fraud department has a strength of 204 officers, of whom the 56 City police officers represent nearly half the City police criminal investigation department. This reflects the importance attached in the City to the investigation of fraud where fraud squad officers can be expected to serve in the squad for a seven to eight year period and thus maximise the experience they gain.

One of the difficulties in the successful investigation of fraud—this does not apply just to maritime fraud—is the often complicated nature of the offences. This results in long and resource-consuming investigations, with cases often taking years to come to trial. The House will see the disadvantage of this not only in terms of deterrence but in the difficulties of presenting a successful prosecution case if the evidence is stale and witnesses' recollections are not what they would have been earlier.

To counter this, fraud investigation groups were set up in 1981 on an ad hoc basis in London only, because the majority of commercial frauds occur in the capital. As one of the measures intended to combat commercial fraud, fraud investigation groups were put on a permanent basis and extended to cover the whole of England and Wales with effect from the beginning of the year.

The essential characteristics of fraud investigation groups are simple. Based in the department of the Director of Public Prosecutions, fraud investigation groups have available senior officials from that department, together with those from the Department of Trade and Industry who are concerned with the investigation of offences under companies legislation. They work in co-operation with the police who will be made available as necessary by their chief officer. Their independence from the main body of FIG provides an operational advantage to the police, in that they retain their full powers as officers under the Crown.

By means of early and continuing liaison between the DPP, DTI and police interests, FIG enables an investigation to be concentrated on the direction which appears most likely to lead to evidence which will meet the needs of the court instead of, as often happened before, each body continuing parallel but separate investigations. With FIG, lines of investigation which are considered to be less likely to succeed are, therefore, better able to be identified at an early stage, dismissed and the investigation concentrated on those lines which appear most likely to produce a manageable and speedily resolved case.

Notwithstanding this development, I think that my hon. Friend may be underestimating the capability of individual forces to respond to maritime frauds reported to them. Our understanding from our contacts with forces around the country is that reports of maritime fraud involving ships physically at United Kingdom ports are fortunately very few: the emphasis is rather on City institutions where insurance is arranged or involving the presentation of false bills of lading. As I have already said the fraud department has a considerable wealth of experience in dealing with such cases, but even if a fraud occurs in a provincial force area we have to recognise that our police forces today are sizeable organisations, most of which have their own fraud squad and who are well aware that it is always open to them to consult the DPP through that office's FIG and fraud divisions for early advice and assistance in the investigation of fraud.

The internationalism of all fraud and particularly of maritime fraud is an acknowledged feature and close liaison on co-operation internationally between police forces is crucial. The International Maritime Bureau and the Commonwealth Secretariat Fraud Unit are two bodies which have a particular interest in such liaison. I am sure that these are valuable initiatives and the self-help which the shipping trade can provide is reflected in the support and success of the International Maritime Bureau; equally the Commonwealth Secretariat Unit can, by virtue of its Commonwealth-wide remit, give assistance through a wide range of countries.

I should also mention the role of Interpol, which has a valuable contribution to make, not only because its membership covers 140 countries throughout the world, but its communication links through its headquarters in Paris to all member countries and the tradition of police to police co-operation on criminal investigation matters which it has over the years built up give the potential for virtually world-wide assistance. Interpol additionally holds regular conferences and working seminars where trends in fraud and the means whereby police action can be improved are discussed and disseminated to all member countries.

My hon. Friend raised important questions of prosecution and enforcement. On prosecution policy, allegations have been made about the reluctance of the Director of Public Prosecutions to bring actions against criminals in this country if the person engaged in fraud is a foreign national and his victims are also foreign nationals. This means that the offender may escape any risk of prosecution in the country where his victims live, because that country may not have any jurisdiction to deal with crimes committed in this country. The DPP's policy is a matter for him and not for me, but such criticisms do not take full account of the extreme practical and legal difficulties encountered in international crime.

To prosecute in such cases, it is usually necessary to obtain statements from foreign nationals or foreign banks. There is no form of international subpoena by which witnesses may be required to travel to this country to give evidence and it is an extremely difficult task to secure the attendance as a witness in this country of a foreign banker. When there is no loser in this country, it is difficult to secure the evidence here. This does not mean that the DPP is reluctant to act, but it does mean that the difficulties must not be underestimated and the presence of a clear public interest justification for prosecution does not make the director's task any easier.

My hon. Friend rightly spent a great deal of time on the subject of extradition, which is causing us considerable interest at the moment. As he said, international crime has to be tackled internationally, and extradition is an important weapon. It is true that our older extradition treaties are framed in terms that implicitly acknowledge only offences that are committed within the territorial boundaries of countries that are party to the agreements. Our more recent treaties, however, are framed in terms of the respective jurisdiction of the judicial authorities of the parties. As I have endeavoured to explain, the concept of extraterritorial jurisdiction causes difficulties in our law, but our general lack of such jurisdiction does not inevitably make for an enforcement loophole, because in this country we have no objection to extraditing our own nationals, provided that the normal extradition arrangements are met. For the most part, our extradition arrangements are based on bilateral treaties that set out in detail the conditions governing surrender to and from the United Kingdom. At present, there are 43 bilateral treaties in force.

My hon. Friend has pointed out a number of difficulties about our extradition arrangements. He is not alone in his criticisms. He knows that we are taking them seriously, and that is why we shall be publishing a Green Paper shortly. He will be pleased when he sees it, because it canvasses fully and invites opinions, including opinions from himself, and some of the people with whom he has been collaborating on this venture, and he will let us know his views on some of the points at issue.

Plainly, it all centres around the prima facie requirement. It is interesting that my hon. Friend thinks, not that this requirement should be dropped but that we should adopt an alternative way by means of a derogation to sign the European convention. The arrangements reflected in such treaties must be put into effect by application of our law, and the principal statute is the Extradition Act 1870. One of its requirements is that the requesting state has to produce evidence of a standard that would justify the committal for trial of the accused if the alleged crime had been committed in England. This is the centrepiece of the 1870 Act, but its continuation on the statute book causes difficulties in relation to countries such as Spain, which abrogated its treaty with us a few years ago because of frustration at not being able to get extradition of criminals wanted from Spain.

It was said that our standards of proof are too high when not only the nature of the charge is based on Spanish law but the whole means of preparing a case for trial is quite different from our own. That matter will have to be looked at carefully, not only in the Green Paper but in consideration of representations that will be made as a result of it.

My hon. Friend made an important point about the European convention that he said we should ratify. As he pointed out, we have to consider whether the prima facie requirement is an obstacle to ratification. I know that my hon. Friend considers that ratification would enhance the international community's ability to deal with serious international fraud by bringing London—an important centre for this type of fraud — within the uniform arrangements of a multilateral treaty. My hon. Friend explained his case well, and we shall want to examine that aspect. Although we have not signed the convention, we have taken an active part in its negotiation. The main obstacle to our accession has been the difficulty of reconciling our criminal law procedures with those of continental countries. To draw closer to foreign practice would entail some fundamental changes in our law. I can offer my hon. Friend the encouragement that a forthcoming Green Paper will discuss the scope for and implications of such changes.

I could say a good deal more. I regret that I have not been able to delve as fully as I would wish into some of my hon. Friend's interesting points. This has been a worthwhile debate, and I hope that some of the points will be taken up in due course, especially those in relation to extradition which will be the subject of intense public debate in the months ahead.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nine minutes past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Public Expenditure

1. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the implications for Scottish education of the White Paper on public expenditure.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Younger): Further information on the implications for Scottish education of the White Paper on public expenditure will be published shortly in the "Scottish Commentary".

Mr. Bruce: Does the Secretary of State acknowledge that the £61 million cut in the Scottish education budget is a severe blow to education in Scotland? Does he further acknowledge that suggestions about the teachers' pay dispute are not worth a docken, unless he is prepared to make money available to meet any sensible settlement? Will he admit to the House that the White Paper simply makes a wrong decision which should be reversed?

Mr. Younger: I am sorry, but the hon. Gentleman is wrong on both counts. The reduction in education expenditure is smaller than the reduction in the number of pupils. Therefore, the sum provided for education in Scotland is more in real terms, per pupil, than ever before. I have spent a great deal of time and energy in recent weeks trying to get across to everybody—I have obviously failed, even with the hon. Gentleman—that if the Scottish Joint Negotiating Committee suggests a good package of pay and conditions for teachers I am prepared to see whether I can find some money within my budget to deal with it. If that was not clear to the hon. Gentleman, I hope it is clear now.

Mr. Henderson: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that although falling pupil numbers has resulted in more money per pupil being spent than before, there has been no comparable drop in the number of people in non-teaching posts dealing with the administration of education? Should not that aspect be examined further?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. His views are backed by the figures. At constant prices, expenditure per pupil in real terms in 1979-80 was £1,042, and in 1983-84 £1,151.

Mr. Strang: Does the Secretary of State recognise that a substantial amount of new money will have to be found if the current industrial crisis in our schools is to be resolved? Will he stop pretending that the SJNC proposal has the support of the management side and is being considered by the unions? Will he bring forward a new initiative to resolve the dispute?

Mr. Younger: The views of all parties are clear. The teachers have made it clear that they would prefer an independent review of their pay. The management side has made it equally clear that, although it would prefer an independent review of pay and conditions, it is prepared to co-operate in discussing pay and conditions. I have made a clear offer. If a proper package of pay and conditions is put forward, I shall try to find some means of implementing it. That is a fair way out of a nasty situation.

Mr. Robert Hughes: If everything is so rosy in the education system, can the right hon. Gentleman explain why the teacher-pupil ratio has gone up? Will he define what he means by a "proper package"?

Mr. Younger: I cannot explain why the pupil-teacher ratio has gone up, because it has not. It is at its best level ever. By that I mean that we have the lowest number of pupils per teacher ever. That is a fact which no amount of head shaking will shake away.

Mr. Dewar: As the Secretary of State will guess, we have all been reading with interest the speculation in the Scottish press this morning about a new initiative. I have now had the opportunity to see the letter from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), to my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), which seems to offer a lot less than the press speculation. It is important that we should know exactly what the Secretary of State has in mind. If the Scottish Joint Negotiating Committee decides to set up an independent review body to look at pay and conditions, will he approve of such a move? Does he accept that it should be properly independent and able, as Houghton did, to study comparable salary levels in the groupings that it thinks relevant? Will the Secretary of State undertake that if that exercise is carried out he will accept the findings?

Mr. Younger: As I think the letter to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) makes clear, none of that is for me. I was asked whether the SJNC could, if it wished, undertake an independent review of pay and conditions. The answer is that it has the right to carry out its functions in any way that it thinks fit. I have said that any package of proposals that comes to me must come from the SJNC. If it does, I shall see whether I can find a way to meet it.

Economic Situation

2. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will next meet the Scottish Confederation of British Industry to discuss the economic situation.

Mr. Younger: I receive regular reports from the Scottish Confederation of British Industry on a range of economic matters. I have no formal plans at present to meet the Scottish CBI to discuss the economic situation.

Mr. Hamilton: When the right hon. Gentleman next meets the CBI, will he discuss with it his intentions about the stagnation of the construction industry, bearing in mind that thousands of craftsmen are at present unemployed? Will he further tell the CBI how he stands in relation to the proposed closure of the skillcentres and annexes which are vital for training people for the future?

Mr. Younger: On the first point, I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's anxiety about unemployment in the construction industry. I have managed to keep capital spending in the Scottish Office budget steady over the past five years. In fact, it is still slightly up in real terms on what it was in 1979-80. I accept that that is helpful, and I shall try to keep it that way if I can. Within the next week or two the Government will be announcing their reaction to the MSC's proposals for the closure of some skillcentres in Scotland. As I understand the proposals, skill training in Scotland will be going up, not down, whether or not the skillcentres are closed.

Mr. Malone: My right hon. Friend will have noticed representations from the CBI about investment in the infrastructure. Can he confirm that those proposals have one difference compared with any put forward by the Opposition—namely, that they imply that there must be savings in other sectors before that investment can take place?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is right. That has been a constant theme of discussions that I have had with various bodies, including local authorities, over the past five years. It would be desirable to keep up capital spending, but to reduce current spending because it does not have the same good effect on the economy. I agree with my hon. Friend's remarks.

Mr. Maclennan: By the time that he next meets the CBI, will the Secretary of State be able to say that when he has completed his period as the longest serving Secretary of State for Scotland he will have succeeded in bringing down unemployment?

Mr. Younger: I am not sure whether that is a question or a statement. Unemployment has been and remains the main problem facing our economy. The efforts that the Government have made to counter the economic problems that have caused it have led in recent months to an increase in the number of people in employment in Scotland, and that is welcome.

Limited List Prescribing

3. Mr. Ewing asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement following his meeting with the British Medical Association, Scotland, to discuss the restricted list of medicines that will be available for prescription on the National Health Service.

10. Mr. Hugh Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of organisations in Scotland which have made representations on the proposals for limited list prescribing; how many he has met; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): I have met representatives of the Scottish Council of the British Medical Association and the Pharmaceutical General Council (Scotland). In addition, by the end of the consultation period we had received representations from some 60 organisations, and I shall list those in the Official Report. Our proposals cover only some 10 per cent. of the drugs bill. The drugs that will remain available for prescription on the NHS will be sufficient to meet all clinical needs in the areas in question.

Mr. Ewing: How does the Minister know that the drugs that will remain available on the restricted list will be sufficient to meet the needs of NHS patients? How many of the 60 representations that he has received were in favour of his proposals, and how many were against? Does he understand the anxiety that is now being expressed throughout the medical profession and by patients in Scotland about the Government's proposals? Will he give an assurance that when the final list is published it will be more extensive than the rather restricted list with which we originally started?

Mr. MacKay: We received a considerable range of representations, and most conceded the need for and our ability to make savings on the drugs bill. Many were in favour of a limited list, but representations were made on drugs that should be on that list. As the hon. Gentleman knows, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has a committee of experts advising him on the list. When the House hears his statement on the final list, it will appreciate that the clinical needs of patients have been met.

Mr. Brown: Everyone in the House will agree with the need to keep down costs of prescriptions in the Health Service and to get value for money, so that is just a cliché. If the Government say that essential drugs will be made available under the NHS, who will decide—the general practitioner or somebody in St. Andrew's House?

Mr. MacKay: If the hon. Gentleman looks at the people whom my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has as his advisers, he will see that we are taking the advice of some very senior medical people. It is not just civil servants in St. Andrew's House or the Elephant and Castle who are advising my right hon. Friend. We are considering one of the suggestions that has come to us. If a doctor decides, for clinical reasons, to prescribe a drug that is on the banned list, we are considering ways in which that might be done. However, I advise the hon. Gentleman to await my right hon. Friend's announcement.

Mrs. McCurley: Will my hon. Friend utterly condemn the scare tactics of the BMA over the limited list, but bear in mind some of its manifestly sound judgments on the limited list in relation to chronic arthritic and elderly patients?

Mr. MacKay: My hon. Friend has made a valid point. I have read with great interest the sensible suggestions that have been made by doctors, even doctors who are implacably opposed to the scheme. However, many doctors have been absolutely unfair to their elderly patients in scaring them into thinking that they will not get suitable drugs after 1 April. To make matters worse, some doctors have made that suggestion about drugs that are not even in the therapeutic groups under consideration.

Sir Hector Monro: Will my hon. Friend clear up the misunderstanding between prescribing and dispensing doctors, bearing in mind that dispensing practitioners have a particular role to fill in rural Scotland, where chemists' shops are not readily available?

Mr. MacKay: I think that my hon. Friend is referring to a misunderstanding of a reply by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health the other day, when he said that prescribing general medical practitioners would not be permitted to sell drugs to their National Health Service patients. We are considering the representations that have been made to us on behalf of dispensing doctors in Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom on whether they should be able to sell to their patients drugs that are on the banned list.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the Under-Secretary of State aware of the overwhelming opposition to the whole scheme on the ground that it undermines one of the basic principles of the NHS? Will he now reply to the point raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) and turn his mind to the problem of rural doctors who not only prescribe but dispense drugs? How can it be right that they may be required to charge patients for certain drugs?

Mr. MacKay: I thought that I had already answered that point, but obviously the hon. Gentleman was not listening, as usual. I said that we were considering the matter of dispensing doctors, and that will be part of the statement that will be made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. Many hospitals in Scotland already operate a limited list over the whole range of drugs.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Is my hon. Friend aware that in Stirling the local health council, using funds provided by his Department, is putting leaflets through letter boxes and organising public meetings telling elderly people that they will not be able to get their drugs because they will have to pay for them in future, when the health council does not even know what the list will contain and when the position has been clearly explained? Will my hon. Friend look into the matter and take it up with the health council, which is supposed to be there to serve the community, not to indulge in political propaganda?

Mr. MacKay: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. It is irresponsible of the health council to do that sort of thing. We have made it clear all along that the drugs that will remain prescribable under the NHS will meet all the clinical needs of patients.

Mr. Johnston: Will the Minister explain to me and the many doctors and constituents who have written to me — not necessarily those who are opposed to generic prescribing — why, in drawing up the original list, he apparently took no medical advice? Was this not both insensitive and possibly arrogant?

Mr. MacKay: The process of consultation lasted from the middle of November to the end of January. As I have explained, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services set up a committee of very experienced medical people. I have been taking the advice of my medical officials, and we have been taking into consideration the representations of doctors. I thought that that was the proper way to consult.

Mr. Fairbairn: Will my hon. Friend note the hyprocisy of the Opposition, who are anxious that the drug companies should not cream off huge profits and that doctors should dispense properly for their patients?

Mr. MacKay: The Opposition's hyprocisy extends even further than that. As I understand it, they approve of generic prescribing, which is opposed by the drugs industry and the BMA.

Mr. O' Neill: Is the Minister aware that the Greenfield report, which inspired the so-called banned list, to use the hon. Gentleman's expression, has been around for some considerable time? The Government's ham-fisted approach caused an inadequate list to be produced in the first instance, and they are now having to scurry back and forth between doctors and pharmaceutical companies to secure their agreement before the list can be implemented. That is the scandal and that is what is causing great anxiety among our constituents.

Mr. MacKay: When the hon. Gentleman sees the final list he will recognise — I have said this three or four times — that it will meet clinical needs. The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point about the Greenfield report. We have been discussing ways to reduce the drugs bill for some time. The Government decided that it was time to stop the discussions and to make concrete suggestions.

Mr. McQuarrie: I wish to press my hon. Friend on his meeting with the BMA. Did he discuss with the BMA the serious situation that will arise in rural areas where general practitioners prescribe and dispense? Will he bear in mind that those doctors should be entitled to consider brand names rather than to implement the Government's proposals for generic medicines?

Mr. Speaker: Briefly.

Mr. McQuarrie: Will my hon. Friend ensure that our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services bears in mind the problems that will be faced in rural areas of Scotland, which are inhabited mainly by the elderly?

Mr. MacKay: I think that I have already replied to my hon. Friend's question in answer to a previous question. I can confirm that I discussed the matter with the BMA. A fair number of doctors have made their position clear to me in the course of making their representations. The role of dispensing doctors is one of the matters that is now under consideration.

Dr. M. S. Miller: The Minister should not get too excited about trying to defend the indefensible. Does he realise that this is another step on the slippery slope down which the Government are leading the Health Service? Will he give a guarantee that the elderly and the poorer people who will be affected by the list which he has published will not suffer when the final list is put forward by the Government?

Mr. MacKay: I have already given that guarantee, and I am happy to give it again. We are taking the best advice possible to ensure that the list as it emerges, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services makes his statement, will be sufficient to meet all the clinical needs of patients.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I shall raise my point of order at the end of Question time.

Later——

Mr. Hamilton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On earlier occasions you have explained to me how you group oral questions for the purpose of calling hon. Members to ask supplementary questions. I am sure that you will have noticed that today there were five questions—all asked by Opposition Members — on the proposals of the Government in relation to prescription charges, mine being one of them. The other four hon. Members were called to ask their supplementary questions; you called at least four hon. Members from the Government Benches, none of whom had a question down on the subject; and you called two hon. Members from the Opposition Benches to ask supplementary questions, although neither of them had a question down on the subject. I was the only one in that list who was not called. [HON. MEMBERS: "Shame."] I want to know whether this is a new principle of victimisation of poor souls such as me.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I assure the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) absolutely that there was no question of victimisation. I had regard to the fact that I called him on exactly the same question yesterday, when questions were down to the Secretary of State for Social Services, and I thought it only fair to give other hon. Members a chance today.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Later——

Mr. Hamilton: Further to your original ruling, Mr. Speaker. You said that you did not call me because I had asked a question on this matter yesterday, presumably the Secretary of State for Social Services. You will understand, Mr. Speaker, that the Health Service in Scotland is separate from the Health Service in England. It is well known that, at the moment, the Scottish Minister is in violent conflict on this very matter with the Secretary of State for Social Services. You should not have presumed, as you did, Mr. Speaker, that the question I asked yesterday was the same question I was going to put to the Scottish Minister today.

Mr. Speaker: I try to be as fair as possible. I hope that when the hon. Member studies the Order Paper tomorrow he will note that, of those hon. Members who tabled questions that were not reached, no fewer than 12 were called today. I am sorry that the hon. Member was not among those hon. Members who were called. If he had risen on another question, I would have tried to get him in.

Job Creation

4. Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many jobs have been created in Scotland in the past 12 months.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): During 1984 nearly 15,000 new jobs were associated with offers of selective financial assistance for projects in Scotland. In net terms there was an overall increase in employees in employment of 14,000 in the year to September 1984.

Mr. Malone: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. Can he confirm that many of those jobs were created in oil-related industries? Is he aware that the Leader of the Opposition has made the clear statement that, if he is put into office, he will implement a policy of controlling oil depletion in the North sea? Does my hon. Friend agree that if that policy were to be implemented it would drive investment from the North sea and jobs from Scotland?

Mr. Stewart: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's point in relation to what the Leader of the Opposition said. I confirm that exploration in the North sea continues at record levels. As my hon. Friend will be aware, last week plans were approved for the development of Shell-Esso's Tern field, which it is estimated will create 3,000 new jobs. I can tell my hon. Friend that I have today authorised the Scottish Development Agency to invest more than £500,000 in a new oil rig repair base at Dales Voe near Lerwick, which will widen the capability of Scottish firms in that area and provide 150 new jobs.

Mr. Kennedy: Is the Minister aware that in the Invergordon to Dingwall travel-to-work area in my constituency, adult male unemployment is at present 25 per cent.? On Monday, this week I visited a distillery in Alness, which is due to close as a result of a decision by the Distillers Company. Incidentally, that effects to an even greater extent the constituency of the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Moray (Mr. Pollock). Will the Minister use the opportunity before the Budget to impress upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer the need to introduce further tax advantages or to reduce the tax burden on the distillery and whisky industry to try to improve the climate in which so many jobs are being lost?

Mr. Stewart: No doubt my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will read the hon. Gentleman's comments. However, I assure the hon. Gentleman of our commitment to the rural areas. We recently announced a new initiative —the programme for rural initiatives and developments —through the Scottish Development Agency. In the areas that serve the oil industry there will be substantial and increasing opportunities for employment if companies can provide competitive services.

Mr. Eadie: Is the Minister aware that when I fought the constituency represented by the Secretary of State for Scotland in 1959, the jobless total in Scotland was 70,000? During that election campaign Lord Stockton chastised the STUC for not coming to see him quickly enough, because he believed that the jobless total was too high. As the jobless total in Scotland is now more than 300,000, what is the message from the Minister's right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the STUC about unemployment in Scotland?

Mr. Stewart: I must tell the hon. Gentleman that unemployment in Scotland doubled under the Labour Government. Unemployment is a difficult problem, and the Government's policies are designed to create a competitive economy to provide real and lasting jobs. My message to the STUC is that it should take fully into account the need for British companies to be competitive if they are to expand and provide new jobs.

Mr. Henderson: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the creation of new jobs. Will he ensure that those concerned with this crucial activity are not discouraged by the self-inflicted wounds created by striking miners, which have had especially disastrous consequences in Fife?

Mr. Stewart: The whole House will be aware of the serious position that has arisen in Fife as a result of the strike. It is important that Scotland does not inflict such wounds on itself. However, there are several encouraging signs, including the improved performance of manufacturing industry. During the first half of 1984 manufacturing output was 5 per cent. above the level a year earlier.

Mr. Dewar: Will the Minister accept that, very sadly, he is sounding more and more like one of his press handouts? Is it not insufferable complacency for the Minister to appear at the Dispatch Box and claim that his Government's policy has been a success? Will he accept that more than 160,000 manufacturing jobs have gone since 1979, that the index of industrial production is about 11 per cent. below what it was in 1979 and that unemployment is at a record level, with 360,000 people in the dole queues? Surely the Minister ought to do a great deal more and look at the reality of the crisis in Scotland —for example, at the appalling potential job losses that are being faced at the BREL works in Springburn?

Mr. Stewart: Nobody seeks to deny that there is a serious unemployment problem, but the Government's policies are designed to create the type of economy that will provide employment in the long term. I am very surprised that in his list of the alleged problems facing the Scottish economy the hon. Gentleman did not mention the miners' strike and the damage that it is doing to the coal industry and to the coalmining communities.

Mr. Steel: Is it not the case that during the last 12 months the number of job losses has exceeded the number of new jobs, as a result of which unemployment in Scotland has increased by 10,000?

Mr. Stewart: The total labour force is rising, as the right hon. Gentleman must be aware. He will also be aware that in the service sector employment increased by 23,000 jobs in the year to September 1984. I am sure he will agree that that is very encouraging.

Natural Woodland

5. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he is taking to safeguard Britain's remaining natural woodland.

8. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next intends meeting representatives of the Forestry Commission to discuss the consultative document, "Broadleaves in Britain".

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission makes a presumption against the clearance of woodland for conversion to agriculture or, in the case of broadleaves, to coniferous woodland.

The commission is considering the responses to its consultative paper "Broadleaves in Britain," and my right hon. Friend hopes to make a statement on broadleaved woodland policy before the summer recess.

Mr. Hardy: Will the Minister accept that the decline in Britain's natural woodlands is now so serious as to deserve urgent consideration and greater attention to management agreements and planning control? While I am reluctant to intervene in Scottish Questions, may I ask the Minister whether, as an alternative, he will soon convene a meeting of farming, forestry and conservation interests so that they can reach agreement on sensible policies upon which British woodland policy can be based?

Mr. MacKay: As the hon. Member perhaps realises, the Forestry Commission is engaged upon discussions with many of the bodies mentioned by him and with other bodies. A seminar is to be held later in the year. Once these consultations are over, the Forestry Commission will come to my right hon. Friend, who will look carefully into these matters.

Mr. Ron Davies: Does the Minister accept that there has to be a consensus between all the parties that are interested in conservation? If that is the case, will he seek a meeting with the Forestry Commission to explain to it that, having met representatives of the landowning community and of the agriculture and timber-producing industries, it would now be proper for it to have discussions with those bodies which represent conservation interests before the seminar to which he has referred is held? Does he accept that it would be quite inappropriate for him merely to present those conservation bodies with a fait accompli?

Mr. MacKay: In addition to all the bodies that are directly interested in timber planting and timber growing, the Forestry Commission, as the forestry authority for Great Britain, is in close contact with the various conservation groups, foremost among which is the Nature Conservancy Council, on this important matter of preserving ancient broadleaved woodlands and attempting to increase the acreage of broadleaved woodland in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Soames: Knowing my hon. Friend's interest in the matter, when he next meets the Forestry Commission may I ask him to ensure that it is aware of the serious river pollution that is occurring as a result of the drainage from newly planted forestry? Will he press the Forestry Commission to continue its researches?

Mr. MacKay: I have a great deal of sympathy with what my hon. Friend says and I shall certainly draw that to the attention of the Forestry Commission.

Mr. Kirkwood: In anticipation of the seminar and statement that the Minister has announced this afternoon, will he give us an assurance that in the interim there will be no clearing of ancient forests for agricultural purposes? In the course of his consideration of the issue, will he review the important practice of the Forestry Commission of selling off prime tracts of forest in Scotland to anonymous owners for undisclosed prices?

Mr. MacKay: The hon. Gentleman will know that, as I said in my original answer, the Forestry Commission looks carefully at any proposal to fell broadleaved woodland either for planting coniferous trees or for agriculturel purposes. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the possibility of tightening up the regulations is being considered by the Forestry Commission in the context of its current review.

International Youth Year

6. Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will have discussions with the representatives of the United Nations Association and the City of Edinburgh district council, co-partners in the project, on funding of the International Youth Year Edinburgh Gathering, 9 to 16 June.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Financial support for the Gathering has been promised from both the Scottish Tourist Board and the Scottish Sports Council. After discussion between my officials and the interested parties it is my view that these are the appropriate channels for assistance.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Will my hon. Friend encourage a substantial level of funding through those and other channels, bearing in mind that during the United Nations International Youth Year the Edinburgh Gathering will be the most significant project not only in Scotland but in Britain?

Mr. Stewart: I accept the role of the Edinburgh Gathering within the general campaign for the International Youth Year. Backed by an imaginative and well-planned publicity campaign it could be of considerable benefit in attracting tourists to Edinburgh and Scotland. In recognising that, the Scottish Tourist Board has promised financial support for the event to the extent that it will contribute up to 25 per cent. of the publicity costs incurred, subject to a maximum of £9,000.

Mr. Buchan: Does the Minister agree that the best help that the Government could give the City of Edinburgh on this project and others such as the Festival would be to call off the ridiculous proposals that they have for cutting grants, thus destroying the ability of local authorities to carry out what their constituents want them to carry out?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman is talking absolute rubbish. The Government support the International Youth Year by grant-aiding the co-ordinating committee in Scotland and the co-ordinating committees in other countries. The Scottish co-ordinating committee, consisting mainly of young people, is doing a good job and the hon. Gentleman would be better off encouraging and praising it rather than making those silly partisan points.

Council House Sales

7. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is satisfied with the progress being made with the sale of council houses in Scotland.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): Yes. Since 1979 over 62,000 tenants have bought their houses. Binding contracts of sale have been concluded in a further 4,000 cases, and there are approximately another 7,000 applications at an earlier point in the pipeline.

Mr. Knox: What percentage of council house stock in Scotland has been sold to sitting tenants? If that figure is still significantly below that in England, what steps is my hon. Friend taking to increase the sale of council houses in Scotland?

Mr. Ancram: The percentage figure now sold is about 4·6 per cent. of the council stock in Scotland, rather larger than the last time my hon. Friend asked me the same question last July, when I told him that it was about 3·6 per cent. There has obviously been an improvement, but I must concede that we are somewhat behind the comparable figures for England, and it is for that reason that I keep trying to persuade councils of the benefits of selling council houses—such as the way in which they can spend their receipts—to encourage them to release council houses as quickly as they can.

Mr. Tom Clarke: If the policy of selling houses with substantial discounts is such a success, will the Minister tell the House why this has not been extended to the private rented sector?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Member has asked that question before, and he will get precisely the same answer. We are dealing in this case with housing that has been provided by public money. I fail to understand the pathological hatred shown by the Opposition towards giving people who are living in council houses the right to own their own homes. We believe that that right is a good one, and we hope that they will exercise it.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend share my disappointment at the low rate of sales that has so far been achieved? Does he agree that, if we can persuade more people in Scotland to own their own homes by buying council houses, we shall improve their quality of life and increase the mobility of labour, which will be a factor in the future prosperity of Scotland?

Mr. Ancram: I agree totally with what my hon. Friend has said. The applications are running at about 1,800 a month. I would like to see this figure increased, and I shall do everything that I can to persuade people of the benefits of buying their homes.

Tourism

9. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is satisfied with the present administrative and financial arrangements for marketing and for developing tourism in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: Yes, Sir. My right hon. Friend has already made it clear that he will give careful consideration to any recommendations that may in due course be made by the Select Committee for Scottish Affairs.

Mr. Kirkwood: May I refer the Minister, in addition to the obviously important evidence that will come from the Select Committee, to the important report that was published by the Fraser of Allander Institute last November on tourism and public policy in Scotland, which said that there was an urgent need for a clear statement of Government policy on tourism, including a need for an urgent degree of co-ordination of art, heritage and tourism, and an equally urgent need for Government activity in the classification of the marketing and development rules of the Scottish Development Board, the Highlands and Islands Development Board and the Scottish Development Agency?

Mr. MacKay: If the hon. Gentleman talks to the tourist industry in Scotland, I think he will find that not all of it agrees with the Fraser of Allander report that he mentioned. I believe that the tourist industry is vitally important for Scotland, and we are convinced that the roles of the Scottish Tourist Board and of the Highlands and Islands Development Board are vital to the future prosperity of the industry. We shall be looking with interest at the findings of the Select Committee on the subject of the interface between these two bodies.

Mr. Maxton: The Minister says that tourism is so important. Why, then, is he insisting that local authorities cut back dramatically on their leisure expenditure, which includes museums, sports facilities and leisure recreation of all types and the arts, which play a vital part in attracting tourists to Scotland and ensuring that Scottish holiday-makers are properly entertained?

Mr. MacKay: There is another side to the coin of local authority expenditure if expenditure and rates are not kept under control. The tourist industry and especially small hotels, boarding houses and the like are damaged by the increase in rates. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman should be congratulating the Government on the considerable amount of money that we have put into the Scottish Tourist Board and the Highlands and Islands Development Board since the last election, almost doubling what was spent in the last year of the Labour Government.

Mr. Fairbairn: May I remind my hon. Friend that tomorrow is St. Valentine's Day? As his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary said, the tourist season will soon start in Scotland. Can the Scottish Development Department erect the signposts in time for the tourist season? If my hon. Friend wants some good advice about how to promote tourism in Scotland, may I suggest that he reads the Scottish Field next month for an excellent article on the subject, which I have written?

Mr. MacKay: We all look forward to the article with bated breath. I am sure that my hon. Friend who has responsibility for home affairs and the environment has heard my hon. and learned Friend's remarks about signposts.

Mr. Craigen: When will the Government wake up to the economic potential of the £1 billion Scottish tourist industry? With regard to the Minister's reference to rates for hotels and boarding houses, has the Scottish Office made any assessment of the impact of revaluation on the tourist industry in Scotland?

Mr. Mackay: We have of course considered the question of revaluation across the board. My right hon. and hon. Friends have both answered questions on this matter. The total rate burden levied by local authorities is important to the tourist industry. While I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of tourism, I think that local authorities have to bear in mind the burden that they put on the local economy.

Highlands and Islands (Land Use)

11. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to ensure that land in the Highlands and Islands is utilised to the advantage of the local economy.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The policies pursued and assistance provided by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland, the Forestry Commission and the Highlands and Islands Development Board are designed to improve the utilisation of land in the Highlands and Islands and to benefit the local economies.

Mr. Maclennan: Will the Minister scrap the Government's proposals to cut the grants under the crofting counties agricultural grants scheme, and will he agree to meet forthwith the chairman of the Crofters Union steering group and withdraw the abrupt refusal to consult about the Government's damaging proposal?

Mr. Stewart: If the hon. Gentleman will put down detailed questions about the Crofters Commission, we shall answer them.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Has my hon. Friend had an opportunity to study his Department's report on the Crofters Commission? Is it not high time that we wound up that body and allowed the more efficient use of resources, which the commission is preventing?

Mr. Maclennan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister clearly misheard my question. He referred to the Crofters Commission. I asked him about the cut in the grants under the crofting counties agricultural grants scheme——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether that was so, but we must not have repeats in Question Time. I call Dr. Godman.

Dr. Godman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) asked a question that has not been answered.

Mr. Speaker: That is what happens when hon. Members intervene between a question and an answer.

Mr. Stewart: The answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) is that I have noted his comments, but that we have no plans to wind up the Crofters Commission.

Dr. Godman: Where there is wasteful under-use of land, is not there a case for intervention to ensure the more rational use of that land by, say, tenant farmers?

Mr. Stewart: The Highlands and Islands Development Board has considerable powers to achieve its land use objectives, particularly through advice and offers of financial assistance. Between 1974 and 1983, a total of £26·8 million was provided for the promotion of land development of various kinds in the Highlands and Islands. That created 1,500 jobs and retained 800. I do not believe that extra powers are necessary.

Teachers (Pay)

12. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent communications he has had with the bodies responsible for the negotiation of teachers' salaries and conditions of employment.

Mr. Younger: In my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) on 31 January, at column 272, I reported the outcome of my meeting on 28 January with both sides of the Scottish Joint Negotiating Committee for Teaching Staff in School Education. At a subsequent meeting of that body on 7 February the management side outlined proposals for taking forward a review within the SJNC(SE) framework. I understand that the teachers' side is to respond to that initiative at a further meeting of the SJNC(SE) on 15 February.

Mr. Douglas: Will the Secretary of State give an undertaking that if the SJNC decided that it was within its terms of reference to establish an independent body to review teachers' salaries he would not block that development and would still have on the table his responsibility to provide the necessary funds to meet any obligations arising from the deliberations and decisions that finally emanate from the SJNC?

Mr. Younger: I think that I have already answered that question, but, for the avoidance of doubt, I say again that it is up to the SJNC to decide how it wishes to carry out its tasks. I have already said that if it produces a package of pay and conditions that I consider to be attractive I shall do my best to find funds to help to implement it.

Mr. Maxton: Why does the Secretary of State continue to give the impression that he and the management side of the SJNC ar totally separate and independent beings? His representatives are members of the management side, and one of the underlying problems of teachers is that they do not believe that the management side can operate independently of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Younger: I should have thought that a notable feature of the whole business was that the management side had been obviously independent. For instance, it took the line that it, too, was in favour of an independent pay review, as did the teachers, although it took a different line from the teachers in that it thought it should be a review of pay and conditions. I do not see any question of the management side being other than independent of the other parts of the body. The essential thing for everyone to understand is that the SJNC was set up for the precise purpose of considering and dealing with the pay and conditions of teachers. I suggest that this is the body through which this damaging dispute should be resolved.

Mr. Henderson: Is my right hon. Friend aware that a number of people inside and outside the House are concerned that recrimination about the past few months would be unfortunate? It would be better for the teachers to explore fully within the SJNC the kinds of opportunities to which my right hon. Friend referred earlier. Rather than disrupt now, it would be better to explore the opportunities which my right hon. Friend indicated are available within the SJNC.

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is true that there is a clear way of proceeding and having all the teachers' worries, grievances, and so on properly looked into by the body set up precisely for that purpose. With that in mind, I suggest that all concerned should reflect carefully on whether it is right to disrupt children's educational prospects when there is a good way of resolving the difficulties without doing so.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Jury Vetting

36. Mr. Dalyell asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what is his policy on jury vetting in Scotland in cases relating to section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): The general policy of the Crown in Scotland with regard to jury vetting was explained by the previous Lord Advocate in 1979 and has not changed. The Crown does not screen persons cited for jury service. There have been no recent cases in which all or part of the proceedings needed to be held in camera, but for any such case in the future my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate reserves his position so far as the making of inquiries consistent with the observations of the High Court in M v. Her Majesty's Advocate in 1974 is concerned.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Solicitor-General set out in the Library the criteria of selection?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: A detailed explanation is given in the case to which I referred, which sets out the special cause where a challenge can be made to individual jurors. I shall make that available to the hon. Gentleman, and I shall make sure that it is in the Library.

Mr. Dewar: I hear the careful caveat that the Solicitor-General has made. May I take it from his reply that he shares my implacable resolve that jury vetting should not become a feature of the Scottish judicial system?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: What needs to be appreciated by the whole House is that were we have a jury operating in Scotland it operates in a different context from the jury that is to be found south of the border. There are significant differences. We have a different system of majority verdicts and a different size of ordinary criminal jury. I confirm to the hon. Gentleman that screening or vetting is not an ordinary part of the way in which we conduct matters.

Mr. Fairbairn: Will my hon. and learned Friend confirm that the reason why the Government were persuaded by argument to leave the rejection of three jurors without cause shown was so that the practice of jury vetting by a back door should never be introduced in Scotland?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Yes, indeed, that is the situation. As the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) appreciated, there is only one small but general reservation that I have made on the whole matter.

Matrimonial Homes Act

37. Mr. McKelvey asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he is satisfied with the operation of the Matrimonial Homes Act.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The Government are aware of the criticisms made of the operation of the Act and are, as appropriate, taking steps to meet these criticisms, or ascertain how far they are justified, and to provide remedies by legislative and other means.

Mr. McKelvey: I am grateful to the Solicitor-General. He will recall that during the progress of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill there was discussion of the Matrimonial Homes Act 1981 and Women's Aid indicated disquiet about variations in judgments in the appropriate sheriff courts. I look forward to the result of his investigation and to any action that can be taken to remedy the problem.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As I have already indicated to the hon. Gentleman, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has commissioned research into the operation of the Act. It is expected that this will be available by the beginning of next year. If he has specific complaints about the operation of the Act and the involvement of the police or procurators fiscal in Scotland, I hope that he will make the details available to me.

Drugs Offences

38. Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many cases of alleged drugs offences have been reported to the Crown Office or to procurators fiscal in 1985 to date.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: In 1985 to date, 290 cases have been reported to procurators fiscal.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Does the Solicitor-General consider that the proposed change in the law to make fines available as the norm to the court in addition to prison sentences would be a useful deterrent, bearing in mind the alarming increase in the number of drug cases in Scotland?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the point that he makes. I regret that the problem of trafficking in drugs remains very serious in Scotland, as elsewhere in the United Kingdom. I am glad to say that our success rate in prosecutions in the High Court has been good. I hope that the amendments that have been put down to the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill will provide an effective addition to the armoury of deterrents against those who believe that trafficking in drugs is a profitable way to carry on.

Mr. McQuarrie: Can my hon. and learned Friend tell the House how many of the drug offences in Scotland last year were committed by young persons under the age of 18?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I cannot immediately answer my hon. Friend. I regret to say that that area of crime involves not only older people. There has been a significant and tragic increase in the number of those involved under the age of 20.

Armed Trespass

39. Sir Hector Monro asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions took place in 1984 for armed trespass.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Trespassing with firearms is an offence under section 20 of the Firearms Act 1968, and 51 prosecutions for contraventions of that section took place in 1984.

Sir Hector Monro: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that that is a very high number? Can he break down that figure into urban and rural offences? Can he assure me that sufficient effort is made to prosecute those who are poaching both fish and wildfowl?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I cannot give a breakdown into urban and rural offences, but I should think that most of the offences took place in a rural context. As my hon. Friend will appreciate, if those offences are pursued in the courts, that can sometimes involve very complex questions of civil law, which the courts have said are not always suitable for determination in criminal trials. However, I understand my hon. Friend's great concern about poaching.

Mr. Eadie: Based on the figures that the Solicitor-General for Scotland has given for prosecutions relating to armed trespass, what has the hon. and learned Gentleman to say about the alleged easy availability of weapons in Scotland? Will he investigate that matter and provide the House with information?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I shall be glad to provide the hon. Gentleman with what information I can. Under the Firearms Act 1968 and other statutory and common law offences, significant penalties can be imposed on those in possession of firearms or who use them when they do not have a justifiable excuse for carrying them. The courts in Scotland have imposed heavy penalties when such offences have come before them.

Drugs Offences

40. Mr. Malone asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions for drug-related offences have taken place in the Grampian region in the past 12 months.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The figures available are for 1984, when 294 drug-related cases were reported for prosecution in the Grampian police area.

Mr. Malone: I am grateful for that reply. While it is a tribute to the ability of the Grampian police that they have been able to contain the overall problem within the Grampian region, does my hon. and learned Friend recognise that within those figures there is an increased number of offences for the use of hard drugs? Will he consistently bear that fact in mind when considering sentencing policy?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As my hon. Friend will recognise, sentences are a matter for the courts. However, it has been the established policy for the past two years of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate that where there are prosecutions of those engaged in the trafficking of drugs—be they hard or soft drugs—they should ordinarily take place in the High Court. That ensures that the full range of penalties available in that court can be used. I hope that in future that will include the power to impose, as a norm, a fine as well as a sentence of imprisonment.

Dr. Godman: Can the Solicitor-General for Scotland tell us how many of those prosecuted for drug-related offences were registered drug addicts?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: No, I cannot give the hon. Gentleman an answer to that question. The range of offences covers not only those found in possession of drugs, but those found in possession of them with the intention of supplying them to other people. In those circumstances, whether or not the accused is a drug addict is essentially immaterial. We are seeking to crack down on the idea that people can engage in trafficking, especially when it is for profit.

SCOTLAND

Dental Charges

16. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the costs of dental treatment provided under the National Health Service in Scotland was met by the charges paid by patients at the latest date for which figures are available; and what was the corresponding proportion in 1979.

Mr. John MacKay: The proportion was 24·6 per cent. in 1983-84 and 20·29 per cent. in 1979-80.

Mr. Clarke: Is the Minister aware of the great concern that is felt not only by the dental profession but by patients about the increased charges? Does he agree that dental care should continue to have an important place in Scotland?

Mr. MacKay: I am indeed most concerned to improve the quality of dental care in Scotland and the attention we pay to our teeth. About half the courses of treatment are provided free. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome the fact that while the number of dental treatments in 1978 in Scotland was 2·4 million, by 1983 it had risen to 2·75 million.

Questions to Ministers

3.33 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, of which I have given you prior notice. My point concerns Question Time. You will have noticed that the Government have recently transferred overall responsibility for forestry policy from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to the Scottish Office. The Table Office has, therefore, been directing hon. Members who represent English and Welsh constituencies to table their questions on United Kingdom forestry policy to the Scottish Office, and two of my hon. Friends have, rightly, done so today.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that this administrative transfer from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to the Scottish Office could impose an intolerable strain on the time available for Scottish Office questions. Would it be possible—indeed, would it be in order—in view of the situation for a Scottish Office Minister to be present in the House during Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food questions to answer questions on United Kingdom forestry affairs?

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I draw your attention to the fact that of the Scottish questions today, three were from hon. Members representing English constituencies and one was from an hon. Member representing a Welsh seat? While I entirely agree that they are within their rights according to the odd usages of this place, do you agree that representations should be made for Scottish questions to return to being answered one week in three instead of the current one week in four?

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) has raised a real difficulty. If we find, as we monitor this matter—as we are in the early stages of this transfer, it will have to be monitored—that it inhibits the proper scrutiny of the abysmal mess that the Scottish Office is making of the Scottish economy and everything else, we shall want to return to the subject.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The number of questions in which English Members participate—I refer not just to the questions on forestry today — suggests that Scottish Question Time should be extended. Will you take account of suggestions recently made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), that Scottish questions could usefully be added to some meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee in Edinburgh? That might also serve to reduce the number of English Members participating in Scottish questions.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Is it exactly the same point of order?

Mr. Forth: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Forth—an English Member.

Mr. Forth: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you consider enjoining Scottish Members not to interfere in English Question Time?

Mr. Speaker: That illustrates the difficulty about this issue. It is not one for me. This is a legitimate matter, and it should be taken up through the usual channels.

Leader of the Opposition (Statement)

3.37 pm

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): This is the big one.

Mr. Stanbrook: It will be.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, you ruled against my submission that certain words used by the Leader of the Opposition, calling into question the truthfulness of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, were out of order. You said:

"It is right that we do not impute dishonour to each other, but what the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition said was that he did not himself believe it. That is a different matter." —[Official Report, 12 February 1985; Vol. 73, c. 188.]

Now that we have the advantage of reading in Hansard exactly what the Leader of the Opposition said, I respectfully submit that what he said was out of order. The Leader of the Opposition said:

"The right hon. Lady says now, and she has said to me before, that she was not involved in the decision to prosecute. Frankly, I do not believe the right hon. Lady".

The Prime Minister said:

"I was not involved in the decision to prosecute a particular person." —[Official Report, 12 February 1985; Vol. 73, c. 162.]

I ask you to consider that matter, Mr. Speaker, in the light of the precedents in "Erskine May", especially on page 432.

Several precedents are quoted. The most recent precedent involved the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight). The words used by the hon. Member for Fife, Central were:

"I doubt the word of the hon. Member for Edgbaston."

Mr. Bryant Godman Irvine was in the Chair as Deputy Speaker and it was reported that he said:

"I find it difficult to distinguish between doubting someone's word and calling him a liar." —[Official Report, 15 May 1980; Vol. 984, c. 1789-90.]

That is in "Erskine May" and is under the heading "Charges of uttering a deliberate falsehood". In view of these precedents, I respectfully suggest that what the Leader of the Opposition said about the Prime Minister's truthfulness yesterday was out of order. I ask you to consider the matter, Mr. Speaker, now or later as you wish, and to rule that, the Leader of the Opposition being out of order, he should withdraw.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, you were present for all the proceedings and as a result of a point of order by the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) you made a decision there and then which was apparently to the satisfaction of most hon. Members who were present, otherwise there would have been further points of order. The hon. Gentleman wishes to challenge that ruling, and that is a matter for him.

I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that one does not have to go as far back as the incident in 1980 because there are plenty of examples, if you care to look them up, in which many hon. Members have doubted the veracity of statements made by other hon. Members. That does not apply simply from the Labour side to the Conservative side; it happens the other way round as well. Perhaps you will reflect that the most glaring example happened in July last year, when I asked whether it would be in order for somebody to say that the Prime Minister would not recognise the truth if it was sprayed on her eyeballs, and I got away with it.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point) : Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think that we can agree in part with what the hon. Gentleman has said. We have our differences and on both sides of the House we are accustomed to harsh criticism, which is inherent in our tradition of free speech. I have sat in the House for 11 consecutive Parliaments. Only the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) has sat here longer. I cannot recollect in those 35 years an occurrence such as that which we witnessed yesterday, when the Leader of the Opposition accused the Prime Minister of not telling the truth and then failed to substantiate the charge.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, before you give your ruling, that what the right hon. Gentleman did—he may have done so unwittingly, and I hope that he did—cast a slur not merely upon my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister but on every hon. Member, because it touched on the honour of every one of us. When we speak, from whatever side of the House, we may be mistaken, we may have been misled, we may not express ourselves clearly, but the assumption is that we are speaking in good faith, and that is the only basis on which the House can operate.

I would respectfully suggest that the right hon. Gentleman has only one course. He can put down a motion in which he apologises to my right hon. Friend, or he can table a motion which goes a long way to substantiate what he says, which would lead to a debate in this House or an appropriate committee of inquiry. The situation cannot be left where it is, because the right hon. Gentleman has pointed the finger at every hon. Member, and that would be intolerable.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Dr. Brian Mawhinney (Peterborough): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. In col. 1789 of Hansard of 15 May 1980, not only did the hon. Member for Fife, Central, (Mr. Hamilton) talk about doubting the word of my hon. Friend, the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston, (Mrs. Knight), as referred to my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook), but he used exactly the same words as the Leader of the Opposition used yesterday. He said "I do not believe."

In col. 1790, I asked Mr. Deputy Speaker for a ruling about whether that was tantamount to calling my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston a liar. Mr. Deputy Speaker ruled that it was tantamount to calling her a liar and he called upon the hon. Member for Fife, Central to withdraw. To his credit—although he said that he did not do it with full gracious heart—in col. 1792 the hon. Member for Fife, Central obeyed the Chair's injunction and withdrew the comment. Since the words on that occasion are identical to the words used yesterday, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to bear that similarity in mind.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): Tell us about video nasties on the train, George.

Mr. Foulkes: Further to the point of order. Before you reconsider your ruling, Mr. Speaker—if you intend to reconsider it on the basis of submissions made—would it help if I gave you a list of the occasions when the Prime Minister has not told the truth on this issue, starting——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is just what we want to avoid in a highly charged situation. [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] Order. I ask the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) not to use that phrase, because that is just the difficulty that we are trying to avoid—[Interruption.] Order. If hon. Members will allow the hon. Gentleman to hear me, I ask him not to use phrases of that kind, because that is just the kind of accusation that we are seeking to avoid.

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker. May I help you by giving you a list of a number of occasions upon which incorrect information was given by the Prime Minister on this matter, starting with her reply to Mrs. Diana Gould on the BBC programme "Nationwide"?

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook), Mr. Speaker. It will be within your recollection that yesterday my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General corroborated on a separate occasion the information which he gave to the House. To my knowledge, neither the Leader of the Opposition nor any Opposition right hon. and hon. Members have impugned the honour of the Attorney-General, notwithstanding the fact that he confirmed what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had said. My point of order relates to that of my hon. Friend and the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine). Surely it is not acceptable to the House for one right hon. or hon. Member to make a clear allegation that another right hon. or hon. Member was not telling the truth, his justification for so doing merely being that he has decided of his own volition that he will not withdraw his comments unless and until he receives an explanation on a wholly different point, which clearly is a point of argument, and an argument which can never be proved.

Mr. Allen Adams (Paisley, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. given that in the past two or three days right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House have accused each other of—shall we say—terminological inexactitude — [Interruption.] well, whatever—perhaps it would be appropriate for you on Monday to call my early-day motion, which would divide the House on the basic issue that we should, from our own ranks, establish a Select Committee with powers to call persons and papers to determine who has been telling the truth and who has not over the past two or three weeks. Is it not as simple as that?

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Reference has been made to me and my behaviour on a similar occasion. In all fairness to Conservative Members, they said that I graciously accepted the Chair's ruling. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I invite them to do the same with your ruling of yesterday.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I accepted your ruling yesterday, and that is how it stands — [HON. MEMBERS: "Who are you?"] That is the usual reaction from public school louts. I should like to make you aware, Mr. Speaker, if I may, that we are aware of what is going on in the House today —the media have informed the general public that the heavy gang on the Conservative Back Benches mean to do a great deal more of this. I thought that you should be made aware of that. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member still being helpful?

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I hope that my intervention will be helpful. Before you make any ruling on the issue that has been raised, will you take into consideration the political circumstances in which the question has been raised? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Is it not clear that Conservative Members are now putting up a smokescreen to avoid the issue that two Ministers came to the House of Commons and deliberately misled the House of Commons, and that was upheld——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is an experienced Member, and he knows that the phrase "deliberately misled" is not a parliamentary expression. He must not use it.

Mr. Heffer: I shall leave out the word "deliberately", but they misled the House of Commons. The whole business by the Opposition is an attempt to deflect attention from the real issue—[HON. MEMBERS: "You are the Opposition."]—on the part of the opposition on that side of the House, to deflect attention from the real issue, which is that people are trying to get away from the decision that was made in the court, and that the Ministers involved should resign. That is the issue. The issue is not the attack on my right hon. Friend.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Norman Buchan.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe that if you had called me earlier, you might have defused the whole matter. May I ask a simple question? Has the Secretary of State for Defence or one of his junior Ministers approached you for the opportunity to make the appropriate statement to the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I want to say to the House in all seriousness that when this House chose me as its Speaker it expected me to be totally impartial and to do my duty, however uncomfortable and however difficult that may be, and yesterday I had to do that. It is not for me to get involved in any political discussions that are going on across the Chamber. I say to the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) that I did not know the full details of his point of order, but I, too, looked up the precedents. I must say to him that they are not similar. I do not intend to go into the exact reasons why that was, but yesterday I was watching very carefully, as the House would have expected me to, to ensure that no accusations of lying or any other unparliamentary words were used. It was not my judgment that the words which were used—"I do not believe it" or "I do not believe you"—were an unparliamentary expression. That is an expression which is used in the House almost daily. I ask the hon. Member for Orpington who raised that point of order to calculate carefully what he is seeking me to say about an expression of that kind. I stand by what I said yesterday.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Has it not been the rule of the House for more years than any of us can remember that on points of order the doctrine of the first occasion applies—that either one raises the point of order when the event happens, or one loses the right to do so? What one does not do is dig it over a day or more later when one had the occasion, if one chose to be present in the House at the time, to raise it then. Do not the events of today reinforce the wisdom of that rule of the House?

Mr. Speaker: I shall answer that at once, because the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) is a constitutional expert; I think that the whole House accepts that. Of course, he is absolutely right. It is one of the rulings that I could have given today. Indeed, I was minded to do so, but since I knew that yesterday's exchanges were likely to be raised, I thought that I would put the issue in its proper perspective at once so that we do not have any more of it.

Mr. K. Harvey Proctor (Billericay): On a new point of order, Mr. Speaker. Have you received a request from the Leader of the Opposition to make a statement denying charges that, during the Ponting trial, his office received information from councillor Lynne Oliver, a Labour councillor in Islington and a member of the Ponting jury?

Mr. Speaker: Of course I have not. I hope that the House will not seek to involve the Chair in what is after all a highly political matter. That is not my role.

BALLOT FOR NOTICE OF MOTIONS FOR FRIDAY 1 MARCH

Members successful in the ballot were:

Mr. Edward Leigh
Mr. Michael Mates
Mr. Barry Henderson.

Molesworth (Peace Chapel)

4 pm

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the threat of imminent demolition of the peace chapel at Molesworth".

Subsequent to the unprecedented military operation involving 3,000 soldiers and police to evict 150 peace demonstators from the Molesworth cruise missile site, the Royal Engineers have erected a 6 ft high barbed wire fence around the perimeter of the site. This unprecedented Ministry of Defence and police paramilitary action, which has been universally condemned by the broad spectrum of the peace movement and by many religious leaders, resulted in the peace chapel becoming inaccessible to those who would wish to pray for world peace. It is now enclosed within the perimeters of the barbed wire fence.

I was alarmed to hear this afternoon that the chapel is threatened by demolition by bulldozing. It is a stone-built structure and it would have been completed with a permanent tiled roof in a few weeks' time. It stands as a symbol for all religious creeds whose members wish earnestly to pray for world peace. Regular religious services were being held at the chapel until it was incarcerated behind the barbed wire. The building of the chapel coincided with the sowing of wheat fields. This was a symbolic gesture and an attempt to send grain to the starving people of Ethiopia and other areas of Africa.

The chapel was built by public subscription. It cannot be described as consecrated because technically it stands on Ministry of Defence land, but it has been blessed by the Bishop of Huntingdon and in the minds of peace-loving people it would qualify as being consecrated. The fact that this modest chapel has such important symbolic significance is perhaps the very reason why the Secretary of State for Defence would wish to eradicate it from sight, but to do so would be a mistake. The House surely cannot allow this travesty to happen in the name of defending the country. If the Secretary of State cannot find it in his heart to allow the chapel to stand, surely the least that he can allow is for the chapel to be demolished stone by stone so that this place of worship can be rebuilt on another site.

I honestly and earnestly feel that this is a matter worthy of debate. Demolition is imminent and there will be no purpose in discussing the matter once the demolition by bulldozer has taken place. I ask you earnestly, Mr. Speaker, seriously to consider granting my application.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the destruction of the chapel at Molesworth."

I have listened carefully to what he has said, but I regret that I do not consider the matter which he has raised as appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10, and, therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Employment of Young People

4.4 pm

Mr. Cyril Smith (Rochdale): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide more employment opportunities for young people.

I am not, of course, unaware that the cancerous evil of unemployment is present across the age spectrum. I am aware equally that it rots the soul of those in all age groups. It causes resentment, bitterness and despair across the age generations. Yet, in terms of the future society, to which we must address ourselves, it is surely at its most evil among young people. From November 1984 we have had about 364,000 who have never worked since leaving school. These disaffected jobless youngsters become disillusioned and often the knock-on effect is one of crime, drug abuse, vandalism and general apathy.

In my 12 years as a Member of this place I have never accused the party in government of deliberately creating unemployment. Mad though I believe other parties often are, I doubt very much whether they are that mad. However, I have often said in employment debates that criticism is justified of the Government's attitude to unemployment. I gather that that view is now shared by some Conservative Members.

I have long believed—I have said this previously in the House—that unemployment, especially among the young, is too serious a matter to be treated as a party political football. We all know that Bills that are introduced under the ten minutes rule stand little chance of becoming law. However, if my Bill were to provoke cross-party discussion and serious thought and discussion, that would be at least a step forward. Two of the proposals in the Bill are certainly matters for discussion and if the Bill were to proceed I should be willing to listen to argument upon them.

The first proposal is to appoint a Minister for youth with responsibilities for young people in the hands of his Department. There are those who will be sceptical of the idea, but I remind them that there used never to be a Minister with responsibilities for small companies. We now have such a Minister, thanks to the Liberal party. The idea has worked in that instance and it could work again if we had a Minister with responsibilities for youth.

The second proposal in the Bill is the establishment of an environmental corps. I envisage the corps giving training in skills that will be a training for life and living. I see the corps undertaking projects and initiatives that are presently beyond the reach of local or national Government. I remind the House that the environment includes the inner cities. I stress that recruitment to the corps would be utterly and absolutely voluntary. Part of its training would be residential and this could lead to a meaningful base training for thousands of young people.

The third and main proposal is a type of statutory apprenticeship scheme. The number of apprenticeships in manufacturing industry fell from 155,000 in 1979 to 99,000 in 1983. Many of the 99,000 apprenticeships have not been filled by school leavers. One of the major criticisms of the Government youth policy and youth employment schemes is the application of the schemes and subsidies to 17-year-olds and not 16-year-olds. I speak with some experience as an employer.

My Bill would enable the Government to place a levy on employers employing more than 50 people who fail to take on a proper and agreed number of apprentices. We tend to think of apprenticeships as largely within the engineering industry, and I submit that that is the wrong approach. We need to have new ideas about apprenticeships, and wider visions.

In Western Germany there are thousands of apprenticeships in the hotel and catering industry, for example, but in Britain there are comparatively few. There are many similar examples in Western Germany and not in Britain. Statutory apprenticeships in Western Germany are the norm; almost 500,000 of them exist. About 50 per cent. of German youth complete a three-year apprenticeship. In Western Germany, the state and industry—industry includes trade unions as well as employers—consider such schemes to be a social responsibility. The state has taken power to implement a levy but it has never had to impose one, such has been the voluntary response of industry to that legislation. In Belgium, too, there is a scheme of statutory apprenticeships.

I employ apprentices in my small company, and I know the problems and the financial costs involved. Much of the Government money now being spent on what I would describe as tarting-up schemes, and much of the money being spent on paying people not to work, could be diverted to financing statutory apprenticeships, with the state bearing much of the cost, not as extra expenditure but as a better use of existing expenditure. There could also be tax incentives and rebates to industry to encourage companies to employ more apprentices. But should industry fail to respond, under my Bill the Government would have the power to impose a levy.

We need the will, leadership, drive, enthusiasm and determination—in short, we need the right attitude. My Bill is an attempt to start the ball rolling and to ensure that we have a trained labour force in the future and that, instead of putting youngsters into schemes for one year and then throwing them back on the dole, we give them meaningful and purposeful training during their adolescent years. That can be done, and it is being done in other European countries. If the will was there, it could be done, and I suggest that International Youth Year is not a bad time to start.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Cyril Smith, Mr. David Alton, Mr. Paddy Ashdown, Mr. A. J. Beith, Mr. Malcolm Bruce, Mr. Alex Carlile, Mr. Simon Hughes, Mr. Archy Kirkwood, Mr. Michael Meadowcroft, Mr. David Penhaligon and Mr. James Wallace.

EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. Cyril Smith accordingly presented a Bill to provide more employment opportunities for young people: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 19 April and to be printed. [Bill 82.]

Orders of the Day

Representation of the People Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 29 January]

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Clause 5

MANNER OF VOTING AT PARLIAMENTARY AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT ELECTIONS

4.12 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): On a point of order, Mr. Walker.

I wish to ask you a question about amendment No. 88, which is not included in the provisional selection of amendments. As you will recall, Mr. Walker, when we discussed clause 1, the Committee greatly extended the franchise and, by so doing, extended the postal vote, with the result that the provisions of the Parliamentary and Municipal Elections (Ballot) Act 1872 are somewhat less effective in ensuring that tampering with ballot papers cannot take place. Amendment No. 88 was tabled to deal with that. There is no other provision in the Bill for that, and therefore no opportunity to discuss the matter, save in the most general way during the debate on clause stand part. Perhaps it would have been better to table a new clause instead of an amendment. If clause 7 is added to the Bill as it stands, without substantial amendment, it might be impossible to raise the issue during a debate on a new clause.

To ensure that there is some debate on the avoidance of tampering with postal votes, would you reconsider the provisional selection of amendments before we reach clause 7?

The Chairman of Ways and Means: I must tell the hon. Gentleman that I considered carefully the amendments which I did and did not select. Amendment No. 88 is clearly outside the scope of the clause. I did not select the amendment, and I cannot contemplate a debate on clause stand part. The hon. Gentleman will have to consider whether it is more appropriate to table a new clause, and I shall consider that in the event of it being tabled. But I repeat that, having considered the amendment carefully, I decided that it was outside the scope of the clause.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): I beg to move amendment No. 32, in page 8, line 11, at end insert—

'(5A) If he is entitled as an elector to an absent vote at the election because he cannot reasonably be expected to go in person to the polling station allotted to him under the appropriate rules by reason of blindness or other physical incapacity, he may vote in person at any polling station in the constituency or, as the case may be, electoral area.'.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following:

New clause 13 — Access for disabled to polling stations—

'After paragraph (d) of section 18(2) of the principal Act the following words shall be inserted as paragraph (e)—

"(e) at each polling station, in the means of access both to and within the premises and in the parking facilities to be available (if any), provision shall be made, in so far as it is in the circumstances both reasonable and practicable, for the needs of electors who are disabled."

and the same words shall be inserted as paragraph (e) of section 18(3) and as section 31(5) of the said Act.'.

New clause 33—Proxy vote for disabled—

'Where a person becomes unable to attend the polling station in person because of physical disability arising after the date prescribed for him to apply to the registration officer to vote by post or proxy under the provisions of section 7, a ballot paper shall be issued to his proxy by the presiding officer at the polling station to which he would have attended but for the physical disability on presentation of a prescribed certificate issued by a medical practitioner attending the person provided:

(a) that the certificate is signed by the medical practitioner and certifies that the person concerned will be unable to attend in person because of a physical disability arising since the last day for the receipt of applications for a postal or proxy vote under section 7,

(b) that the person concerned completed the certificate by appointing as proxy a person qualified by section 8 and

(c) that the proxy appointed completes the certificate by saying that he is qualified to be the proxy under section 8.'.

Mr. Hannam: The amendment and the new clauses seek to improve voting opportunities for the disabled. I warmly welcome the extension of postal or proxy votes to all local government elections in Great Britain, including elections to parish and community councils in England and Wales.

The lack of availability of postal or proxy votes until now has meant that many disabled people have been disfranchised at local elections, and we must all be pleased that the Bill amends that position. However, when we consider the number of disabled people who apply for postal or proxy votes, we must ask why they have to apply for such votes. It is not necessarily on grounds of ill health or inability to get out of their houses and go to the polling stations, but often because the polling station is inaccessible to them. It is ironic that a disabled person applying for an absent vote must produce a doctor's certificate confirming that he or she is disabled, when the real reason for applying for an absent vote is not that he or she is too disabled but that the polling station is inaccessible. That applies not only to people in wheelchairs, but to the many people who have severe walking difficulties, including the elderly, and those who find it difficult to walk up steep steps or any steps at all. I am sure the Committee will agree that everyone, from the most severely disabled to the most athletic, should have the same right of access to polling stations in order to cast their votes in an election.

The use of the postal or proxy vote must be seen as a second-rate alternative to a vote in person, and we should do all that we can to ensure that polling stations are accessible to all. Amendment No. 32 seeks to build on a precedent already established in the Bill—that a person working in connection with the election, but in another part of the electoral area, may vote at any polling station within that electoral area. The amendment proposes that a disabled person should also be able to vote at a polling station other than that normally allocated to him—not because he especially wants to, but because many polling stations are inaccessible.

This is an interim measure pending the time when all polling stations will be fully accessible to disabled and blind people. I understand from questions and answers in Hansard that 50 per cent. grants are available from central funds to provide ramps to polling stations. I had not heard of that scheme before, and it would be most helpful if my hon. Friend the Minister would give further details of it. However, I do not believe that it is working effectively enough to act as a substitute for my amendment. Portable ramps have a limited use, in that they cannot accommodate the great range of access requirements. Many portable ramps can accommodate only one or two steps and cannot solve the problem of a flight of steps. I believe that the take-up of this scheme is extremely low, and I do not know of any local authority that has taken advantage of it. Perhaps my hon. Friend could give me some idea of the number of polling stations whose accessibility has been improved under the scheme.

A further drawback of the scheme is that it does not accommodate the wide range of disabilities. For example, for many elderly people who have walking difficulties, it is most important to have a good handrail. Such needs are not accounted for under the scheme. That is probably the major access need.

For those reasons, the 50 per cent. grant scheme cannot be relied upon to provide the accessibility to polling stations that is needed. Therefore, I hope that the amendment will be accepted. If it is, I should have thought that the principle underlying the current scheme could be extended to cover permanent adaptations that are made to polling stations in order to improve accessibility. Such expenditure would benefit people not only once every few years when an election is held. As I have said in many previous debates upon different legislative measures, the great majority of polling stations are to be found in public buildings. Therefore, improved accessibility would benefit all local residents throughout all the days and months of the year.

New clause 13 deals directly with accessibility to polling stations and inserts into the 1983 Act an additional requirement that, when district councils and London boroughs review polling stations and places, they will ensure that, as far as is reasonable and practicable, parking and access are provided for disabled people. In Scotland, that duty lies with the returning officer. In both instances, that duty will relate to both parliamentary and local elections.

The wording of the new clause is taken from the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970. If the spirit of that Act had been implemented by local authorities, many of the buildings that are used as polling stations would already be accessible to disabled people. Sadly, not nearly enough local authorities have made their public buildings accessible to local people. The picture across the whole country is extremely patchy. Unless such a clause as the one that I have moved is inserted in the Bill, this situation will unfortunately continue. The new clause will not place an onerous burden upon anybody. The result will be that disabled people who are not ill but who otherwise would have to obtain medical certificates will not need to do so.

I have made my final point again and again when putting forward proposals to improve the facilities for the handicapped. Every improvement in the facilities for the handicapped also helps other sections of the community —the elderly, mothers with prams and those who are carrying shopping. A clear illustration of this is the Newcastle metro. A survey shows that the specially wide barriers that have been erected enable 56 people in wheelchairs, 27 blind and handicapped people and 100 people with prams and pushchairs to use that metro service each day. They would be unable to do so if those wider entrances had not been provided.

I hope that these worthwhile proposals will receive favourable consideration from my hon. Friend the Minister.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): I have great pleasure in following the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam). I am reminded of a campaign conducted in my constituency that was directed at preventing the elderly from having to walk long distances. The returning officer established a caravan on a small site which made it easier for people to get to the polling station. However, the concern I felt can be imagined when I say that numerous telephone calls followed me around the constituency on polling day asking me to go to this particular polling station, where I found that people in wheelchairs were in tears. The travelling problem had been overcome, but the access problem had been aggravated. The steps of the caravan were far too steep for some of the frail elderly who had difficulty, because of arthritis, in climbing the steps. Amendment No. 32 seeks to provide an alternative method. It is not unique. It would enable those people who feel that their polling station is inaccessible but who do not want a postal vote to vote in person. Some people, God bless them, still want to exercise their right to cast their vote at the polling station. They want to be like other people on polling day. That is very important.

The Minister could look kindly upon this amendment by providing that facilities for the disabled should be made available at accessible polling stations, which may be situated outside the wards in which they live. Returning officers already carry their voting rights elsewhere, so this is possible. The amendment would meet the needs of the disabled, most of whom would like to continue to go to polling stations for as long as they possibly can. It is not for this House to put barriers in their way.

There is a section in the Education Act 1981 that deals with the education of handicapped children. It provides that schools must be made accessible to all children. The improved accessibility which has resulted from the 1981 Act may be of value to the disabled who want to cast their vote personally. Substantial numbers of polling stations are based at schools.

As the hon. Member for Exeter said, when we took the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 through the House perhaps we should have been more positive and said that access to new public buildings should be made mandatory. The assumption is that access should be made available only for people in wheelchairs, but, as the hon. Member for Exeter said, everybody at some time or another has been pushed around in a pram. A mother is entitled to enter a polling station without the hassle of having to leave her baby behind.

All these factors have to be taken into account. Until we can provide relatively simple access to all polling stations which are not too far from the homes of the disabled, the ideas underlying amendment No. 32 ought to commend themselves to the Minister. If he cannot accept them as they stand, I ask him to do everything within his power to ensure that practical support is given to local authorities with difficulties to enable those who want to do so to exercise their right to vote, even though they are disabled, at a polling station.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I am one of the signatories to new clause 13. I fully support what my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) and the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) have said about the provision of easier access to polling stations. During the 1983 general election, two people in my constituency of Leicester, East found it impossible physically to go and vote. I asked my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department only a few days ago to define a polling station. One has to remember that schools where the traditional polling station is to be found do not normally teach disabled children in wheelchairs. Another difficulty is that some polling stations are situated in outhouses at the back of the school. The polling station could be at the top of a massive flight of steps.

In June 1983, my two constituents experienced great difficulty in climbing very steep steps. One was in a wheelchair; the other had two sticks. I applaud the polling agent, who helped the person in the wheelchair to go into the polling station and vote. The person with the sticks could not get up the steps. I have no idea how she would have voted had she been able to get up those very steep steps. It might have increased my majority.

Severe problems are involved in getting disabled people to polling stations to cast their votes. We give disabled people lifts to and from the polling station, but they have difficulty in getting into and out of the car. It is important for the disabled to be able physically to come and vote rather than having to vote by post.

Leicester has a large disabled community and from speaking to them I know that the one thing that they want is to be treated the same as everyone else. It is up to all of us to co-operate with the Home Office in ensuring that they have the facilities to enable them to vote.

Once disabled people have got into the polling station there is the additional difficulty of voting secretly. Some cannot reach the ballot paper, some cannot fold it and some cannot reach to put it into the ballot box. Voting for the disabled must be completely reviewed as soon as possible.

4.30 pm

I support amendment No. 32 which will allow disabled people to go to any polling station in the electoral area. I do not know whether I would like to see one polling station for disabled people. I can see that it would have its attractions in a general election when the voter is voting within his constituency, but I can see a problem arising at a ward or district election when a person goes to a polling station other than that at which he is registered. However, that proposal would go some way to enabling disabled people to vote.

It is a great democratic right in Britain to be able to vote. I sincerely hope that disabled people will be allowed to vote whenever they wish to. I hope that all access points to newly designated polling stations will be wide enough and will have ramps. Disabled people should be able to vote proudly, without assistance. They should be able to go to vote freely, in secret and with pride. It is for that reason that I support amendment No. 32 and, in particular, new clause 13.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I congratulate those hon. Members who have tabled amendment No. 32. I fully support the principle that it seeks to establish, although its wording means that it cannot be implemented.

It is not my understanding of the amendment that if a disabled elector goes to a polling station his vote must necessarily be totted up with the other votes there. I am sure that his vote could be transferred and counted in the ward where that elector resides.

Every hon. Member will have experience of electors who are greatly disadvantaged because of the way in which ward boundaries are drawn. I used to live in Aberystwyth. One village in that ward, Capel Seion, consisted of a long road in a rural area with perhaps only 200 electors. The ward boundary went down the middle of the road for about two or three miles. Electors on one side of the road lived in Llanbadarn-y-Creuddyn Upper and were able to vote in the village, while the electors on the other side of the road were in Llanbadarn-y-Creuddyn Lower and had to travel three or four miles to vote in a different valley with a greater centre of population. There were complaints in sparsely populated areas, where winter sometimes creates difficult conditions, yet the returning officer could not recommend that in that case an extra polling station should be installed. Therefore, there is a case for special facilities being made available for disabled people.

Amendment No. 32 would apply only to an elector who has an absent vote. I know of difficulties where certain electors are physically handicapped yet have found it difficult to get an absent vote. In some areas, a doctor's signature is required and the electoral registration officer has to be satisfied with that signature. In other areas the conditions are not so strict. If I could be satisfied that physically handicapped voters would usually get an absent vote indefinitely, easily and simply, without having to write letters or having to go to town halls or guild halls for forms which then have to be taken to the doctor, that would go a long way to meeting the amendment.

Hon. Members have said that handicapped voters want to do the same as ordinary people and that that can never be completely achieved by the amendment. If the Government cannot accept the amendment now, I hope that they will consider whether some administrative procedure could be instituted and introduce an amendment to that effect on Report. If a handicapped voter wanted to go to the polls and if there were an accessible polling station, surely the administrative procedures could be made available so that that vote could be transferred and counted in the appropriate district. Therefore, I support the amendment.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Perhaps I may pick up from where my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) left off. It is a well known fact that polling districts change their boundaries periodically. Polling stations move and, with the development of movement of population, people find themselves in different polling districts, wards and, periodically, constituencies, without physically having moved.

A good friend of mine, who is severely disabled, has always been a keen student of politics. For a long time he voted at a polling station close to where he lived which was readily accessible. For him, the exercise of voting in person was important. When his local authority moved the ward boundary, he was suddenly in a different polling district, the polling station was some considerable distance away and he was no longer physically able to go there. That is a disgrace. He had not moved house and the polling station where he had gone was still some 50 to 70 yd away, but the boundary line now went between him and that polling station.

Bearing in mind that everyone is issued with a polling card with a name and polling number on it and every polling station to which I have ever been always seems to have a complete electoral register for the constituency or ward as a whole, it is ludicrous that my friend should not be able to take his polling card to the nearby polling station and exercise his democratic right.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) on amendment No. 32. I agree entirely with what he has said. If the Government will not accept it, I hope that he will press it to a Division because it has considerable merit. In a modern electronic age, there is no reasonable excuse for not allowing that small number of persons the right to go to their nearest polling station.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Can the hon. Gentleman help me? I am trying to envisage a polling station in which on a ward-by-ward basis a list of all electors is kept. If an elector from another area asked to exercise his right to vote at that polling station, would there not be difficulty for the officers administering the poll in verifying that person's identity to allow him to vote?

Mr. Bermingham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. If we take as an example the smallest number of electors involved in an election for a district or parish council, the number of wards involved may be as small as five, 10 or 15. Surely it is not beyond the wit of man for a number of voting slips for adjacent wards at the district level to be left at each polling station. Alternatively, why not allow the polling officer the right to make a ballot paper which would have to be kept separate and secure? We can all think of little difficulties, but let us consider the overall principle.

How many such cases are we considering? It is a remarkably small number. Is it beyond the wit of a returning officer in a constituency in a general election or in a district council election to allow disabled persons in the constituency or district to vote in the polling stations nearest to them?

A medical certificate grants to a disabled person the right to vote at a polling station other than his own. It would not be beyond the wit of man to include in the application form the address of the nearest polling station. That would allow the returning office for the constituency or district to know the number of applications and the polling stations to which those applications were going to be made. The officers at those polling stations would then have the appropriate ballot papers available. Such ballot papers, instead of being put into the box, could be sealed, placed in a separate box and delivered to the appropriate counting point.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I envisage even greater problems than I did earlier. Assuming that the disabled person lives in the constituency neighbouring the one in which he works, I foresee great problems in trying to rush his ballot paper back to the appropriate constituency. Secondly, and more important, if the polling station is in the same constituency, I am certain that this system will still work because it will not affect the general election result. However, I would have considerable worries about the polling officer having loose ballot papers in the polling station. I seek the view of the hon. Gentleman on the situation in which the elector votes in one ward and lives in another, bearing in mind that wards sometimes have election results with majorities of only one or two.

Mr. Bermingham: As I failed to make myself clear the last time I went through the process, perhaps the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) will allow me to recite the simple fundamental point involved. At the time that the disabled person makes his application for the right to vote at a polling station other than his own, he should nominate the convenient polling station. If I may return to the example I cited earlier of my friend who is severely disabled and whose nearest appropriate polling station is 70 yd from his home, he would nominate that polling station in his application as the one at which he intended to vote. With regard to the hon. Gentleman's example of an elector working in a neighbouring constituency, that elector would nominate the polling station at which he intended to exercise his right to vote, and the nominated polling station would hold the appropriate polling slip or ballot form.

4.45 pm

Mr. Hannam: I think that the hon. Gentleman has it right. The amendment seeks to apply the same rules to disabled persons as are now applied to those who perforce are working in an area away from the appropriate polling station, such as polling officers and policemen on duty. They are obliged to carry out the procedure that the hon. Gentleman has outlined. We are asking that the procedure applied in the registration of an absent vote be applied to the disabled.

Mr. Bermingham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, because I think that he agrees with me. A simple procedure can be devised to enable disabled people to vote at the most convenient polling station. As I understand it, that is precisely what the amendment seeks. It is unnecessary to draft a complicated series of provisions in order to permit the disabled to vote.

Dr. Marek: The problem has been raised of a disabled voter who lives in one ward but votes in a different electoral area. Does my hon. Friend agree that that clouds the issue? It may well be that we would have to rule out that type of change for the time being. However, it should be possible to devise some administrative system within a constituency for a disabled voter to vote at a different polling station from the one that collects the votes of other voters in the ward. That would go a long way to solving the problem.

Mr. Bermingham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention, but I think that on this occasion he may have clouded the issue slightly. I am endeavouring to keep matters simple. If, in the city of Sheffield, a police officer is stationed on duty in the Hallam constituency and he is entitled to vote in the Attercliffe constituency, he is treated as an absent voter, the necessary arrangements and nominations are made and no problem arises. Elections are neither won nor lost on that one vote, because the vote is transferred.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: They are.

Mr. Bermingham: The hon. Member for Leicester, East must not become obsessed with his own tiny majority, which seems to worry him.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): And rightly so.

Mr. Bermingham: If the procedures which work well for persons engaged in the electoral process are applied to the disabled, the numbers involved will be small. The same care that is taken with the votes of police officers and others will be taken with the votes of disabled persons.

It does not seem too high a price to pay in a democracy for a disabled person to have the right to cast his vote where it is most convenient and for that vote to be counted in the ward, district or constituency in which he is normally resident and entitled to vote. The transfer of such votes in the counting period should not give rise to any great difficulty. I therefore strongly urge the Committee and the Government to accept the amendment.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I apologise to the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) for having missed his opening remarks.

I welcome the opportunity to debate a subject that must have affected every Member of Parliament at some time. All of us at the time of elections know of incidents in which disabled people have experienced difficulty with polling booths. My experience may be a little different from that of hon. Members who represent city areas.

My constituency is a rural area, with about 90 polling stations and only 60 or 70 electors in some areas. Only some of those stations are schools. Many are village halls or the vestries of chapels and churches and some are singularly unsuitable. At the last general election, one polling station was in the front room of a council house.

In such constituencies, problems arise and they must be taken into account in our consideration of the amendments. I support the objective of the amendments, though new clause 13 appeals to me more than does amendment No. 32, because it lays down a general objective that meets the wishes of most disabled people. They want to be able to vote in a normal, unselfconscious way. They do not want to be herded into different polling booths.

I have seen problems at first hand. In the town of Caernarfon, one polling station is in a reasonably accessible building, but it is on the second floor. People with heart complaints are upset because they cannot climb the stairs. That is a particularly prevalent problem in areas where a number of people suffer from pneumoconiosis. Such people have difficulty walking up hills and stairs.

We need to put pressure on the authorities that organise elections. It is not enough for them to show goodwill towards disabled people. There must be a requirement on them to take all "reasonable and practicable" steps. Those words appear in new clause 13 and, in another context, in the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970. They should be included in the Bill.

There should be legislative pressure on the organisers of elections to use the polling stations that are most advantageous for disabled people and, if there are problems at some of those stations, to take "reasonable and practicable" steps to put them right; obviously, they cannot spend thousands of pounds adapting a building that will be used only once every three years.

Polling stations must be made as accessible as possible to disabled people. I refer not only to disabled people in wheelchairs, but to those who have difficulty walking up hills and those with sight difficulties who may have problems if they have to walk down steep slopes. We need to ensure that hand rails are provided and that access is through the most convenient door in a building and not, as is sometimes the case, through the least convenient door.

We want the Government to recognise the problem and to put responsibility on local authorities and ensure that they cannot wriggle out of it. At the same time, we must not impose such stringent conditions that it becomes impossible for those authorities to comply with that responsibility.

Mr. Forth: I hope that the Minister will tell us how he thinks that the administrative procedures recommended in the amendments would work in practice.

I agree that we must make every effort to ensure that people with disabilities of any kind can cast their vote in as near normal a way as possible—I favour easier access to normal polling stations as the best solution—but I get a little worried when we start complicating the administrative measures at individual polling stations to try to accommodate many possible methods of voting.

One of the great strengths of our present voting system and its procedures is their elegant simplicity. However good our motives, if we start to try to build in ever more procedures to cater for any number of possibilities, dangers of inaccuracies, the miscasting of votes, counting difficulties and so on will emerge. We should not cast aside such problems too lightly, because several hon. Members have majorities of fewer than 100 and some have majorities in single figures. It is possible for the miscasting of votes or the misplacing of ballot papers to cause serious electoral problems.

I hope that the Minister who is to reply will tell us how the administrative procedures would work, whether they would be viable and whether they would give rise to difficulties. Perhaps we would do better to provide easy access to polling stations rather than to over-complicate the important administrative and security procedures that are necessary at each polling station.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): At every election in which I have been involved, I have been impressed by the disabled people I have met while canvassing or on polling day and by their tremendous determination to vote, no matter what the difficulties. I am sure that my experience has been shared by other hon. Members, and it is a tribute to elderly people and those who find it difficult to move easily that they prefer to cast their vote in person than to exercise their right to a postal vote. It is a sign that they regard voting as a civic duty and is a lesson to all of us. I feel humble when I see the enormous dedication and determination of those people.

It is right that we should debate ways in which we can make it easier for some disabled people to vote—not that many such people want matters made easier for them. I should welcome the opportunity at the appropriate stage formally to move new clause 33, which is intended to cater for people who become disabled after the last date on which they were able to apply for a postal or proxy vote. If they are unable to go to a polling station in person, they should be able to vote by proxy, even if their disability occurs only just before polling day. That is a sensible provision which will ensure that no one is denied the right to vote through no fault of his own. New clause 13 also deserves support. If it is accepted, no disabled person who can get anywhere near a polling station will have any difficulty in casting his vote.

I think that all the polling stations in my constituency are at ground level and, apart from the two or three steps from a school playground into the building, which cause difficulty for disabled people, they do not present many problems.

However, even if most polling stations already conform to the requirements set out in the amendments, there will be a few that do not. Almost without exception, polling stations are situated in public buildings. If adequate access has to be provided at election time, it will almost certainly need to be provided for the other uses to which the building is put — for parents visiting schools, for example. Adapting buildings to improve access would not be a one-off operation for election time. It would be helpful for the rest of the time as well.

I am sympathetic to the intention behind amendment No. 32, but I have some reservations about it. There will be enormous difficulties for returning officers in dealing with people who are not on the voting list. Indeed, the person in charge at the polling station to which the disabled person would normally have gone may not know that his vote has been cast elsewhere. There is a danger that, for the most worthy of motives, we are making the position rather more difficult than is necessary. If we concentrated more on access, amendment No. 32 might be considered unnecessary even by those who have tabled it.

It is unusual if the polling station to which an elector would normally go is not the one that is easiest for him to attend. Sometimes there are geographical quirks but those occasions are few and far between. Although I subscribe to the motives underlying amendment No. 32, I wonder whether it would be easy administratively to overcome the difficulties inherent in it. I express that reservation but I hope that new clause 13 will be passed, which would make amendment No. 32 unnecessary.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I am glad to have the opportunity to respond to a most useful debate. One cannot think of a more appropriate way of beginning our second day of deliberations on this important Bill than that we should consider the rights of the disabled in relation to voting and that there should be recognition, as there was from my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam), of the considerable improvements that the Bill already proposes. I am anxious to respond positively to the calls for further improvements.

My hon. Friend needs no commendation from me because his work for the disabled is well known. They have an eloquent spokesman in him and his contribution is appreciated by us all. We know too that this is a bipartisan matter. The hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones), who has to be elsewhere at the moment, also does sterling work for the disabled, as does the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley).

My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter pointed out that considerable improvements are proposed in the Bill for those disabled who want to exercise an absent vote. At the moment, a disabled voter has a right to a permanent absent vote where he or she has been certified as being unable to vote in person. That right is to a postal vote. If the Bill is passed in its present form, there would also be a right to vote by proxy, so that increases the choice for the disabled. Anyone who wished to apply in future for a postal vote on the ground of disability would be able to apply in the normal way for one election, without going through the special procedure, and would merely be required to fill in the form, including the reason why it would not be practicable to vote in person on the day, and obtain the appropriate counter signature. Of course, most disabled people would want a permanent postal vote. That requires certification, mainly but not exclusively, by a doctor. Those matters have properly been of concern to the all-party group.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is most interested in these matters and he has been with me on the Front Bench throughout these debates. Later I shall turn to his contribution four years ago when he was Minister of State at the Home Office. It has been pointed out in the debate that the help given by central Government to local authorities to improve facilities at polling stations has not been fully understood.

My right hon. and learned Friend has been in correspondence with the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South on the subject of certification. I welcome the opportunity to re-emphasise in Committee, as my right hon. and learned Friend did in his letter to the right hon. Gentleman, that when obtaining a certificate the disabled person is not required to pay a fee. General medical practitioners are not entitled to charge a fee for certifying an absent voting application on grounds of physical incapacity. They are prevented from doing so by paragraph 31 of the terms of service for doctors in schedule 1 to the National Health Service (General Medical and Pharmaceutical Services) Regulations 1974. That is an important point to put on the record, because there have been proper inquiries about it in the past.

We have tried to ensure that any disabled person who wishes to have an absent vote may get one with the minimum of fuss and difficulty. The point has been made tellingly from all sides of the Committee that some disabled persons welcome the opportunity to be able to vote in person and regard that ability as one of the many challenges in life that they wish to surmount. It is a challenge that keeps up the morale and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) said, the self-respect of the disabled.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) for his work for the disabled; his courage in facing up to disablement in his own family has won the admiration and respect of all of us. He referred to difficulties at polling stations. I think we have all had personal experience of this. In Putney, my constituency, our work for the disabled is perhaps the thing for which we are best known. In the constituency we have the headquarters of the limb manufacturing and fitting industry and also the Royal Hospital and Home for Incurables, one of the foremost institutions for the severely handicapped, where marvellous work is done and where modern technology has given a new dimension to life to those amongst the most severely disabled.

At the last general election, because of one of those unfortunate errors which sometimes happen and which reveal the importance of people being able to vote in person, a large number of postal vote applications for residents in the Royal Hospital went astray. So that they would not be deprived of their votes, a substantial operation was mounted to get them to the polling station. I know from my personal experience of that and from other encounters with disabled people that the ability to exercise their right to vote is of fundamental importance to them:

my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is wrong to outline them from time to time, but, when it comes to the major matters I can see no justification for drawing substantially different rules and for exaggerating the prowess and ability of Sinn Fein to produce a false result at the polls.

The overwhelming evidence is that elections in Northern Ireland, just as much as in the United Kingdom, are conducted fairly and properly. I do not see why we should try to enact in statute different rules based upon assumptions which are fundamentally false.

Mr. Kaufman: One of the questions that I ask myself — perhaps the Minister, with the assistance of his officials, could help us — is whether it is too late to lodge an election petition in relation to Leicester, East.

I would very much like to support the amendment moved by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and the amendments which we have tabled which complete the right hon. Gentleman's proposition. He has properly moved to take out the words "in Great Britain" but the clause is still discriminatory as long as subsections (2) and (3) remain.

The hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) is right. Although the clause provides the new facility for an absent vote — a new facility which in principle Labour Members stongly support — it goes on to more than double itself in length by seeking stringently to limit that new right for electors in Northern Ireland. I must say with great clarity that we find that utterly unacceptable.

I do not want to follow right hon. and hon. Members on the detail of electoral problems and problems of public order within Northern Ireland. Those are matters to be dealt with not in a Representation of the People Bill, but in other ways if they are to be dealt with at all. Indeed, the Committee has recently been dealing with electoral problems in a manner which I must confess does not wholly appeal to me.

It is not acceptable to discriminate in the allocation or extension of the franchise on the basis of issues which relate not to the franchise but to the maintenance of order in a part of the United Kingdom. If we intend to do that, we must also consider other parts of the United Kingdom in other respects. That turns the franchise into a political issue rather than a political right.

7 pm

That being so—and the right hon. Member for South Down was perfectly right to say that in that sense the debate is an extension of the previous debate — I recommend the amendments and support the right hon. Gentleman's amendment in the interest of parity, which was the basis of the amendment that I moved and of the amendments that I supported in the previous debate. The arguments are self-evident. They have been put amply and eloquently by the right hon. Gentleman.

I hope that the Government will accept the amendments so that we can move further still along the road that the Committee has already indicated it wishes to travel.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I do not know of any election petition in Manchester, Gorton, but I shall certainly take part in it if I have to.

I used to hesitate about discussing Northern Ireland matters if only because, although I had visited the Province a couple of times, I would not have called myself an expert. Having visited Northern Ireland now on a number of occasions and participated in the Committee consideration of the Northern Ireland electoral legislation, I say now with more confidence that my hon. Friends know exactly what it is like and why Northern Ireland should not be treated in any way differently from the rest of the United Kingdom.

I support wholeheartedly what the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) said in moving the amendment. After all, it is in a way an extension of clause 6(6), which the Committee discussed a short while ago.

The Northern Ireland Office seems to treat Sinn Fein as the bogeyman, and gives it far more credibility than it should have. No hon. Member admires terrorism, but the democratic process must be allowed to continue. I will defend that right, and I will support hon. Members who represent Northern Ireland constituencies in any similar amendments.

The extension conferring a new facility must have the approval of the Committee. It makes a great deal of sense, it gives more self-respect to the people of Northern Ireland and above all it ensures that they will be treated no differently from those in any other part of the United Kingdom. For that reason, I support the amendments.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I support the amendments. We are dealing with the matter of the franchise and with the right of citizens of the United Kingdom in Northern Ireland to have the same franchise rights as their colleagues in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Parliament has already considered some legislation relevant to the Sinn Fein activity in elections. I did not agree with what the Government did, but I listened carefully to their arguments and appreciated their point of view. I cannot accept that they have a different point of view on the issue now before the Committee because it is a clear-cut issue concerning the right of the people to vote. If one says that, because of Sinn Fein, people are to be asked to identify themselves, although I disagree with the method of identification, I can understand the argument. But I cannot understand any hon. Member arguing that, because the menace of Sinn Fein exists, the right of the people to vote will be taken away. That is the real issue before the Committee.

I am glad that there is a consensus in the Committee that all citizens of the United Kingdom should have the same right to vote at election time. Following the argument that was put forward in discussion of the last amendment and the basis on which it was accepted by the Government, I think that these amendments should be accepted. We shall then be on all fours with the rest of the United Kingdom, and I make a plea to that end.

Mr. Mellor: The fundamental point at issue has already emerged clearly as a result of the debate. I hope that my recognition of it will be apparent from what I am about to say.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) referred to the dilemma in which the Government find themselves with regard to the basic structure of clause 7. The decision was irresistible, as I have said, and it is common ground from what has been said in most, if not all, speeches of hon. Members in the debate that there has to be a dramatic widening of the availability of absent voting arrangements to take account of changes in habits.

In almost any month in which an election is held, there will be hundreds of thousands of people — in some months even millions—away on holiday. It is no longer possible to sustain the argument that they should be deprived of their votes when it is apparent that necessarily they will have booked their holidays long before a Prime Minister takes the decision to hold an election.

As the right hon. Member for South Down recognised, that posed a dilemma. We could add to what was already regarded as an anomalous list of categories, which was riddled with holes and difficulties if we chose to examine it carefully, a couple more equally anomalous categories. After all, what of the person who has to go to nurse a sick aunt? That would be a perfectly legitimate reason for being away from home, but, unless such a person were prepared to claim that it was a holiday—it would not, on the face of it, appear to be much of a holiday — that person would be deprived of his vote. That is clearly not right.

We therefore decided — and I am glad that the Committee accepts this—to sweep all that away. Clause 7(1)(a), which appears to be small and insubstantial—much like many of the others in the Bill—is substantial. It establishes one overall basis for the availability of absent voting facilities by requiring the registration officer to grant an application for absent voting if he is satisfied that the applicant's circumstances on the date of the poll will be, or are likely to be, such that he cannot reasonably be expected to vote in person at the polling station allotted or likely to be allotted to him under the appropriate rules.

It seemed to us compelling that if we established that that one clearly understood test had the application set out, countersigned with a penal sanction attached for the first time, this was an appropriate way — indeed, the only way—of moving forward, consistent with the objective of widening the franchise.

Our colleagues in the Northern Ireland Office had to advise us on the likely effect of the widening of the franchise on the Province, against the background of concern about the damage that would be done to the Province if certain parties grew to prominence as a result of massive electoral abuse. Those arguments were sufficiently compelling for Parliament in the Elections (Northern Ireland) Act 1985 to approve a measure that recognised the nature and extent of organised malpractice in Northern Ireland, and to set out a different set of safeguards on the personal exercise of the franchise that will come into effect at the next election.

I was grateful for the recognition by the right hon. Member for South Down, with his customary fairness, of the good faith of Northern Ireland Ministers. They considered that the effect of the measure might be nullified if there was such a broadening of absent voting categories that it enabled many more people to avoid the necessity of going to the polling station and complying with the new arrangements in the statute, with a consequent continuation of malpractice. It was on that basis, and in good faith, that clause 7 was drafted so that the extension of the absent voting facilities, which was to be granted to Great Britain, would not be granted in Northern Ireland.

On Second Reading, the right hon. Member for South Down and his colleagues made clear, as did the Opposition, their concern about our proposal. At the end of my speech in reply to the debate, the right hon. Gentleman asked me whether, as the Bill progressed, we would be prepared to justify, case by case and detail by detail, the reason why the differences were being included in the Bill. I willingly assented to that request, because I realised that we would have to do that if we were to persuade Parliament that our proposal was necessary.

We have had extensive discussions with the Opposition, with Northern Ireland Members and with Ministers from the Northern Ireland Office about the pros and cons of our proposal. I am happy to say that, as a result of those deliberations, it has been decided that the extension of absent voting facilities which we have proposed for Britain should apply also to Northern Ireland. I am pleased that that is to the liking of all parts of the Committee and I am glad that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and I were able to play a part in bringing that about.

I should like to accept in principle—I am constantly advised by parliamentary counsel that there is always a better way of doing something than any mere hon. Member ever manages to put on the amendment paper——

Mr. Kaufman: I do not quarrel with what I think the Minister is about to say, but perhaps he, or one of his colleagues, will explain to us why, if parliamentary counsel are such superior draftspersons to the rest of us, the Government are having to use the Bill to make several more amendments to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Mr. Mellor: I seem to recall the right hon. Gentleman making a similar point when we were making our fourth attempt to get right certain arcane details of overseas forces disciplinary legislation. By the fourth attempt, I was beginning to run out of reasons.

I should like to accept in principle amendments Nos. 37, 41 and 43, which would remove any restrictions on the exercise of the full absent voting facilities in Northern Ireland. I undertake to bring forward on Report amendments to that end that meet with the approval of parliamentary counsel.

Another group of amendments among those under discussion would not make the arrangements in Great Britain and Northern Ireland the same, and I imagine that the right hon. Member for South Down will not wish to press those.

It is necessary to recognise, as I think we all do, that there is a bona fide reason for being troubled about how the new arrangements will work in practice, though we all hope that they will be trouble-free throughout the United Kingdom and especially in Northern Ireland. However, I hope that the Committee agrees that it would be appropriate to have provisions available in the legislation, which could readily be brought into force if, contrary to the expectations of Northern Ireland Members, there is substantial abuse.

It is important that, after appropriate consultation, the Government should have available a ready way of bringing into force restrictions that would enable the abuse to be corrected. Therefore, we shall wish later to table amendments to introduce a power for absent voters to be required to apply in person, with proof of identity. That power would be exercisable throughout the United Kingdom, or in any part of it. Of course, we hope that it would never be necessary to use it, but the power would be available and could be introduced by affirmative resolution.

Secondly, we shall table an amendment to enable the Secretary of State to introduce special arrangements for Northern Ireland electors who would normally vote by post to vote in person at special polling stations under rules contained in a new schedule to the Bill. Again, we would not intend to introduce that power, which would also be subject to affirmative resolution, unless problems arose.

Those fail-safe devices have enabled us to assure our colleagues in the Northern Ireland Office that the mechanisms to which they rightly attach importance in other legislation will be maintained and that action will be taken speedily if our wishes and hopes are dashed and problems arise as a result of the widening of the availability of absent voting facilities.

The right hon. Member for South Down has also tabled amendments Nos. 47 to 49, and I think that I may be able to do more than he is asking for in those amendments. They cover a detailed subject, and I should like to go through the existing arrangements, the arrangements that the right hon. Gentleman proposes and the arrangements that we shall propose.

We are dealing with the proxy's right to apply for an absent vote at a particular election. He is exercising someone else's proxy, but cannot do it in person and, therefore, requires an absent vote.

The Bill gives proxies the right to vote by post at particular elections throughout the United Kingdom, but on a different basis for Great Britain and for Northern Ireland. Proxies in Northern Ireland may vote by post if they live in a different district ward from the voters who appointed them. British proxies may apply if they cannot reasonably be expected to vote in person.

The different treatment reflects the general difference in treatment of postal and proxy voting in the Bill. The amendments of the right hon. Member for South Down seek to allow all proxies throughout the United Kingdom to vote by post if they qualify under the present Northern Ireland position or under the Great Britain provision.

We wish to table on Report an amendment that will go further in the direction that the right hon. Member for South Down wishes to go. We shall introduce arrangements to allow all proxies throughout the United Kingdom to apply to vote by post at a particular election if they cannot reasonably be expected to vote in person at the polling station allotted to the electors who appointed them. There will be a common rule throughout the United Kingdom, which I think will be helpful.

In addition, our amendment will allow proxies to apply for an indefinite period if they live in a different area from the electors who appointed them. That is intended to meet the needs of overseas electors and service voters, who cannot find a proxy in their own constituency, but find one elsewhere. I hope that our re-think is acceptable to the right hon. Member for South Down and his colleagues.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I am grateful, as, I am sure, is the Committee, to the Under-Secretary for his careful and measured statement.

I refer first to what the hon. Gentleman dealt with last. In principle, his proposal on amendments Nos. 47 to 49 is self-evidently both simpler than, and preferable to, what would have been the result of our amendments. Subject, therefore, to being able to consider them when they are tabled subsequently, I welcome those proposals. There is no question of my seeking to move the amendments today.

In regard to the major matter, I am grateful both to the Government, and to all others who have concurred with the Government, for restoring the elector in Northern Ireland to the same position as his opposite number in Great Britain. I wish only to allude to the qualifications which the Under-Secretary of State set out. I am sure he would not expect my hon. Friends or myself to offer a verdict on those without having been able to consider them in actual terms. Should we, after considering them, feel it necessary to register our opposition to the principle behind them, as we registered our opposition to the principle of the Elections (Northern Ireland) Bill earl er this Session, I am sure that would not be taken in derogation of the major agreement at which we have so happily arrived on the main point of substance.

The proposal to build into a United Kingdom Act of Parliament the means to vary its application in a part of the United Kingdom by affirmative order is not in itself something which is attractive to representatives of Northern Ireland nor, I think, could it be attractive to members of the Committee as a whole. We act upon the principle that we deal with the franchise by way of legislation and in no other way, and there is a degree of inconsistency in building into such legislation the power to deal with the franchise otherwise than by legislation. That contradiction is inherent in the treaty which has been arrived at between the Home Office and the Northern Ireland Office.

I know that Her Majesty's Government are one and indivisible—that is confirmed by an eloquent gesture on the part of the Home Secretary. There is no gap between one Department and another into which a man could insert the point of a pin. Nevertheless, there seemd to be a trace rather of the voice of the Northern Ireland Office than of the Home Office in certain parts of what the Under-Secretary of State had to say on the amendments. My hon. Friends and I, while reserving the right to restate our objection when the proposals are brought forward and to put forward other considerations in relation to them when we can study them, are happy to accept the major assurance that has been given.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 39, in page 10, line 12, at end insert

'and, in respect of a Parliamentary general election, that he cannot reasonably be expected to vote in person at the polling station allotted or likely to be allotted to him under the appropriate rules in any other Parliamentary constituency in which he is eligible to vote in Parliamentary elections.'.

The effect of clause 7 and other clauses is to widen eligibility for postal and proxy votes. That has been the theme of many of the debates on specific aspects. More people will be entitled to postal and proxy votes. In general, I support that principle. I have sought to qualify it only in particular respects, another of which will come up in the next group of amendments.

One area where the extension of postal votes has a bearing concerns those who have multiple registration in several constituencies. This is not the amendment on which I would seek to address myself to the general issue of whether people should be able to have votes in several parliamentary constituencies. The question that arises on this amendment is simply whether the ease of postal votes will make it easier for them to transfer their votes at will between the several constituencies in which they may be registered.

When I addressed the Parliamentary Under-Secretary by letter on the broader issue of multiple registration, he replied on 14 May 1984—an illustration of how long these discussions have been going on—in these terms:

"an elector registered twice may not, as you say in your seventh paragraph, 'transfer votes at will between constituencies'. In general, he has to vote in the constituency where he is physically present on polling day."

The effect of the extension of postal votes is to remove the presumption that in general the elector has to vote in the constituency where he is physically present on polling day. One cannot say that that general restraint applies to the person registered in several places when all he has to do to obtain a postal vote is to indicate that he cannot reasonably be expected to vote in person at the polling station allotted to him. There is no presumption there that he will have to vote in the place in which he is physically present.

The bearing of the extension of postal votes upon multiple registration will not merely be to make it easier, for example, for those who have holiday homes but whose place of work is some distance away, to register for a postal vote. It will also, of course, make it easier for their wives, and any other members of the family who lay claim upon that as one of the places in which they are registered to vote, to apply for postal votes. The test is so much broader than before that it will be relatively easy to indicate that there are reasonable grounds why one cannot vote at a particular polling station in a particular constituency.

I hope the Minister will consider this carefully. I submit that it was never part of his intention in widening postal votes to enable someone to say—I hope the Minister will not be distracted by the hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) because I am addressing a detailed point—that, because he is resident on polling day in another constituency in which he is also registered, he should thereby be entitled to a postal vote in the first of the constituencies in which he is registered. If someone is able to vote in another constituency in which he is registered, I do not think that the privilege of having the postal vote should be extended to him.

The object of extending postal votes was to make it easier for people who would not otherwise be able to vote to do so. The greatest motivation for extending postal votes was to assist people on holiday because many people have been disfranchised. That is not the case when someone has a house in the Lake District and a house in London and whose reason for not voting in the Lake District is that he has, for no particular reason, decided to be present in London, where he is also registered to vote.

I do not think that it was ever the Minister's intention to facilitate the switching of votes at will between several constituencies in which people are registered. If I did not think that it was not his intention I might be charging him with attempting to behave partially on the presumption that there might be more people owning houses in several constituencies who could thereby apply for votes at will between several constituencies. The decision to switch votes between constituencies can be highly political if one constituency is marginal and one has a safe majority for the party that the voter wishes to support. Multiple registration confers upon some voters a much greater freedom to use their votes where they think they would be most effective.

We shall argue later whether other considerations justify that, but it is no part of the purpose of extending postal votes to make it easier for people to switch votes at will, otherwise the Minister would not have written to me as he did, saying:

"In general a voter has to vote in the constituency where he is physically present on polling day."

Therefore, I ask the Minister to consider carefully the arguments I have put in support of the amendment. If we do not do something about this, the extension of postal votes will be put to a purpose for which it was not intended.

7.30 pm

Mr. Winnick: I am not persuaded by the arguments put forward by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). As he admitted, on most occasions he argues in favour of extending the right to postal votes. We must wonder whether the motive behind the amendment is self-interest on the part of the Liberal party and the SDP.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Has my hon. Friend noticed that SDP Members have not attended today's debate? Nor did they attend Second Reading.

Mr. Winnick: I expect that that is because there is no publicity mileage in today's debate. Therefore, SDP Members have no reason to be present. I am sure that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed privately agrees with me.

We should hesitate to remove a right unless we are persuaded that there is widespread abuse of it. I doubt that the hon. Gentleman could show such abuse, or give any good reasons for changing the present system. The categories of people who, under present regulations, are entitled to register in a number of constituencies are well known to hon. Members.

If students are at college when an election is held, currently they can apply for a postal vote at their home address on the ground they cannot get to the polling station because of their studies. Similarly, if an election is called when the college is on vacation and the student has, perhaps, found part-time employment, he can apply for a postal vote at his college address. I see no reason why that practice should not continue. There is certainly no evidence of widespread abuse.

I am surprised that the Liberal party wants to introduce such a restriction—it is somewhat illiberal. There must be far greater evidence of abuse before we agree to a change that will harm a number of people who currently register in a number of constituencies. At the end of the day, they are entitled to only one vote, and that is an important point to remember. Simply because they are registered in a number of constituencies does not give them more rights than other citizens. The hon. Gentleman is really objecting to the fact that someone can decide whether to vote in one constituency or another. Perhaps the Liberal party believes that that is not in its interests.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman should talk to members of the Labour party in such areas as the Lake District, the coastal areas of eastern England, constituencies such as those formerly represented by the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson),

[Mr. Beith]

Cornwall, Devon and many others where the Labour party has argued strongly that the right conferred by multiple registration is one that accrues especially to those who own several properties.

Mr. Winnick: I stand by my remarks. I believe that the Labour party will oppose the amendment. The hon. Gentleman objects to the fact that a person has a choice. I see no reason to change the present system.

Mr. William Powell: The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has introduced a jarring note into our debate. For some hours we have proceeded on the basis of wide agreement among all parties on the principles and on how they should be put into effect by the Bill. The hon. Gentleman has introduced a substantial and important measure of disagreement. It is a jarring note in what has otherwise been a most impressive and satisfactory discussion of the issues.

I have been conscious that the Rockingham Whigs have been in situ and I have been waiting for their contribution — almost trying to tempt them into a measure of disagreement. Alas, that has not happened.

Two factors underlie the amendment. As the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) said in his admirable contribution, we are talking about the principle that a person should be allowed to cast only one vote. I am sure that that principle will find universal acceptance in the Committee. However, we live in a world where, because it is not possible to introduce substantial changes to our registers between the dates on which they are drawn up, it is necessary to allow people to register in more than one place. It is legitimate, even satisfactory, that, for example, students should vote either at their university or at their home. It would be wrong for the Bill to withdraw that right. Other groups are also exceptions to the general rule that persons should be registered in only one place. We should not seek to limit the opportunities of students and other people to register where it is convenient.

Wherever possible, voting should be in person. However, there must be exceptions to that, and we are enlarging those exceptions in the Bill. However, the fundamental principle should remain that people vote in person. If a massive number of people voted by post at every election votes might be cast fraudulently on behalf of people who were dead or who had left the country.

As I have, alas, had occasion to say from time to time, we live in a age where there is a more mobile population —people move house more often. The turnover on the electoral roll is, perhaps, higher than it is has been at any time. Estimates for the electoral roll about to come into operation in my constituency show that there has been a 12 per cent. turnover in the electorate since the last electoral roll came into operation a year ago. I should think that a turnover figure of between 8 per cent. and 12 per cent. would be typical of what is happening in the southern part of the country.

There is an enormous movement of population going on all the time, with people moving not just from one street to another in the same community but from one part of the nation to another. People move from, say, Yorkshire to Northamptonshire; some who are dissatisfied with their representation in Northamptonshire move to Yorkshire, where they know that an admirable representation is available to them.

Until we make provision for people, when they move, to change their electoral registration from one constituency to another—we shall not do that in this measure—it is necessary to preserve those exceptions that exist, as outlined by the hon. Member for Walsall, North, in our law. They are necessary until we are able to develop what might otherwise be called a rolling register. The principal defect of the Bill is that we are not making provision for a rolling register, but I will not develop that theme now. I have no doubt that it would be wise for the Committee to reject the amendment.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I do not see the need for the clause, which seems to deny one the freedom to vote, in the constituency of one's choice, one of our last rights which we value greatly—[Interruption.] People will be eligible to vote in only one nominated place instead of in more than one.

I say that because I am particularly concerned about those at university, who are, rightly, on the registers near their universities and colleges, and, equally, are on the registers in the constituencies of their parents homes. They should have the opportunity to nominate in which one they will vote.

I have read the amendment nine times and still find difficulty in understanding it. Our main concern should be the reliability and accuracy of the electoral register. As my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) pointed out, the new registers are due out shortly. Checking them carefully will be the best way of avoiding fraud—for example, the fraud of people claiming to represent people they do not represent.

I have previously alleged in Parliament that in certain constituencies people have tended to vote more than once. There is a motto, "Vote early, vote often." That concerns me greatly, and that is why I am in favour of giving people more opportunity to vote in person.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Corby said, many people move about the country. They should be entitled to vote in the constituency either in which they formerly lived or in which they pay rates. Whether or not rates are important in relation to the subject under discussion, a person who pays rates should have a vote.

We must do all that we can to avoid fraud being committed—of people voting more than once. To that end, amendment No. 39 is strangely worded and, I should have thought, unnecessary. It is unfair that university students should suddenly be denied the opportunity to vote in the constituencies in which they are based.

I have counted 36 constituencies with smaller majorities than mine.

Mr. William Powell: I hope that my hon. Friend has not left out Erdington and Wrexham.

Mr. Bruinvels: There is no doubt that, in such circumstances, the postal vote can play a vital part in deciding who and which party is returned.

Mr. Beith: Could that be why the speech which one usually hears from the hon. Member who normally occupies the place from which the hon. Gentleman is speaking — the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman)—is in precisely opposite terms to the speech that the hon. Gentleman is making? The hon. Member for Lancaster has frequently argued for the abolition of multiple registration.

Nothing in the amendment would deprive any student, or anybody else, of the right to register in more than one place. It would simply not grant the right to exercise a postal vote merely on the basis that the person concerned had to be in the other place in which he was also registered to vote.

Mr. Bruinvels: I cannot be expected to answer for my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman), whether she speaks today or tomorrow, from wherever she speaks. I try my best to represent the views of my constituents, to put what I believe to be the right view from these Benches and to speak in accordance with my conscience.

The second part of that intervention by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) was patronising. A university student in the position that I described should have the right to vote. Other than saying that, I shall not be led down what I regard as a suspicious road which does not bear on the subject under discussion.

We are discussing the whole issue of the right to vote and the need to ensure that an absent vote is used properly. Part of that right includes one's freedom to vote in whatever constituency one chooses. Our main concern must be to ensure that nobody votes more than once in any election. For that reason, I cannot support the amendment.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I appreciate the point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and others about the need to ensure that people who have legitimate cause to have addresses in different places should be allowed to vote. That includes students and those who, in the course of their work, have two genuinely different addresses at which they live. In that event, they should be permitted to vote in one of them.

I have some sympathy with the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) in relation to the holiday home factor. In my constituency, people have holiday homes in some of the attractive seaside villages. We know of people—generally Conservatives, I suspect —who are resident in safe Tory seats elsewhere, but who register themselves as voters in the coastal villages of my constituency where their holiday homes are situated. To add insult to injury, they do not even turn up to cast their votes at the local polling station, but claim postal votes. In the event, most of them have wasted their time, because the boundary commissions have made that activity a futile gesture. However, it was an irritant in its time.

I do not see why legislation should allow people who have the privilege of a holiday home in another area to select tactically which is the most advantageous constituency in which to vote. That abuse goes on in some areas, including, no doubt, the west country and parts of Scotland and Wales.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed has raised a legitimate point which should be distinguished from the aspect relating to students, who have a legitimate reason to live for a large part of the year at the location of their university. Accordingly, they should be able to vote there.

Sir John Farr: I regret what the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said. He is a nice person and I have known him a long time. It is totally alien to his nature and open character for him to move such a suspicious amendment. I know that the hon. Gentleman is tackling the problem in a hopeless way.

My constituency includes the eight or nine large halls of Leicester university at Oadby. A few elections ago there was thought to be a polling irregularity. The matter was taken to court, and eventually we went to the High Court. The agents of the other two parties and I, together with the county executive at the court, had the authority to inspect the electoral register for the wards in Oadby where the Leicester university students voted. At that time there were about 4,600 people on the register. Remarkably—this proves my confidence in the natural honesty of people in Leicestershire and proves also the error of the path taken by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed — although polling day was a Thursday and the university was in session, only one in 10 people on the roll voted in Harborough.

Students do not waste their votes. I had no way of telling, other than by talking to the students a week or two later, where their votes had gone. All those to whom I talked said they had gone home to vote. There was nothing suspicious about that. We had the privilege of examining the votes cast by the people on the register for the wards in Oadby, and only about one in 10 of the students voted in my constituency. Nationally, at least 70 per cent. of the students turned out to vote. Therefore, one can assume that 90 per cent. of those who voted did so from their homes or by postal vote.

I regret the fact that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed has introduced this amendment. Apart from the sheer cost of establishing a centralised electoral register so that the checking of multiple registrations can be carried out effectively, I must point out that the whole idea verges on the fantastic and seems to come from never-never-land.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed is typical of other Liberals I have met outside the House. They are all nice people and have the best of intentions, but they do not amount to much when it comes to the count.

Mr. Mellor: The evening becomes more entertaining as it goes on. The point made by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) is perfectly legitimate. Whether multiple registration should be permitted is plainly an issue. The hon. Gentleman is addressing a consequence of multiple registration, but he is fully entitled to introduce into the argument the fact that it is consistent to object, as the hon. Gentleman and a number of others do, to multiple registration and to argue that the manifestation of multiple registration, which gives a voter a choice of constituencies in which to vote, should not be permitted. Although I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman, I accept the internal logic of his argument and believe that he has a perfectly sensible point of view. One cannot say that the arguments go totally one way.

I believe that it is not inappropriate that we should stick by the test that has been established for so long—one may register in a constituency where the address has a substantial degree of permanence. It follows that some people will manage to establish, to the satisfaction of the ERO, that they have in more than one place an address that has a substantial degree of permanence. I am not sure whether many people are registered in more than two places, but I understand that there are objections to people being registered in more than one place. Some of those objections are derived from principle and some from a light coating of principle and a feeling that party disadvantage will be involved. I understand that.

We have all been in politics for many years. We have all been introduced to party professionals and others who have myths about the effects of various electoral rules on various parties. On looking at the swings and roundabouts of the various people who are registered in more than one constituency, I dare say that there is no more likely to be party advantage in such registration than there is in having polling hours between 9 am and 10 pm, as Dr. David Butler asserts. I know that many people think that there are advantages and disadvantages.

I do not believe that a feasible or practical way has been devised to make it a practical proposition to prevent multiple registration. I do not think that multiple registration is objectionable, provided the substantial degree of permanence test is satisfied and provided that the person concerned exercises his franchise in only one place.

If people have a stake in a community they are entitled to exercise their vote. One would not need to live in East Lothian very long to realise that one had a sufficient stake in the community not to want to be represented by the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson). If I had a holiday home in his constituency — not being a landowner like him I do not run two holiday homes—I dare say that I would be driven irresistibly to that conclusion. It is difficult to establish tests.

Mr. Corbett: He has a flat in Putney.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman might have several flats in Putney. When one asks whether a person's degree of permanence in one place is greater than his degree of permanence in another place one introduces complications and justiciable issues of a kind that would make what should be the relatively simple process of registering to vote a difficult process.

Even if one accepts multiple registration, to hedge it with the type of restrictions that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed seeks to impose in his amendment would be complicated. The hon. Gentleman made the point—I can see where that point springs from—that multiple registration could be seen as facilatating the exercise of a vote by a person who would not physically be in the constituency at the time of the election. It would be likely to facilitate his vote in an area where his degree of permanence was less than in the other place where he was registered. I understand why the hon. Gentleman said that. Surprisingly, the answer to that point was given by the hon. Member for East Lothian who, in an aside, made the revealing point that many people who have holiday homes in his constituency have the temerity not to be in the constituency on polling day when the dreadful opportunity arises to vote in person for him. Nevertheless, such people obtain a postal vote so that they can vote against him from a convenient distance where they are safe from his wrath. That reveals the essential truth of this situation.

It is not only in East Lothian where there is a particularly good reason to try to get a vote in elections, but in many other constituencies. Someone who was once on the register but is also registered at an address elsewhere can obtain a postal vote by applying for such a vote in the constituency in which he will not be on polling day by stating that he will not be physically present on the grounds of change of residence. Technically speaking, he may still be resident at the other address, but if he applies for a postal vote on change of address grounds he is not required to produce any evidence that he is no longer resident at the qualifying address, and the registration officer has no means of investigating the matter. Therefore, in practice, registration officers grant postal voting applications on the grounds of change of residence on demand. That is the reason why I do not think that the change that we are making will, in practical terms, significantly increase the number of people who are registered in more than one place obtaining a postal vote to facilitate their voting in the constituency in which they will not physically be on polling day.

In any event, if one accepts, as I do, that there is a case for multiple registration, one is not entitled to hang around the neck of that any inhibitions upon the individual casting his vote in the constituency where it seems to him, for a diversity of reasons, most appropriate to do so. Actually stopping him from doing so would be difficult. Let us say that, as well as having my residence in Putney, I borrowed some money from the hon. Member for East Lothian, who probably has a lot of it around ready for such needy causes, and purchased a holiday home on his estate. I suspect that there are some nice dells and fields on his estate where one could build a convenient cottage. Being an unpleasant person, I might be determined once I got there to vote against him, and I could be impeded by the fact that Parliament had had the lack of wisdom to accept the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. It would still be difficult for the returning officer in East Lothian to test my assertion that I was not capable of voting in Putney, where I was resident, and therefore had to have a postal vote for East Lothian.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed accepts that if one is able to demonstrate that one is incapable of voting in person at either of the constituencies in which one is registered one is then entitled to decide in which one one would cast one's vote. How does the returning officer for East Lothian react? He is perhaps, also living on the hon. Gentleman's estate, is beholden to him and therefore does not wish to facilitate postal voting in the constituency because he realises that, as I am obviously an intelligent man, I shall not be casting my vote for the hon. Member. However, it would be difficult to show that I would not be capable of voting in Putney, whereas he might have a chance when dealing with East Lothian.

For all those reasons, I hope that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed will not press his amendment.

Mr. Beith: I can relieve the Minister of one problem. Were he to obtain a delightful residence on the estate of the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), he would find himself in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), not that of the hon. Member for East Lothian. The Minister might then feel even more strongly that he would wish to change his residence on party grounds. However, that is not what we are talking about.

This amendment, as I sought to argue at the beginning, is not an excuse for an argument about whether there should be multiple registration. The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) seemed to be saying that, but in doing so he overlooked the fact that, when the Labour party gave its evidence to the Select Committee on Home Affairs, it said, in words that brook of no misinterpretation:

"The Labour party would support a change in the law to outlaw multiple registration."

The silence from the Labour Front Bench, which is occupied by one of the members of the Select Committee and one who listened to that evidence, seems to suggest embarrassment. No one wishes openly to contradict the hon. Member for Walsall, North, but his is clearly not the view of the Labour party. I agree with those hon. Members who say that it is difficult to know which Labour party one is speaking about. Walworth road was clear in its view, and this view is supported by at least one occupant of the Opposition Front Bench.

The Minister produced one genuine technical objection to the amendment, which I recognise. That is the legitimate change of residence case, which gives rise to a technical difficulty if the amendment is passed in its present form. Where I do not agree with him in the change of residence case is in his apparent implication that the sort of people to whom he referred would readily use a change of residence basis to secure the vote that they wanted if they were otherwise precluded by this amendment. He implied that people would keep saying that they had changed their London home to their country residence one year and back again the next, each time so that they could obtain a vote. Conservative Members are at one stage saying that we are dealing with people who are scrupulous, fair and honest and the next minute that we are dealing with people who are imagined to engage in the most dubious procedures.

There is nothing suspicious about the wording of the amendment, which sets out a test to be put to the person applying for a postal vote. Like many other things in the test for a postal vote in the Bill, it places a considerable onus and trust on the applicant and gives the returning officer fairly limited opportunities to check what is being set before him. This is the case in general when applying for a postal vote, which is why I shall seek to probe the matter in the next group of amendments, because we are taking a great deal on trust.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman will find in the regulations that the returning officer will have more power to refuse and a better basis for doing so, because the reason why a person states that he will not be available to vote in person on the day will have to be clearly stated, and it will have to be countersigned by another person. We have yet to determine who that person should be and whether there should be any limit on those who can countersign. For the first time, there is a penal sanction. People will put themselves at risk of appearing in court if they say something that is demonstrably false.

Mr. Beith: The Minister is unlocking his treasure chest in advance. These are the jewels that should be brought out when we come to consider on a later amendment what sort of counter-signature should feature in the Bill or the regulations. In these electoral matters, people are taken on trust to some extent and are asked to make certain assertions. That is the only reasonable way to proceed.

Conservative Members have several times suggested that there would be no way in which one could check on the extent of multiple registrations, or about applications for postal votes from those registered in more than one place. If that is so, they were talking glibly about dual voting. If there is no way to check anything in multiple registration, there is no way to establish that somebody is voting twice. That is the weakness in our system, and the Minister needs to pay some attention to what should be done about this.

In a number of parts of the country, attempts are made by the parties to establish whether voting twice is taking place, but the process is difficult. I think that the parties have gone further than the formal machinery of the returning officers has done to check whether double voting is taking place. I believe that double voting occurs very rarely. I should be surprised to find that it happens at all. However, we do not know, and the absence of any way to check some of these things is not something that I would hold up as a virtue of the system or as something from which we should step back and on which we should admit defeat and accept that nothing should be done. Dual voting is the kind of electoral offence against which we should have some protection and some check.

I have been criticised for talking about this amendment in rather broad partisan terms. Hon. Members have short memories. I opened the debate in the narrowest sense and sought to present a logical case about the way in which postal voting should be circumscribed. Scarcely an hon. Member who has spoken has not said something containing at least as much partisan interest in the matter as anything that I might have expressed. One has only to go to some of the constituencies that I know and see the extent to which potential second-home postal voters are circulating to encourage their application for a second vote to realise that there is substantial partisan interest in this.

Both the Conservative and Labour parties, when giving evidence to the Select Committee, accepted that there was a problem and that multiple registration should be ended. We should confront multiple registration when we come to that part of the Bill which deals with it. Postal voting is a narrower issue. There is a technical objection to the amendment but it could be overcome by redrafting.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 40, in page 10, line 16, at end insert—

'(d) the applicant has supplied to the returning officer a certificate of the relevant circumstances which has been countersigned by a Member of Parliament, Justice of the Peace, Minister of Religion, lawyer, bank officer, established civil servant, school teacher, police officer, doctor or a person of similar standing known personally to the applicant for at least two years.'.

This is a probing amendment to enable the Minister to tell us more about the regulations. The purpose of the amendment is to provide a system of countersignature. The amendment sets out the people who should be allowed to do the countersigning. The list is familiar because it is the same as that for signing passport applications. Hon. Members must have signed many such applications. It is by no means the end of the road in terms of what should be in the bill or the regulations and it is probably best to deal with the matter in regulations.

The Bill amends the "prescribed requirements" for an absent vote. Schedule 1(7) provides:

"Provision as to the evidence which shall or may be required, or be deemed sufficient or conclusive evidence, in connection with a person's application to vote by proxy or to vote by post as elector or as proxy."

The new requirements may include countersigning, but we do not yet know how extensive the change will be.

It is necessary to hedge postal voting with some checks and limitations for all the reasons already advanced. A

[Mr. David Mellor]

I endorse what was said by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs). That was a major operation, carried out successfully because of the happy chance that the polling station at which those people voted is a modern community centre which had been built with the disabled in mind. Although there were considerable difficulties in getting the severely handicapped people to the polling station, once they were there they were able to vote with relative ease. There are other polling stations in my constituency and in other constituencies where that would not have been possible. We have rightly been addressing our minds to the consideration of how we can make the position easier.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): My hon. Friend has talked about the desirable accuracy of the electoral register. He mentioned the regrettable incident which occurred in his constituency at the last election. Similar incidents occurred in other constituencies. On page 7 the White Paper recommends a form of computerisation:

"All authorities should be encouraged and if necessary assisted to install and to use modern technology to ensure the accuracy of their ERs."

I am sure that would meet with the approval of my hon. Friend. Therefore, would not he think it a good idea that a new clause to that effect should be debated later?

Mr. Mellor: That is a different point. The point I was making was not that they were not on the register but that their applications for postal votes had gone astray. It is part of our policy — most of this should be done administratively — to try to ensure that modern administrative equipment is used in one of the most difficult jobs that people in town halls have to do— ensuring that the register is properly compiled and accurately maintained. A great deal of work has been done, including seminars with electoral registration officers on, for instance, enabling more members of minority communities to be registered. We have been making a determined effort, following the report on the extent of inaccuracies in the register, to improve it. I hope we shall be seen to be successful.

Facilitating the exercise of the franchise in person by the disabled has considerably concerned my right hon. and learned Friend. When he was Minister of State at the Home Office for the first two years of the last Parliament, he had responsibility for the job that I now do—special responsibility for electoral law. As a result of his initiative, a circular was issued in 1981 advising returning officers that the Treasury would meet half the cost of portable ramps to help electors in wheelchairs enter polling stations. The other half of the cost would be paid by the local authority. That circular has not, perhaps, been as widely noted as it could have been, and I am glad to emphasise its existence today. That was a significant step in the right direction, although not all disabled people require wheelchairs. That initiative recognised the financial implications; we would like more local authorities to take up that provision, and perhaps hon. Members could remind their returning officers of it.

Without widening the debate unreasonably, I want to say that the Government have a general policy, which they have sought to follow with thoroughness, to improve access to buildings for the disabled. The Department of Health and Social Security has set up committees to investigate in detail access to public buildings. In a trail-blazing clause, the Secretary of State for the Environment inserted in a piece of legislation in 1970 a requirement that new buildings should be constructed with access for the disabled. That represented a material step forward.

The difficulty faced by returning officers is that they must have a polling station within each polling district. They must use the facilities available, many of which are schools built in an era before the interests of the disabled were paramount. To some extent, those buildings can be adapted for access by the use of ramps. Certainly returning officers should not gratuitously seek to make the plight of the disabled more difficult by, for example, placing a polling station on the second floor of a building when it would be just as simple to place it on the ground floor. If there is a choice of building, the building chosen should be the one that provides easiest access for the disabled, people with heart conditions and those who have difficulty in climbing stairs. We hope that exhortation alone will achieve that aim. Certainly the Government have been playing their part in that.

My right hon. and learned Friend and I feel that a case has been made today for a provision similar to that in new clause 13, which would require returning officers to have regard to the needs of disabled electors before designating a polling station. It is no criticism of my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter to say that I cannot accept his new clause lock, stock and barrel, because it has been prepared without the advice of parliamentary counsel. However, if I say that I am minded to bring forward an amendment on Report, I hope that he will feel that he has done a useful and worthwhile job in raising the issue today. In the face of such widespread agreement, it would be curmudgeonly of the Government not to do so, especially in view of the commitment to the issue that we have demonstrated over a number of years.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Is my hon. Friend aware that polling often takes place at schools where the remainder of the school functions as normal? In one part of my constituency, a polling station was designated at the back of the school in an outbuilding. What would be my hon. Friend's guidance in such a case, as the school obviously continues to function throughout polling day? Can guidance be given to returning officers to place the polling station in a classroom at the front of the school so that the disabled do not have to try to reach the rear of the building to vote?

5.15 pm

Mr. Mellor: The proposition embraced in new clause 13 would place returning officers under an obligation to make the best possible arrangements for disabled voters. It is then a matter for those concerned locally with the matter to make representations if they think that that rule is not being followed.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): Any instructions given to returning officers must filter down to the presiding officers, who often choose the sites in the buildings for booths and ballot boxes. The Minister, with his usual courtesy and sympathy, will no doubt accept that point. We must ensure that the polling station is placed in the most accessible part of the building.

Mr. Mellor: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman. Any duty placed on returning officers will also be a duty on their staff, and that would include presiding officers. The returning officers must ensure that the presiding officers do not take decisions contrary to the duties laid upon them. These are very local matters, which is why I stress again that, although we can lay a framework placing an obligation on returning officers, it is the people in the locality who must act on any suggestion that that obligation is being breached by insensitive placing of polling stations.

I share some of the reservations expressed by the hon. Member for Battersea about amendment No. 32. I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his place on the Opposition Front Bench. I have teased him a little that his services on the Select Committee have caused him to be put into purdah on this Bill. The invisible export of his hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) to Sri Lanka has brought the hon. Gentleman to the Front Bench. However, I gather that his hon. Friend is due to return.

We must ensure that the polling station is made as accessible as possible for the disabled and I believe that considerable strides forward can be made in that direction. The difficulty with making arrangements for the disabled to vote at polling stations other than their own is that it cuts across what was eloquently described by the hon. Member for Caernarfon, when he said that the disabled want to exercise their franchise rights in as normal a way as possible. Obviously, to go to someone else's polling station is abnormal. To accept that would be almost an admission that we cannot make the overwhelming majority of polling stations accessible for the disabled.

Since 1887, those working at the polling stations on election day have had the right to vote in polling stations other than their home station. It is an informal arrangement because it does not rely on there being a printed list of the people available at the polling station at which they cast their vote. They are placed on trust—if they cast their vote in one polling station they will not then go to their home polling station and cast again. I am not suggesting that disabled people would take the opportunity offered by amendment No. 32 to cast their vote twice. But as there is no structure within which to take wider than the limited application — applying to police officers, presiding officers, staff and so on—the right to vote at another polling station, it would be difficult to make an extension without building in some kind of administrative infrastructure which might be more trouble that it would be worth.

I suggest that, having made progress by common consent in the direction of the sentiments expressed in new clause 13, we leave amendment No. 32 for the moment in the hope that the accessibility of the individual's polling station might be so improved that we shall not need to look at the necessity to go further and adopt the alternative scheme that amendment No. 32 suggests.

Mr. Bermingham: Will the Minister agree that the number of persons involved in the suggestion embodied in amendment No. 32 would be small, so that there would not be the degree of administrative difficulty that he foresees? We are thinking of a limited number of cases, such as that of my friend whose nearest polling station is only 70 yards distant but is in a different polling district. Under the scheme proposed in the amendment, the polling station would be nominated at the time of application. Thus, few of the difficulties to which the Minister referred would arise. Perhaps the hon. Gentlemen will give the matter more thought between now and Report, and I shall write him on the subject.

Mr. Mellor: I always take the hon. Gentleman seriously and will consider anything about which he writes to me. We have made such progress in the direction of improvements in relation to what one might term the home polling station that I am not sure that I shall be likely to change my mind about amendment No. 32, and I hope that I carry hon. Members with me in uttering a word of caution about that amendment.

I hope that it has been abundantly demonstrated in our debates on the Bill generally that we are interested in trying to carry as wide a consensus as possible on the proposals that are being made about the rules by which we get to this place and by which a great many more do not get here.

I am glad that the hon. Member for Battersea focused on new clause 33 because it embraces an important concept. Because of the adminstrative difficulties of arranging absent voting, an application for an absent vote must be in on the Wednesday, two weeks and one day before polling day, on the assumption one always makes that polling day is on a Thursday.

Because of the considerable widening of the availability of absent votes under the Bill, we thought it right to say —my right hon. and learned Friend said it in the debate on the White Paper — that we intended to make arrangements by which applications for postal votes would close on the Monday, two weeks and three days before polling day.

We recognise that that two weeks and three days is a considerable time, during which, in the normal course of events, some people will fall ill or be admitted to hospital and that a number of people will lose the ability to go to the polls in person without having the entitlement to obtain absent voting facilities.

It has been represented to us by hon. Members in all parts of the Committee, and formally by the Opposition, that it would be appropriate to make arrangements by which procedures could be introduced to allow people taken ill during that period to have a chance to apply later for absent voting facilities, be it in respect of a postal vote or, as is proposed in new clause 33, by proxy.

The Government have been looking at this issue since we embarked on the process of consultation on the Bill. We consulted the political parties and local authority associations at an early stage on a proposal to give the registration officer a discretion to accept late applications in those circumstances.

The local authority associations were unenthusiastic about the extra work that it would cause them. However, I am not sure that the case for taking action is not sufficiently compelling to hon. Members for it to be appropriate to take the matter back to the local authority associations and say that it is the will of Parliament that some change be made in that direction.

There will remain a live issue as to what the cut-off point should be for that; plainly, it could not be allowed right up to polling day. There would have to be a few days before polling day when anyone then taken ill would lose the right to vote. I believe that I carry the Committee with me in saying that it would be right to try to move the deadline markedly forward for those taken ill or admitted to hospital.

[Mr. Mellor]

We can do that without adding anything to the face of the Bill. While I appreciate that the new clause was tabled as a way of enabling the matter to be considered, the hon. Member for Battersea will appreciate that the matter could be dealt with by way of regulations. If I give an undertaking that, on having further consultations with the parties and local authority associations on when the cut-off point should be, we shall put new arrangements in regulations, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not press the new clause, having achieved the purpose which he had in mind.

Mr. Dubs indicated assent.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): There is a distinction between putting the cut-off date nearer to polling day and making different arrangements for those who, between whatever is the cut-off date and polling day, still might qualify. We shall have to reflect on the Minister's statement. In the meantime, will he agree that, from the point of view of those engaged in an election, the cut-off date, though much too early at present — experience at the last election reinforced that view in many people's minds—is of considerable importance, as all sorts of procedures related to communication with the electors hang on that date? There were, therefore, two distinct propositions wrapped up in what the Minister said.

Mr. Mellor: That is why we shall take further views before making any announcement about regulations. As the right hon. Gentleman says, these are significant points, and we do not want to create difficulties elsewhere by moving towards a means of enfranchising the limited number of people—an important section of the community—who fall ill in that period. They would need to be different arrangements from those that would apply before the main cut-off point, which, for the administrative reasons that I have given, must be longer before polling day than most of us, as practising candidates, would ever have wished.

On the basis that this has been a useful debate and that the main thrust of the points has gone home or will be acted on by the Government, I hope that my hon. Friend will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Hannam: The Committee is grateful to my hon. Friend for the manner in which he responded to the debate and for his acceptance of the principle involved, which is to try to enable disabled people to vote in person rather than by any other means. To win two out of three is a good record in any debate, and I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 5 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6

ABSENT VOTE AT ELECTIONS FOR AN INDEFINITE PERIOD

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I beg to move amendment No. 35, in page 9, line 17, after 'keep', insert 'and supply to each of the candidates nominated in the constituency.'.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 45, in clause 7, page 11, line 8, after 'keep', insert 'and supply to each of the candidates nominated in the constituency.'.

Mr. Beith: The Under-Secretary of State responded helpfully to the points made in the last group of amendments, and I hope that he did so in a spirit of improving the Bill and accepting the sensible suggestions that will prevail in our discussions. There are many sensible suggestions on the Amendment Paper from me and my hon. Friends. I have no doubt that the consideration will proceed apace on that basis.

Amendment No. 35 is a probing amendment because what it seeks to do will — if it is done properly — be done in regulations. One matter that was common to both sides of the argument when we discussed the extension of the postal vote was the importance of the candidate being able to address the voters. If there is to be a considerable extension of postal voting, as envisaged in the Bill, it is important that candidates should have the information that is necessary to enable them to address the voters. The essential part of that information is the list of voters and the place to which that information can be sent. It is already the practice—this is enshrined in the regulations made under the Representation of the People Act 1983 — that returning officers supply candidates free of charge with a copy of the list of absent voters. The Bill significantly changes the law on postal voting. No doubt, the regulations will be modified as a consequence of this legislation. The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that candidates have the right to obtain as expeditiously as possible and free of charge a list of absent voters.

The discussion at the conclusion of our debate on the last series of amendments underlined the need to convey all that information to the canndidates, including late additions to the list of absent voters which might be made under more generous provisions to enable people to register as absent voters at a later stage. That information must be made available to the candidates with the utmost speed, and the regulations should make it clear that that should be done. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will give us that assurance.

5.30 pm

Dr. Marek: This is a probing amendment because its provisions will be covered under regulations. If this legislation is passed, many more people will receive postal votes. It has been estimated that up to 30 per cent. of votes could be postal votes. That is why we have to examine this measure seriously.

Until now the postal vote register has been of some interest, but it will be of much greater interest in future to all the candidates and political parties. If possible, I should like the electoral registration officer to have a running list so that between elections political parties and, during elections, candidates, can be supplied as quickly as possible with a current printout of the absent voters list. That is an important point.

Electoral registration officers in some parts of the country have the habit of including in the list the names of electors in previous years, even though they have no idea whether those electors are still in the area. I believe that there will be increased possibilities for illegal voting if many postal vote applications are sent out to voters and are not picked up but are left lying around letterboxes. I do not believe that this is the time to discuss these aspects in detail, because I believe that they will be considered later in the Bill. I look forward to a helpful reply from the Government.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I am surprised that these amendments have been tabled. All of us who have been candidates for election know that a full list of absent voters is available in the committee room. I am, therefore, surprised to find that that measure needs to be recorded in this legislation. Every candidate has a right to obtain that list. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) hinted at the need for a more accurate list, and I sympathise with his wish. It is important to keep that list up to date. My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) indicated in an amendment which has not been selected that changing the list by using a computer would be the most helpful way of keeping the list up to date. It is sufficient for there to be trust in us as candidates and lists on which we can rely. I shall certainly not support either of the amendments.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): The amendments raise two fundamental principles, which go to the heart of the Bill. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) touched on those principles. For once I am delighted to agree with the points made by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) in his short contribution.

Mr. Forth: Uncharacteristically short.

Mr. Powell: One of those fundamental issues is the accuracy of the register. The purpose of these probing amendments is to ensure that the list is as accurate as possible. Substantial criticisms have been made about the inaccuracy of the registers. Unfortunately, I am afraid that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is not prepared to go far enough in ensuring that the registers are as accurate as possible. The Bill contains a defect because there is not sufficient provision to improve what has been widely held to be a substantial weakness in our present system.

These modest amendments should be supported in so far as they aim to improve the accuracy of the register. One criticism made by the hon. Member for Wrexham, which has been voiced repeatedly during our debates from the time we first discussed the White Paper—no one has been more eloquent on this subject than the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell)—is that we are possibly increasing substantially the number of votes cast by post. In doing that, we are limiting what has been a fundamental principle of voting since the passing of the Parliamentary and Municipal Elections (Ballot) Act. In future, the proportion of people who vote in person will not be as high as previously. By increasing the opportunities for postal voting, we are increasing the opportunities for fraud and dishonesty which may result from ballots being cast in absentia.

I have urged the Committee to enlarge the opportunity to exercise the franchise. Having regard to the criticisms that have been made, much can be said for improving the accuracy of the register rather than increasing, almost at large, the opportunities for postal voting.

Mr. Forth: I regret that my hon. Friend has lost me. I understood that the objective of the amendments was to make existing information available on a wider basis to candidates. I am not sure that the objective was to improve accuracy. Perhaps I have missed the amendment's point. I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith).

Mr. Powell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I am saying that it is a weakness of the amendments that they do not try—any more than the Government intend to try—to make the registers more accurate to minimise the necessity to vote by post. We may well have the opportunity of enlarging upon this point later this evening.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Member is straying some way from the amendments before us. I hope that he will return to them.

Mr. Powell: I accept that rebuke, Mr. Walker. I shall try in my concluding remarks to bring myself back within the scope of the amendments. We must try to ensure that the information that is available is as accurate and up-to-date as possible. These amendments go to that issue. We must try to ensure that the registers actively reflect the electorate that is resident in the constituency. To the extent to which these amendments do not deal with that point they are defective.

Sir John Farr: I respect what my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) has said, and I think that the main intention of most hon. Members who are here tonight is to strive to secure perfection and the utmost accuracy in the electoral register. There are occasions when the electoral register is hopelessly inaccurate.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Member has just heard me draw to the attention of the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) the fact that such a line of debate is outside the scope of the amendments. I hope that, if the hon. Member wishes to address the Committee, it will be on these amendments and not on some others.

Sir John Farr: I am grateful for your advice, Mr. Walker. However, my remarks relate to the fact that when one compiles a list of postal or proxy voters, as amendments Nos. 35 and 45 are seeking to do, these additional alterations and changes, either by post or by proxy, make what is not an easy task—getting the electoral register accurate—even more difficult. The addition of postal and proxy records would add to the already great imperfections that often occur in general elections.

The Chairman: Order. The amendments deal not with the problems that the electoral registration officer may have in compiling the register but with the distribution of it. The hon. Gentleman should address himself to the distribution of the registers rather than the conduct of them.

Sir John Farr: I have no hesitation in accepting your ruling, Mr. Walker, but I was seeking to point out that the amendments add a further complication. The records are often imperfect, and to include the postal and proxy voters, as recommended in the amendments, would make an already difficult problem even more difficult.

Mr. Mellor: I was wondering what to talk about when I rose, but I decided that it would be appropriate to return to the amendments. A moving picture was painted by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) of his being out in the cold pressing his nose against the window pane while others were inside warming themselves at the fire of ministerial benevolence. I invite him to join us and to put his toes in the embers for a little while. Taking his amendments in the spirit in which they were offered—as a probe—I had some research undertaken which might show him that what he is asking us to do is not necessary because the information is already available. I shall adduce my arguments, and if he thinks that there are flaws I shall be happy to return to the subject at some other time.

The hon. Gentleman has a limited aim. He seeks to ensure that candidates are supplied with copies both of the so-called permanent list of absent voters and of the special list of those who have the right to vote by post or proxy at a particular election. The registration officer is already required by regulations to supply candidates with copies of the special list. The candidates do not need copies of the permanent list, because its contents form part of the special list. That is the fundamental point.

Clause 6(3) requires the registration officer to keep a record of those whose applications to vote by post or proxy for an indefinite period he has granted. That is equivalent to the so-called permanent list of absent voters that the registration officer is required to keep under certain sections of the Representation of the People Act 1983, with which the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed is familiar.

Clause 7(4) requires the registration officer to keep a special list of those who are entitled to vote by post or proxy at a particular election. That is the same as the list required by rule 27 of the parliamentary elections rules, and it consists of those whose names are included in the permanent list or record of absent voters, plus those who have successfully applied to vote by post or proxy at a particular election.

Regulations under the 1983 Act currently require the registration officer to make a copy of the so-called permanent list available for inspection at his office and, as soon as practicable, to supply, on request and free of charge, a copy of the special list to each candidate or his election agent.

I hope that I have satisfied the hon. Gentleman by giving him an undertaking that these requirements will be preserved when the new representation of the people regulations are made after the Bill receives Royal Assent, as I hope and expect it will in due course.

The effect of the amendments would be for candidates to be provided with a copy of the permanent list as well of the special list and for them to be supplied automatically on request.

On the first point, it is perhaps unnecessary for candidates to be suppled with both lists when all the information contained in the first list is contained in the second list. Secondly, I would oppose automatic provision, because not all candidates want it. For instance, candidates of the Official Monster Raving Loony party, which as I understand it is not yet formally part of the alliance, might not always want such information, and I see no reason why we should give it to them gratuitously.

5.45 pm

Mr. Beith: I accept the Minister's undertaking. I hope that he recognises that this issue could be more difficult for returning officers, with the great expansion of the postal vote, than may have been foreseen. There must be hon. Members here who are aware that, even in the present circumstances, returning officers can run into difficulties if there is a sudden upsurge in the number of postal votes registered in the early part of an election campaign. Getting the list to candidates, even under present conditions, is not always done with the expedition that one would desire. There can be no doubt that the returning officers' task will be more difficult in the first election to be fought under the changed rules set out by the Bill, because almost certainly there will be a much larger number of applications and, were there to be substantial delays, that would be a serious matter.

It had been my assumption that, as the right was already in the existing regulations, it would be preserved. The intention of the amendments, which were in no way defective, was to check that that assumption was justified. I happily accept the Minister's assurance, and beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Dr. Marek: I apologise for coming in at this late stage. I wanted to intervene in the Minister's speech. Could he answer one point? I know of cases where the returning officer has not allowed a person to photocopy any part of the list, even though that person may have been a bona fide inquirer. If he wanted to take notes, he has had to do so in longhand. Can the Minister take this on board in the regulations so that bona fide inquirers, possibly a month before an election, will be allowed to photocopy the list, if necessary?

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I am keen to have an answer to this point, and I am certain that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to answer it. It concerns the cut-off date for drawing up this list before it is provided to the candidates. I am concerned about the accuracy of the list. As many more people will be going on the postal and absentee voters' lists, it is important to keep the lists accurate. I am keen to know whether my hon. Friend is able to estimate the particular cut-off date.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I beg to move amendment No. 71, in page 10, line 1, leave out subsection (6).

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 36, in page 10, line 1, leave out 'in Northern Ireland'.

No. 46, in clause 7, page 11, line 24, leave out 'in Northern Ireland'.

No. 50, in clause 9, page 15, line 6, leave out 'in Northern Ireland'.

Mr. Kaufman: Throughout our consideration of this proposed reform of electoral law—during the debate on the White Paper, on Second Reading and during consultations that Her Majesty's Opposition have had with the Government—we have made it clear that absolute parity of treatment between electors in all parts of the United Kingdom, whether in Great Britain or in Northern Ireland, is essential in parliamentary elections.

I have made it clear on behalf of the Labour party that to impose on part of the kingdom restrictions which are not imposed upon another part is to turn the citizens of the kingdom subject to those restrictions literally into second-class citizens. I say "literally" because that adverb is much misused. In this case we are talking about a literal fact.

Citizenship is dependent, among other things, upon the exercise of the franchise. That is a token of adult citizenship. For limitations to be imposed on those with a franchise in one part of the kingdom when they are not imposed upon others is unacceptable.

We have agreed that the expatriate vote should be conferred upon all citizens of this kingdom with the right to vote. We disagree with and make no bones about the expatriate vote, but it is clear from the legislation that any expatriate voter from Northern Ireland will be treated in the same way as an expatriate voter from the other three countries of the kingdom.

Clause 6(6) discriminates clearly, because it refers only to Northern Ireland. The subsection states:

"A person applying to vote by post in Northern Ireland must provide an address in the United Kingdom as the address to which his ballot paper is to be sent."

The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and his right hon. and hon. Friends seek to amend the clause by placing a limitation upon all voters in the United Kingdom who require postal votes. They say that all absent voters who exercise the postal vote may do so only within the United Kingdom. That is an arguable proposition. I have severe misgivings about sending ballot papers out of the country. That is one of the great worries about the postal vote in general and one of the subsidiary worries that I expressed on behalf of the Opposition in relation to the expatriate vote.

A suitable limitation would be to permit all people exercising the absent vote within the kingdom to vote by post, provided that they are somewhere within the kingdom, but to use a proxy vote if they go outside the kingdom. That is my personal preference for a number of reasons.

First, ballot papers would not wing their way all over the world in a way that could lead to misuse. Secondly, it would be a protection for the voters themselves. It would place absent voters on a par. It would mean that someone who had gone on holiday to Miami—assuming the rate of exchange permitted that—would be less likely to have a vote than somebody who had gone on holiday to Brittany. The postal service, even in some Community countries, is not always as good as it might be. Most of us will have sent a postcard home from Italy or France and arrived home before it, and will therefore be worried about ballot papers hanging around after a person has returned from holiday.

The better solution is to restrict the postal vote within the United Kingdom. I make it absolutely clear, so that there is no misunderstanding, that the Labour party favours postal votes for all holidaymakers, wherever they go, in whatever continent. We favour strongly an absent vote for holidaymakers. The suggestions that I make, in line with those made by right hon. and hon. Members representing Northern Ireland constituencies, are not meant to inhibit the exercise of the vote for holidaymakers. We support their solution.

The alternative is to remove the subsection and provide that people in Northern Ireland should be allowed to have their ballot papers sent to them wherever they are, even outside the United Kingdom. In a sense, I am asking the Government to accept the amendments tabled by Northern Ireland Members rather than my amendment, but if the Government accepted my amendment, with assurances, that would be as good as any other solution. I have no pride of proprietorship in amendment No. 71. I have moved it to try to ensure that when the Bill is enacted Northern Ireland electors are treated in the same way as electors in the other parts of the United Kingdom.

I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will respond sympathetically. Perhaps in the light of what I have said and what other right hon. and hon. Members may say, he will give assurances and draft more appropriate amendments. Provided that his assurances are reliable and solid, that would suit us well. We regard this as a fundamental issue of democracy within the kingdom, and we hope the Government will respond accordingly.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: As the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has made clear, two principles are at issue in this debate. The first is the principle of parity and the rights of citizens to vote in all parts of the United Kingdom. The second is the question of the sending of ballot papers outside the realm for the purpose of absent voting. On both those matters my right hon. and hon. Friends are in agreement with what the right hon. Gentleman has just said.

That will occasion no surprise in relation to the first of those principles. The fact that that principle has been so firmly asserted by Her Majesty's Opposition right from the first proposals which underlie this Bill has not gone unnoticed in Northern Ireland.

Ever since I became a Member for Northern Ireland and, indeed, since I first presented myself for election, I have told my electors, "In the end the House of Commons will be fair to you. It may take some time to understand the issues—to understand what is involved—but in the end there is an essential fairness about the House of Commons which derives from the fact that all who sit there go there with the same right, upon the same basis and by the same process." The position taken up—I think successfully—by Her Majesty's Opposition has been a strong confirmation of that view. It will assist in the restoration of stability and confidence in good government in that part of the United Kingdom.

I come, therefore, to the second principle which is at issue. Here again, it seems to me, the right hon. Member for Gorton is right when he says that there is something inherently unsatisfactory in a flight, as it were, of ballot papers issuing forth by post from these shores at a general election, no doubt with various addresses—anywhere from the nearest places outside the United Kingdom, which are presumably the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, to the most remote corners of the globe—with the likelihood in the lottery that they will arrive in the most remote corners of the globe sooner than in the adjacent continent of Europe; for it is a common experience that one receives letters from Australia far more rapidly than letters from France or Italy.

That is an electoral absurdity, but that is what would happen. It would give electors who had sought an equal opportunity an unequal chance of exercising that opportunity. It is possible for us to retort to those electors, "Well, you entered the lottery. You took your choice. You decided to ask for a postal vote. It is your fault that the post in Miami, Australia or the south of France was not adequate for you to be able to exercise the franchise in time." That is not an attitude which the House in legislating should take. We ought to be instituting a system which is sound and equitable in itself. I do not believe it can be sound or equitable for rights of voting by post to be exercised from addresses outside the United Kingdom.

There is another, perhaps esoteric, aspect of the matter, but it may be worth mentioning. The provison of the opportunity to vote is an exercise of the sovereign power in this country, which is in commission with the House:

to arrange for a vote to be cast is an expression of the sovereignty of the Crown in Parliament in this realm. When we provide a proxy vote for an absent voter who has gone on holiday, outside the United Kingdom, wherever it might be, that principle is not breached; but when we send a ballot paper outwith the jurisdiction, in the hope that it will arrive in some foreign parts in time to enable the recipient to vote in this country, we are guilty of creating a breach of that principle.

It may be that at some future time, although I hope not —there have been earlier debates on this subject—we shall extend the whole concept of elections beyond the shores and confines of the realm, but we are not doing so in this Bill. The new rights which the Bill creates do not extend the concept of a general election as something domestic to the United Kingdom. We should not breach that principle by allowing postal voting beyond the confines of the realm.

I hope that the consideration that the Government give to this amendment will find a means of meeting the plea of the right hon. Member for Gorton not just on the first point—I am confident that their sense of justice will ensure that—but on the second point also.

Mr. William Powell: I am delighted to follow the right hon. Members for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and for South Down (Mr. Powell), and to express complete agreement with the way in which they have expressed their arguments. As has been said, the amendments raise two principles, one of them of fundamental importance. The other is of secondary importance, but it goes to the heart of the mechanics by which we ballot.

The principle of fundamental importance is that the rules for election should be the same in Northern Ireland as they are in England, Wales and Scotland. That is a principle by which everyone should be able to stand. Hon. Members who represent constituencies in Northern Ireland come to the House frequently to complain that Northern Ireland is being treated differently from the rest of England. I have listened to those arguments for the past 18 months and more with a growing sense of apprehension that they are not correct in the way in which they are formulated. I have frequently found myself going into the Lobby to support the Government with a heavy heart. On one occasion at least, I have been one of the lone Conservatives prepared to go into the Lobby with hon. Members representing Northern Ireland when they have complained about Northern Ireland being treated differently from the rest of the United Kingdom.

The amendment raises a fundamental principle of our election law. I should find it impossible to support a provision which treated constituencies in Northern Ireland, as to the franchise, differently from constituencies in England, Wales, Scotland, Northamptonshire, Leicestershire or wherever.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary recognises that all parts of the House are anxious to ensure, if it is at all feasible—I do not see in this instance how it is not—that Northern Ireland is given the same indivisible treatment under our law as every other citizen of the country.

The other principle is not on such an elevated plane, but it is important. It relates to whether persons entitled to vote abroad should vote by post or by proxy. In the month preceding the general election in June 1983, I and other hon. Members were accosted by disgruntled constituents complaining that they would not be able to vote because they would be on holiday. I always answered that if we were able to secure votes for holidaymakers who were abroad, as likely as not they would be cast by proxy, and that if they were in the United Kingdom, as likely as not the votes would be cast by post. If we allow postal ballot papers to be sent to addresses abroad, the likelihood of them being mislaid is considerable. For all we know, the post in Tibet may be a great deal more reliable than the post in France, Belgium or Luxembourg. If we were to regard it as normal to send substantial numbers of ballot papers abroad, that would be unsatisfactory.

I have argued, I hope most vigorously, in favour of the extension of the franchise. Not every right hon. and hon. Member has agreed with that. There has been a substantial division of opinion among hon. Members on that issue.

The principles have by and large been established during the course of our debates. The outline of the principles is clear. We are now dealing with the mechanics. When my hon. Friend and his advisers come to deal with the regulations by which the principles that we have laid down should be enforced, I hope that he will attach much more weight than the Treasury Bench has so far appeared to do to the idea that persons abroad should vote in this country by proxy rather than that we should waste a great deal of time, effort and money ensuring that they have postal votes. It may be difficult to reach such people. A great many votes may be returned to returning officers after a constituency has declared its result. Electors wishing to cast a valid vote will find that they are ruled out of time through no fault of their own but through the vagaries of the post at home or abroad.

I do not rule out the fact that postal voting for some people abroad may be appropriate, but I hope that much more emphasis will be given to encouraging them to vote by proxy.

Mr. Molyneaux: I wish to record our appreciation for the support from both sides of the Committee for our amendments. We are grateful that this support has emerged towards the end of what has been a fairly lengthy —I do not say battle—correspondence between the Home Office and ourselves.

I should like to place on record the fact that I am not excluding the Minister from my expression of gratitude because he listened attentively and, dare I say, sympathetically, at all times to the case that my right hon. and hon. Friends put forward. He, in turn, explained many of the difficulties, but I think that it is true to say that, as a combined operation, perhaps this was one of the best examples of co-operation between both sides of the House —I include both Front Benches and, indeed, the former leader of the Labour party, the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). It has given us great satisfaction that we have reached that consensus.

It is important to acknowledge that absent voting is different from postal voting. When we talk about the principle of absent voting and its availability for holidaymakers, we agree with the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) in saying that it would be best exercised by proxy and not by any attempt to work the unworkable and go for postal ballot papers outside the United Kingdom. I reckon from my limited experience of receiving correspondence from abroad that if persons were to entrust their franchise, their right to vote, at a general election, to the European postal system—I shall put it no further abroad than that—only one third of the ballot papers would be returned in time to be included in the count at any given constituency.

Therefore, I hope that the message and advice that go out from the Committee to people who will want to avail themselves of the facility of absent voting will be that they should play safe and be 100 per cent. certain that, if they adopt the proxy method, there is no risk of it being exploited, and that the vote that they cast as citizens of a democratic country will have its due effect.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I am pleased to be able to follow the leader of the Official Unionist party, the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux), because he sincerely put forward the views of Conservative Members and also, I believe, of Opposition Members. It is a fact of life that Northern Ireland wishes to be treated in the same way as the rest of the United Kingdom. Therefore, I have great sympathy for the right hon. Gentleman's amendments. I would support them if they were forced to a vote.

I should like to refer to the risk of absent voting and the fact that voting by proxy is by far the most sensible course to take. There is always the element of ballot papers not being sent to the right place and getting lost in the post. Indeed, only today I received a letter informing me that I had been appointed to the Committee on the Local Government Access to Information Bill. The letter is dated 6 February and arrived today. I had already been given dates and times, which were announced in the paper. Yet the letter was posted in and sent to the House of Commons. If it takes that long for a letter posted in this building to be delivered, it shows the difficulties that we are up against with regard to sending postal votes abroad.

I feel strongly that we should stop all postal voting from abroad in the sense that I am unconvinced that the ballot paper will arrive there on time and, more important, that it will be delivered to the right place. One cannot even be certain of who has voted. There might not necessarily be a witness of the person casting his vote although there is supposed to be a witness when one completes the postal vote form.

For that reason alone I hope very much that we shall encourage and support the principle of proxy voting. It would be the only way of guaranteeing true identification. In the past we have heard of massive problems with voting in Northern Ireland. We only have to look at the House of Commons Library research note No. 195, which on page 7 refers to Cmnd. 9140. Paragraph 322 states:

> "There is widespread public concern, shared by the Government, at the extent and nature of electoral abuse in Northern Ireland, including the abuse of postal voting."

That causes all of us concern. It is therefore obvious to me and, I hope, other hon. Members that the best solution is to vote by proxy.

6.15 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan: I am glad not to have to sound a discordant note and to be in wholehearted agreement with the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who moved the amendment. My hon. Friends in the Social Democratic party and the Liberal party adopt his reasoning and believe that the case that he made should commend itself to the Government.

It would be of some interest, if only for historical reasons, to know why the clauses to be amended were presented in the way that they were in the first place. The principle of equality of citizenship in the exercise of the franchise should apply throughout the whole of the kingdom. It is odd that political difficulties within the Province should have led the Government to make such a proposal that did not recognise that fundamental constitutional right. Problems of personation there may be, but that is not the way to deal with them.

Mr. Bermingham: I thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) for moving the amendment. The reason why my hon. Friends and I tabled the amendment is simple. We could not see why there should be any difference in any part of the United Kingdom. What is good for one is good for all; what is bad for one is bad for all. Against that background, we hope that the Government will accept the amendment.

Mr. Mellor: The right hon. Members for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux), supported by clear signs of assent, which I welcomed, from the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), paid tribute to the work done to try to resolve differences that were made clear on Second Reading about the arrangements that should exist in Northern Ireland regarding the extent and exercise of absent voting. I greatly enjoyed participating in those discussions. It has always been my wish to try to ensure that there is the maximum agreement possible on the measure because, plainly, that is the nature of the Bill. As a result of the efforts that have been made, we have been able to clear away some substantial differences.

I do not want to anticipate too much the debate on the next set of amendments. What could have been a highly contentious matter, which could have kept us here for some time, has now been resolved amicably and with a consensus that the right decision has been reached. I am grateful to the right hon. Members for Gorton and for Lagan Valley for their participation in the careful negotiations necessary to bring us to that point.

However, one issue remains unresolved. Before embarking on that, it is important to note that it is the one issue that remains unresolved in this area. It relates to a narrow point of mechanics, if I may say so, without wanting to disparage those who see this as a matter of deep principle. In my view, for what it is worth, it is a very narrow matter of mechanics. Having determined whether there should be absent voting and for what categories, how should it be exercised? Is it right that the elector should be offered a choice in every circumstance on whether he votes by post or by proxy, or should restrictions be placed on his choice? If restrictions should be placed on his choice, should one of the considerations be, in deciding what restrictions to impose, whether it is possible to have wholly consistent arrangements throughout the United Kingdom? The Government have taken—I think rightly—a severely practical view.

The right hon. Member for Gorton has made it clear that the Opposition support the view that it is no longer possible to have general elections when many of the electorate are away on holiday and effectively disfranchised. A real consensus has been established on that, although there are agents of both major parties who see nothing but gloom arising from the proposed changes.

[Mr. Mellor]

However, I think that the general feeling is that the changes must be made and that democracy will be strengthened by the increased number who will be able to cast their vote as a result of the implementation of the Bill. In certain months we are talking of literally millions of votes. For example, we think that there may have been 2 million voters on holiday at the time of the 1983 general election.

How will the franchise be exercised? Application will have to be made on the Monday that is two weeks and three days before the election. Those concerned will then go to the Hotel Splendid at Torremolinos or some similar location within the United Kingdom. Is it necessary to impose a restriction, dependent on whether the individual is to be in Paris or Spain as opposed to Edinburgh or Birmingham, on how the absent vote should be exercised?

The Government have taken the view, rightly or wrongly, that the issue comes down to a matter of practicality. If a vote is sent through the post, the fact that it goes to Paris or Plymouth is not one that involves a great issue of principle. The problems stemming from tampering with a vote are no more likely to arise if the vote is entrusted to the French postal service than if it is placed in the charge of various parts of the United Kingdom's system.

We have taken heed of the evidence that the Post Office officials gave to the Select Committee. That evidence suggested that, if the returning officer in any constituency in the United Kindom was in a position to issue postal ballot papers on the Monday 10 days before the poll—the Post Office officials said that in their experience that was usually the position in most well-ordered constituencies—there would be time for postal ballot papers to be issued to and returned from at least some addresses outside the United Kingdom. Plainly if someone were at the Hotel Splendid at Ulan Bator, he would be unwise to rely upon the ability of the postal services to get his postal ballot there and back within 10 days.

We say—I hope that the right hon. Member for South Down will recognise the Government's basic principle even if he does not agree with the whole argument—that the voter should have the choice and should abide by the consequences of his choice, just as he does in most of the choices that he makes. If the voter decides to exercise his absent vote by post and the postal service does live up to expectations and he loses his vote, he has taken the decision and that is that. I am not sure whether it is a proper inhibition on our making of rules that voters might make the wrong decision. After all, it is only one of a series of wrong decisions that voters are capable of making in an election.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Hear hear.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman says that with great feeling. I understand that slightly more than 100 of the electorate in his constituency made the right choice rather than the wrong one, by his way of thinking, during the general election.

We think that the voter is entitled to take the risk that I have described. He should know—no doubt the Post Office will tell him if there is any doubt—what the likelihood is of the postal vote getting to Paris, Spain or Italy and back again. Those who have participated in the debate have not been disposed to favour this proposal. It is not a matter on which I want to invite my hon. Friends to go into the trenches with me, as it were, to turn it into an issue of principle. As I have said, I have never seen it in that way. I want to reflect on what has been said, including the condemnation from various quarters. Therefore, I am reluctant to spoil the consensus which has been established generally in this one instance, but that is not a commitment that the Government will definitely change their minds.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Gorton that we should not in any sense derogate from our position of giving holidaymakers the postal vote by saying that they could exercise it only by proxy. Of course, that might ensure that more votes were actually cast. I remain of the the view, without having had the advice of the House of Commons, that this should be a matter of choice for the voter, and that we have reached a stage where the communications system is such that the crossing of a national boundary should not be an obstacle.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I wish to float an idea to my hon. Friend which has occurred to me while he has been speaking. During the elections in France I happened to notice that the French embassy in London was open to those who wished to register their votes in England in those elections. What is my hon. Friend's view on the same facilities being made available to our citizens at all our consular offices and embassies throughout the world prior to general elections? The date would be published throughout the country.

Mr. Mellor: At first sight, I am not especially attracted to my hon. Friend's idea as a realistic proposition. I shall think about it and perhaps my view will be different on reflection, but I think probably not.

The Government believe as a matter of practicality that it is better that voters should be given the choice of a postal ballot and that no great issue of principle arises. It is said that there is an issue of principle in the equal treatment of all parts of the United Kingdom. I do not belittle that argument because there has to be a good reason why there should not be equal treatment. As the right hon. Members for Lagan Valley and for South Down and their colleagues know, it is that fact which has motivated me in my efforts to try to ensure the maximum possible correspondence between the practice in Great Britain and that in Northern Ireland.

If there is a good reason for there being a difference in treatment, I do not believe that there is any great argument of principle on why the difference should not be permitted to exist. There is a good reason—I think that we all know it—why postal votes should not be sent out of the jurisdiction of Northern Ireland into the Republic. I do not think that any of those representing constituencies in Northern Ireland would want postal ballots to be sent from the Province to the Republic. It is clear also that no distinction can be made between the Republic and any other country. As a practical proposition, sending ballot papers out of the jurisdiction of Northern Ireland is not something that we would want to suggest.

My hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) has become sufficiently convinced of the case for there being precisely the same arrangements in Northern Ireland as in the rest of the United Kingdom to expound that cause with even more zeal than his mentors in the Ulster Unionist party, but that is ever the way of the convert, as we know only too well. St. Paul set an admirable precedent.

If we are to intrude a fact into these considerations, the arrangements in Northern Ireland are not the same as those in the United Kingdom in at least one material particular. I have in mind the important issue of the qualification date. It has never been seen necessary in Great Britain—indeed, it is not necessary—to do other than establish that on one night—it could be any night, but it happens to be a night in October—one is resident at a particular address for the purpose of getting oneself on the register. That has always been thought inappropriate in Northern Ireland because of the fear that people will come from the South for one night, whatever the one night is, register and then return to the South, only to return on election day to exercise the franchise. That is why the qualification period for registration in Northern Ireland is several weeks. No one has said that the principle that everyone should be elected to the House on the same basis is thereby destroyed.

Before doing what everyone in the Committee probably wishes me to do, may I venture the suggestion that this may not be a great matter of principle. One could, of course, go into a trench and say that there were precisely the same compelling reasons for having a different view about whether one sent a postal vote out of the jurisdiction as there properly are for the time that one must be resident in order to register.

Having got that off my chest, I should say that the Government are not greatly attached to the proposition. There is certainly room for reconsideration. We shall reconsider the matter, but I must tell the right hon. Gentleman that that is not a commitment to change it. We can return to the matter later. I shall consult my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and others as to whether we should change the proposal, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will feel that he has achieved what he set out to achieve.

6.30 pm

Mr. Kaufman: My regard for the Under-Secretary of State has grown steadily during the months since we faced each other over the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, and especially since I discovered that he was much more knowledgeable about the music of Berwald than I am. That being so, I am always ready to take seriously what he says. However, he has a strange tendency which, if he is to become leader of the Conservative party—we all look forward to that—he must suppress. It is to introduce extraneous contentious material at the end of a consensus debate. There will soon come a time when the Conservative party will again yearn for consensus, and he may be the very man to bring that to it.

Therefore, with regard to his latter point, I should say that it is on the face of this Bill that we find the introduction of disparity unacceptable. I hope that the Minister will have noted that from every quarter of the Committee there has been support for the proposition of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and his right hon. and hon. Friends. Support has come from the Conservative party, the Social Democratic party, the Liberal party and, of course, from Her Majesty's Opposition. That being so, although I understand that the Minister is not giving us a cast-iron, 100 per cent. commitment, we look forward to his returning to the House on Report, or with an amendment in another place—whichever is easier for him in terms of drafting—to meet the point that the entire Committee has asked him to meet this afternoon.

Mr. Mellor: Of course, I give the commitment on that basis. The only point with which I would quibble, although not hoping to prove that the proposition advanced by the right hon. Gentleman is true in my case, is that other hon. Members who may be attracted to the Government's proposition do not show the same enthusiasm for attending our debate as those who dissent from it. However, I do not believe that it is worth having too many divisions on this issue, and in that spirit I shall go away to reflect upon the matter with my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Kaufman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I would only point out that those hon. Members who take part in the debate are, for the purposes of the debate, the Committee of the whole House of Commons. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): The people of Northern Ireland will be happy tonight because of what the Minister has said about the representations made to him by hon. Members from Northern Ireland. We are glad that the voices of those who made representations for and on behalf of the Province were listened to, and that their points were met to a great extent. As he said, he is not giving us a cast-iron assurance, but from what he said it would appear that he will seriously consider the matter and try to meet the points that have been made by the Committee. That is most welcome. The Committee must recognise that all those who are returned to the House of Commons should have equality in their electorates and in the principles of democracy. On behalf of those for whom I speak, I put on record my appreciation of the way in which the Government listened sympathetically to our case.

Mr. Kaufman: Perhaps the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) will allow me to treat that as an intervention, because otherwise I cannot withdraw the amendment. If I cannot withdraw it, it will be negatived, and I am sure that he would not wish that. Once again, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Sir John Farr: I am glad to have the opportunity briefly to talk about clause 6. No one welcomes the Bill more than me. During the previous two elections I met people who, for one reason or another, were unable to vote. Clause 6 lays special emphasis on the record which the registration officer is required to keep. I am glad that the clause is itemised in the way that it is. However, I regret that nowhere in the Bill does one find the word "accuracy". I can keep a record—any Tom, Dick or Harry can keep a record—but what use is the record if it is inaccurate?

I wish to draw to the attention of the House the experience of many hon. Members of their constituents being left off the register due to human error. The Bill provides that the fine for a double vote or misrepresentation will be £2,000, which is level 5 on the standard scale. However, the Bill does not recognise instances of people being deprived of their votes, although they may have gone through all the motions. They may have been resident on the proper night, have filled in the forms properly and posted them in time, but due to human error the register was inaccurate. We must consider how to recompense those who, through no fault of their own, are denied the birthright and the privilege of any British person to vote in a general or local government election. What can we do about that and about making the records much more accurate? The Bill values a vote at £2,000.

The Bill ought to mention that any person who has been deprived of a vote through no fault of his own should be recompensed by the local authority that was responsible for making the error. The Bill puts the value of a vote at £2,000. That is a very high and probably a proper price for a misdemeanour. However, when the misdemeanour occurs because of an error made by a local authority I believe that the innocent person who has suffered should be recompensed in a suitable way. I hope that my hon. Friend will believe it to be appropriate to recommend a five-year rate rebate for everybody who has missed a vote. That is a very insignificant recompense for the value of a vote, particularly in some constituencies where one vote or two votes can make all the difference between the return of one candidate or another.

I believe my hon. Friend ought to recommend that local authorities should do whatever they can to decrease the likelihood of human error. Computerisation is referred to on page 7 of the White Paper. The Select Committee recommended that all local authorities should seek to introduce what it called information technology for the compilation of their electoral registers. Recommendation (vii) in paragraph 1.10, under the heading "Computerisation", states:

"All authorities should be encouraged, and if necessary assisted, to install and to use modern technology as an aid to accuracy in the compilation of their registers."

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): The hon. Gentleman will be aware that this clause deals exclusively with absent voters. He must not go into the general application of the clause.

Sir John Farr: Thank you, Mr. Armstrong. However, the clause is meaningless unless the record to which reference is repeatedly made is an accurate record. I hope that my hon. Friend will think about what I have said and consider whether further efforts can be made to prevent innocent people from being deprived of their birthright.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I fully support what has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr). The right to vote is very important. Therefore, it is important to keep one's name on the register when one is entitled to vote and to ensure it is removed from the register as soon as entitlement to vote comes to an end.

The registration requirements are set out clearly in clause 6. However, I am concerned about the cut-off date —whether the absent voter list will be accurate for the two weeks before an election is held. We have to ensure that at all times the register is accurate and that the constituency organisations know who is entitled to be on the list. I hope that there will be a requirement that people will have to be made aware of the fact that it is an offence for their name to be kept on the register after they have declared that it is no longer their intention to exercise their right to vote. Provided that that undertaking is given, I believe that clause 6 should stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Mellor: Whether or not the argument is rightly attached to this clause—I take the point that you, Mr. Armstrong, have already made about that—it very much underlies our consideration of the Bill.

This matter has caused considerable concern to the Home Office and to other groups for a number of years. A working party on the electoral register reported in 1978. The Select Committee looked closely at the accuracy of the register. The first chapter of the White Paper upon which this legislation is based dealt with the registration of electors and set out a number of detailed points whereby we endeavoured to ensure that the accuracy of the register was improved.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) properly raised the question of correcting the register. If an elector's name has been incorrectly omitted from the published register, he can make a claim for its inclusion. The registration officer will publish a notice of the claim and correct the register at the beginning of the following month. Omissions as a result of clerical error can be corrected at once. The power to change clerical errors has existed since 1969. The power to consider and act upon late claims has existed since 1980. The redesign of form A, the guidance to electoral registration officers, both formally and through meetings at which discussions have been held about the best way to ensure that the maximum number of people are included on the register and, where necessary, excluded, has been continuing at a great pace. As I said earlier, we hope that the accuracy of the register during the next few years will be materially better than it has been up to now as a result of all the initiatives that we have taken.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 6 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 7

ABSENT VOTE AT A PARTICULAR ELECTION AND ABSENT VOTERS LIST

6.45 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I beg to move amendment No. 37, in page 10, line 6, leave out 'in Great Britain'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 38, in page 10, leave out lines 8 to 20.

No. 41, in page 10, line 17, leave out subsection (2).

No. 42, in page 10, line 26, leave out 'subsection (2)' and insert 'The foregoing subsection'.

No. 43, in page 10, line 26, leave out subsection (3).

No. 44, in page 10, line 44, after 'constituency', insert

'(v) at a general election, his residence on the date of the poll elsewhere than in the polling district allotted to him,

(vi) the general nature of his occupation, service or employment or that of his spouse'.

No. 47, in clause 9, page 14, line 4, leave out 'in the case of an election in Great Britain'.

No. 48, in clause 9, page 14, line 5, leave out from 'that' to end of line 9 and insert

'the applicant is a person to whom section 7(3) of this Act applies'.

No. 49, in clause 9, page 14, line 10, leave out 'in the case of an election in Northern Ireland'.

Mr. Powell: The debate which I initiate by moving amendment No. 37 is in a very real sense an extension of the debate upon the last group of amendments, except that it is upon a much wider base and relates to a much more substantial subject. This is the clause which makes that large extension to the opportunity for exercising the franchise to which the Under-Secretary of State referred earlier. It does so not by a formal increase in the categories under which absent voting may be claimed and allowed but by a completely new approach to the expression of the basis of the right to claim an absent vote.

It was with great astonishment that we in Northern Ireland learned that it was intended to exclude that part of the United Kingdom from the extension of the opportunity to exercise the franchise which is implicit in the redrafting of the electoral law embraced in clause 7. I was glad to realise from the exchanges which took place a few moments ago between the two Front Benches that that discrimination is to be removed. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I are content to believe that the reason for the discrimination in the first place was not because of any malice or evil intent towards the people of the Province but because of the, in our opinion, unfounded belief that the new grounds for exercising an absent vote would provide a special opportunity for electoral abuse. That was never a sound assumption.

The new basis will include people who will exercise the franchise inside the United Kingdom—whether or not outside the United Kingdom is still a matter to be decided. However, inside the United Kingdom, people will exercise the franchise by specifying an address to which the ballot paper is to be sent or alternatively by appointing a proxy to vote on their behalf. In neither of those circumstances is it practicable to organise large-scale electoral abuse. Only two proxies may be held by one and the same elector. Therefore, to organise massive abuse by means of the proxy system is almost unthinkable. Indeed, so far as I know, it has never been urged that the proxy system in Northern Ireland is seriously open to abuse.

That leaves abuse of voting by means of a ballot paper sent to an address in the United Kingdom. In the nature of things, those who will be on holiday or otherwise absent and unable to vote at their local polling station will specify a wide range of addresses at which they would like to receive their ballot papers. In some cases that will be their own residence where they will still be residing at the time when the postal ballot papers are issued. But in many other cases they will be addresses throughout the length and breadth of the kingdom. The operation of making contact with those addresses and somehow collecting those ballot papers when they are delivered, or alternatively bringing intimidation to bear upon the recipients of those ballot papers, is beyond all reasonable conception.

We know that the Northern Ireland Office has an almost hysterical anxiety about the Sinn Fein vote, an anxiety which we believe does not correspond with anything in the long-term electoral experience in Northern Ireland. But however malevolent Sinn Fein may be, there is a distinct limit to its organisational capabilities, and almost magical powers of organisation would be necessary in order for this new form of exercising the franchise to be seriously abused by those of evil intent.

Indeed, if any form of absent voting is arguably vulnerable to abuse, it is the absent vote for the person who is disabled physically from going to the poll. Only in that case is it possible, first, to bring pressure to bear for certification where certification is not fully justified, and, secondly, to secure a number of postal votes in the same general area and thus bring the ballot papers within the conceivable scope of misuse.

So the one major form of absent voting which was still left to Northern Ireland happens ironically to be the only one where it is virtually practicable to conceive that large-scale abuse could take place. Even that is probably difficult to demonstrate on the basis of the electoral figures of the more recent elections in Northern Ireland.

I have entered upon that because it is important that it should be understood, not least in the Province, why it was first proposed that this new privilege of exercising the franchise should be withheld from the Province. But we rely upon the House, Her Majesty's Opposition and the Government, now that there has been fuller consideration and the opportunity maturely to consider the alternatives, to withdraw that discrimination and to apply either clause 7 or whatever re-drafting may be needed to replace clause 7 equally to Northern Ireland as to the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. William Powell: As the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) observed, this is merely an extension of some of the principles that we were discussing on clause 6. The fundamental principle that Northern Ireland should have the same rules applies with just as much force as it did on clause 6. Notwithstanding the charming tag that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has chosen to try to label me with, I have undergone a conversion of not such a different character from the one that St. Paul underwent some years ago. My hon. Friend knows, just as well as I do, that I have been talking to him about this particular matter for a great many years—many more years than either of us would choose to remember. The principle is surely sound and the right hon. Member for South Down has correctly outlined the reasons why it is wrong to try to justify different rules for Northern Ireland than for the rest of the United Kingdom.

Some sections of Whitehall may dwell substantially upon electoral abuse in Northern Ireland, but there is a real danger that that is being exaggerated in their minds. We have heard, brutally almost, during the course of our debates how the real nuts and bolts of the Bill are, to some extent, party advantage. Throughout various debates hon. Members have alluded to that. It is obvious that different parties have been trying to protect what they perceive to be their own interests as we have been dealing with a number of different matters.

The arguments about electoral abuse come down to what Sinn Fein does or may get up to. When we hear representatives of those parties from Northern Ireland who are the most determinedly opposed to Sinn Fein argue that we have exaggerated it all and that it is not capable of all the things that are said of it, that is a cry to which we should listen with respect. They are, after all, the people who have to fight Sinn Fein at the polls in Northern Ireland.

It ill becomes hon. Members from the rest of the United Kingdom, who have little or no knowledge of what an election is like in Northern Ireland, to try to devise rules which the overwhelming part of the community in Northern Ireland finds unnecessary. It may be that there are justifications for minor distinctions. I do not say that postal vote is not as satisfactory in terms of the Parliamentary and Municipal Elections (Ballot) Act as a vote cast at a polling station in a ballot booth. A postal vote can be less secret than a vote cast in a polling station and the voter is open to pressure and intimidation. Hon. Members will have been concerned to ensure that old people can vote in old people's homes or their own homes, free of pressure and prying. It is important that postal votes should be given only when necessary. I support the extension of postal votes to holidaymakers, because the case is fully made out. The case for allowing people to exercise their franchise outweighs the case for keeping the vote in the polling stations, which, in other circumstances, should be our priority. The secrecy of the ballot can best be assured in the polling station.

When we extend the postal vote, we must use some restraint and ensure that those involved genuinely satisfy the requirements. I tabled the amendment to discover the extent to which the Government intend to ensure that and to give the Minister the opportunity to explain.

8.15 pm

Mr. Forth: The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) tempts us down some interesting highways and byways. I am as concerned about this problem as other hon. Members are about other matters.

At least two significant problems arise from the wording of the amendment. Clause 7 provides:

"the registration officer shall grant the application if—

(a) he is satisfied that the applicant's circumstances on the date of the poll will be . . . such that . . .

(b) he is satisfied that the applicant is or will be registered . . .

(c) the application meets the prescribed requirements."

That is an acceptable form of words, but the amendment suggests the inclusion of paragraph (d) which deals with a different principle. The amendment alters the grounds for the acceptance of the test, which is made contingent on a certain category of person providing authorisation for the person applying for a proxy or postal vote. We must look at the categories of people carefully. We are, after all, talking about that most important issue in our democratic procedures—an individual's entitlement to vote in an election. Few issues are more important. We must therefore be satisfied that the mechanism which gives people the vote is above and beyond all reasonable doubt and suspicion.

Members of Parliament are the first to be listed in the amendment. Hon. Members will find it difficult to quibble at that, although an element of vested interest exists. In many, if not most, cases the Member of Parliament will be authorising a vote for an individual who will be voting for him. One could, therefore, cast a passing doubt on that category, although I doubt whether I should carry many of my hon. Friends with me.

Mr. William Powell: Does my hon. Friend recall a celebrated criminal case some years ago when a Member of Parliament was deceived into countersigning an application? He had no knowledge of the true circumstances, and his good name was abused. That led to a long criminal trial and a substantial number of years in prison for an hon. Member.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because that highlights the difficulties. Many other difficulties could arise. It would be a brave Member who refused to authorise such an application, because of the difficulties in which that might place him subsequently, and the effect that it might have on potential supporters if it got around that he had impugned the integrity of a person applying for a postal vote by refusing to authorise it.

We can let that category pass unchallenged because it is so well and long established. The same applies to justices of the peace, who are above and beyond reproach in such matters.

The next category, ministers of religion, causes problems. I shall tread carefully, because I do not want to cause offence. The title "minister of religion" has become broad and generous. Many people who style themselves as ministers of religion today would not in the past have been accepted as such. I shall not name individual religions or sects, but the title "minister of religion" is not a sufficient safeguard to ensure no abuse. I regret that many people style themselves as ministers of religion. How would the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed satisfy himself that a person so styled genuinely came within that category?

We can accept the category of lawyer without too much argument. [Interruption.] Some hon. Members may not, but I am sufficiently generous to accept the category of lawyer.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The hon. Gentleman was disposing of ministers of religion. How does he square that with the present requirements for signatures for passports? He seeks to gloss over the classification of lawyers. Is he asking the Committee to accept that lawyers cannot be deceived?

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman is tempting me to digress, and I should be reluctant to do that given the pressure of time. However interesting it might be to discuss the authorisation of passports, I am sure that I would quickly be reminded that we are discussing the authorisation of applications for proxy and postal votes. Therefore, I shall not be tempted to follow the hon. Gentleman.

We run into the most fascinating potential difficulties over the term "bank officer." I believe that I am correct when I say that someone could legitimately and properly leave school at the age of 16 and work for a bank. Many young people do. It is an honourable position, but it gives rise to the possibility that, under the terms of the amendment, someone who was of voting age—over 18—could have his application for a postal or proxy vote authorised by a 16-year-old who had only just started working for a bank but who would be properly styled a "bank officer." That category is unacceptable. The fact that the amendment is loosely cast invalidates it.

Similarly, there are difficulties with some of the other categories, but I shall not detain the Committee by going through them in more detail.

Mr. Beith: Is it not apparent that the hon. Gentleman and I have done a service to the nation if we have brought to the notice of the Home Office Minister with responsibility for passports the glaring deficiencies in the arrangements by which passports are now authorised?

Mr. Forth: Indeed. What has been said this evening may well give rise to significant legislation and the opportunity to consider those matters in greater detail. I am reluctant to do that, as I am sure that many right hon. and hon. Members wish to contribute to the debate.

The categories that I have described are sufficient to invalidate the amendment. The final category has the effrontery to refer to "a person of similar standing known personally to the applicant for at least two years."

One is driven to ask: of similar standing to whom? Is it of similar standing to the 16-year-old bank officer, to the extremely dubious minister of some religion or other—of which kind is not specified—or is it a person of similar standing to the Member of Parliament who may have a vested interest in giving a vote to someone whose application may not be the most correct and proper?

The amendment is ill-thought-out, ill-considered and poorly drafted. To accept it would not do justice to the Bill. I therefore beg the Committee to reject it.

Mr. Barron: It was interesting to listen to the comments of the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) about the list. I am sure that he could have gone on to the second half of the list and explained the categories in which anomalies might arise in relation to the countersigning of applications for proxy and postal votes. What I find interesting—this is something that the hon. Gentleman missed — is that the categories have something in common. They are middle class, and perhaps potential supporters of the so-called alliance parties.

Coming from a sensible Socialist area of south Yorkshire, I find it amazing that hon. Members have not considered the type of people who are likely to want to have countersignatures on applications for postal and proxy votes. In my constituency, they would normally be elderly people. They would look around and ask who were the responsible people in their lives and areas who could accept the further responsibility of ensuring that application forms were countersigned. I am amazed that we can have a list of middle-class, salaried people and not consider matrons of old people's homes. They are more responsible, more receptive and more likely to be readily available to sign such forms.

The list that has been presented to us in the amendment includes a Member of Parliament. I am sure that hon. Members and the vast majority of the electorate know that Members of Parliament for areas such as Berwick-upon-Tweed and Rother Valley in south Yorkshire normally live a large part of their lives—when Parliament is sitting—hundreds of miles from their constituencies. The likelihood of people being able to contact Members of Parliament is limited. The same can be said for many other people on the list. If a bank officer is interpreted to mean a bank manager as opposed to a 16-year-old bank clerk, one would need an appointment to see a bank officer or a manager in my local bank to get an application form countersigned.

Justices of the peace are on the list. There are some lay magistrates in my constituency, and a knock on the door would be sufficient to get them to sign an application form, but not everyone knows who the magistrates are. The people who normally do know are not those who see them to have forms countersigned.

School teachers, police officers and doctors are included. People go to see a doctor about their medical needs. They do not want to have to think about seeing the local family doctor to have a form for a vote in a forthcoming election countersigned. The amendment just gives a host of job descriptions which do not really fit people's needs.

I go further than the matron in the old people's home. The signature could be that of a warden of sheltered accommodation — flats or bungalows. Because of the cuts in the housing support grant, in my constituency we have only been building flats and bungalows for old people to release other housing. They have a warden to look after them, and wardens are responsible people.

Mr. Bermingham: Will my hon. Friend define what an "established civil servant" is? Does he have to have so many grades on a Civil Service scale or is he something else? How does anyone know who is an "established civil servant"?

Mr. Barron: That is a fair comment. I cannot answer that question. An "established civil servant" leaves a great many questions about who or what he is. It would be strange to think of accepting the amendment.

Wardens of sheltered accommodation in my constituency are not professional people. They do not have a salary, which is normally one of the marks of a professional person. They are paid weekly and they are on low incomes. It would be difficult to fit them into the category of "a person of similar standing". That means different things to each right hon. and hon. Member. Therefore, we need to ask the Minister to clarify what provisions he believes should be included in the regulations with regard to countersigning.

Where I come from, and in my constituency, one of the people in the community who is of very high standing, and who looks after many things, is the trade union official. I should have thought that he was an obvious person to be included in any list of those who could countersign the form. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said that this was a probing amendment. It seems that the hon. Gentleman has not probed far at all in regard to those who should countersign voting forms.

8.30 pm

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has already said that consideration is being given to the precise form that regulations should take, the category of persons who should be entitled to be countersignatories and the circumstances in which they should be able to sign an application for an absent vote. Like the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), I understand the reasons why such provisions should be in regulations, although I must confess that I have some doubts about always leaving such important matters to regulations. I would be much happier in many ways if such important issues could be contained within the Bill itself. However, I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to give me some reassurance when he replies.

The present absent voting provisions have grave defects. Serious abuses occur. One should be concerned about the fact that such abuses might take place on a wider scale, simply because many more people will be able to apply for an absent vote in future, as everyone agrees. In those circumstances, it is important to build in the best possible safeguards. I understand the difficulties of drawing more closely the circumstances in which somebody should be able to apply for an absent vote, bearing in mind the difficulties of defining holidays and so on. The best safeguard that we can have lies in the category of persons who should be able to countersign. In clause 7 as it stands, it might appear that we are providing absent votes on demand. Many party agents and, indeed, many electoral registration officers who have seen the clause have assumed that we are providing for absent votes on demand.

The possibility for abuse is particularly great in elections where the turnout is especially low. The sort of elections that spring immediately to mind are local government elections. We are extending the provision to them. At those elections, the turnout is sometimes as low as 30 per cent. Many of those who would be prepared to turn out in a parliamentary election, and have a commitment to a particular party, are not prepared to turn out at a local government election. Party activists going round the houses could say to people who said that they had a commitment to that party but doubted whether they would bother to go out and vote, "If you are in some doubt as to whether you will go out and vote, why not fill in an application for a postal vote? It is very easy. You are entitled to it and it will save you the trouble of going out to vote." Even those who are keen to vote could see the advantages of exercising their right to vote at home. As many hon. Members, including the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), said on Second Reading, once we get away from the secrecy of the polling booth, the validity of the vote falls into doubt. There is a big question mark over the validity of the poll.

Therefore, we must first define as carefully as we can the "relevant circumstances", to use the terms of the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. I should like the "relevant circumstances", to be defined reasonably closely. I should like the countersignatory to confirm not only that the applicant is who he claims to be, but that the circumstances in which he is applying for an absent vote are genuine and justified.

Who is the countersignatory to be? My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) and the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) referred to some of the difficulties that arise in relation to the wide range of categories laid down in the amendment. I believe that it is probably right to limit the countersignatories to justices of the peace. The reason is simply that when they take up that office they accept certain responsibilities. We all know that there are JPs who are willing to countersign various applications, for reasons that we would not consider justified. Some JPs are much more true than others to the principles to which they swore when they took up that office. Just as JPs are specified for various purposes in the Representation of the People Act 1983, it is right that in this part of the Bill they should be the ones who have to countersign.

I hope that careful consideration will be given to that aspect, because it is one of the most important parts of the Bill. I also hope that at the end of the day nobody will be able to claim, as many people believe at present, that we are allowing absent voting on demand.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I believe that an absent vote is a right, but it must be established. It is not an automatic right. Therefore, having counter-signatures, in whatever provision requires it, is correct. I should have thought that the initial provisions of the Bill made greater sense than the list supplied to us by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). Immediately the list is in front of us, it is apparent that it is not exhaustive——

Mr. Forth: It is exhausting.

Mr. Bruinvels: Indeed, it is exhausting.

It is apparent that trade union officials should have been on the list, as well as matrons of old people's homes and so on. There is no doubt that it could be extended. If there is to be a list, I should prefer it to be returned to the original provisions. I have looked carefully at the provisions, and I must ask the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed why the right is given to some people and not to others. Why should this be an elitist list, as it is in a way? The list includes a Member of Parliament, a justice of the peace and a minister of religion, compared with a bank officer and a schoolteacher. It is a strange cross-section of people.

I do not necessarily accept that it is a middle-class cross-section of people, but it is strange to link an established civil servant with a doctor. It is particularly amusing, on this day of all days, that under the proposed list we are looking for a civil servant to countersign. I understood that Clive Ponting was an established civil servant, and does not like signing anything. For that reason alone, it is a strange provision.

A minister of religion is included in the list. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) referred to that. All that I would say is that some ministers do not know the truth, for example, about the virgin birth or other points. One must wonder whether they are the right people. I have great confidence in the medical profession. Its members might be around for many years and know the person since birth.

Mr. William Powell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to express great confidence in the medical profession, but has he noticed that in the drafting a distinction is drawn between a civil servant and an established civil servant, but no such distinction is drawn between doctors? The words "established doctor" do not appear. When he refers to doctors, no doubt my hon. Friend will bear it in mind that the doctor will not have to produce any evidence that he is a duly qualified doctor, if that meaning is to be attached to the word "established".

Mr. Bruinvels: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. There is no evidence that the doctor is established and no evidence that he is a medical person. He could be a doctor of letters or a doctor of law.

Mr. Bermingham: Or Dr. Death.

Mr. Bruinvels: I should not like him to sign my application. That could be the kiss of death.

The idea of having to compare one group with another is abhorrent. The definition of "a person of similar standing"

is another peculiar way of trying to assess what sort of person can countersign an application. Surely our main purpose must be to ensure that those who want to vote in their absence are legitimately witnessed in their application and their vote. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will confirm that the provisions as itemised in detail, without the amendment, make far more sense than the details set out in the amendment. For that reason alone, I cannot support the amendment.

Sir John Farr: I heard most of the debate on the amendment before I left the Chamber. I had the opportunity of listening to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) as he moved the amendment. As I said after he had moved the previous amendment, it is a pity to see him knocking around with a suspicious attitude to everyone. He seems to be suggesting that everyone must be vetted by one of the persons listed in the amendment.

Until the hon. Gentleman introduced amendment No. 39, the debate had been one of relative harmony and mutual good humour. It is regrettable that the hon. Gentleman saw fit to introduce an acid-like amendment. It is even more regrettable that he has now introduced another similar amendment. To my simple way of thinking, it suggests that the Liberal party does not trust anyone without having him vetted, whatever he does, if electoral practice is involved. That is extraordinary. It is not the right way to attract new voters to an up-and-coming party.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman cannot have been following the debates on the Bill very carefully. If he had been following them with care, he would have noticed that until a relatively late stage in our proceedings it was the Government's view that no one in Northern Ireland should have the extended absent voting rights given to him that are proposed for those in the rest of the United Kingdom. The Government have conceded, as a result of argument, discussion, and perhaps a little pressure, that it would be reasonable to make the extension. Both sides of the Committee have been considering ways in which it would be reasonable to extend postal voting and the conditions that should be attached to the extensions.

Sir John Farr: I was about to address myself to the qualifications of those who are supposed to pry into the qualifications of a voter. As my hon. Friend the Minister for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) has said, a minister of religion is a rather nebulous creature at this moment. If he were a bishop, I would say definitely that he would not be an acceptable object. Let us suppose that the minister is of lower standing than a bishop. Does a minister in the Church of Scientology count as a minister of religion? Has the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed thought out the consequences of his rather vague amendment, which could have the most appalling results if it were enacted?

As for the reference to

"a person of similar standing"—

well, really! With great respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell), that would provide a remunerative lawyer's paradise. With all respect to my hon. Friend, he could spend days and weeks at someone's expense arguing what that provision means. I am sure that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed has not thought out the amendment carefully. When my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State replies, I hope that he will take fairly short steps in throwing it out.

8.45 pm

Mr. Mellor: I would not want the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) to feel hard done by. He has tabled an amendment that sets out the qualifications for those who should countersign applications for passports and he is entitled to do that as a basis for discussing the countersignatory arrangements for absent voting. When he returns home this evening to his Bournvita and a pamphlet on site value rating, I would not want him to feel depressed by the thought that he alone threw a spanner in an otherwise harmonious works. I say that to him from the bottom of my heart. He should not take this too hard.

Coming to business, the fact is that, contrary to what my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) said—I appreciate that he was putting the point of view of others and not his own—this is not a part of the Bill that offers absent voting on demand. Clause 7 deals with a unified requirement, so that one test has to be satisfied instead of a mass of anomalous tests. The ERO has to be satisfied that the applicant's circumstances on the date of the poll will be such, or are likely to be, that he cannot reasonably be expected to vote in person. A form will have to be completed to set out the reasons for that. We think that the ERO should have the benefit of seeing the signature of the individual making the application, which will be written in the knowledge that it will be a criminal offence to make a false declaration. We think that there should also be a countersignature. That is my view and I do not think that anyone is arguing against that. The issue that troubles me is whether there should be any restriction based on employment, or some other test, on the sort of person who should be able to act as a countersignatory.

Mr. Beith: Several of the Minister's hon. Friends, notably the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr), seemed to be arguing that there should be no countersignature. I hope that the Minister will address himself to that argument.

Mr. Mellor: Yes, I think that the primary intention of my hon. Friends might have been to send the hon. Gentleman home to his Bournvita and a pamphlet on site value rating. Perhaps they were not necessarily concerned to torpedo for ever the idea that he has put before the Committee. It is possible that they were arguing that it was damned by its association with the hon. Gentleman. If the argument had been presented to them cold, without them knowing that the hon. Gentleman had advocated it, their attitude might have been different. That is merely idle speculation on my part.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed will appreciate that I have been taking his argument seriously. Indeed, I have defended his contribution to thought. Passport application forms require the signatures of anomalous categories and the requirements have been endorsed by successive Governments as being those which should be satisfied before passports may be obtained. I do not criticise the hon. Gentleman for having moved the amendment. The Government take the view in the White Paper that the qualifications of the countersignatory should be registration as an elector and someone who is known to the applicant, but not a member of his family, who is prepared to certify that to the best of his knowledge—there is a penal sanction attached to that — the circumstances described in the application form are true.

We opened up the matter rather more widely in the absent voting consultation paper by suggesting that the qualification should be further tightened by limiting it to certain categories of person. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed has mentioned a possible way in which that could be achieved. Further restrictions might have been produced, for instance, by limiting the number of applications which an elector can sign. Of course, a medical practitioner would be exempted from those requirements.

I have listened to the debate with an open mind, because it is true that regulations will be made in due course. That is the normal practice, and not a sinister recent manifestation of a desire to keep things out of the statute book, as my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley suggested. There will be consultations with the parties and the local authority associations before regulations are introduced, so nothing that we say tonight is conclusive.

In so far as I have listened to the arguments and they have had an impact on me, I believe that the speech of the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) was especially effective. He asked why the warden of an old person's home or of sheltered accommodation could not be a signatory. I hope that I have not damned the hon. Gentleman's career for ever by praising him. If I have, I shall withdraw my remarks immediately and attack him, so that his status and credibility might be restored.

He also mentioned trade union officials. We must recognise that any list of categories, even one as well hallowed by time and experience as the list for passport applications, is open to anomalies and does not withstand much cross-examination. On that basis, I shall leave the debate, having invited the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed to withdraw his amendment, thinking that it will be difficult, and possibly undesirable, to insert any qualifications beyond the fact that the countersignatory must be a registered elector, known to the applicant, but not a part of his family, and prepared to make the required certification.

Mr. Bermingham: I rise immediately to defend my hon. Friend and office sharer the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), who raised an important point. Perhaps eventually the qualifications of countersignatories will be introduced in regulations. The Minister may consider that that matter should be brought back to the House, because it would be an opportunity to tidy up some of the anomalies in other countersignatory cases, for example in passport applications, which can give rise to much hardship and nuisance.

Mr. Mellor: That matter would have to be considered separately. As to the regulations, proper consultation will be carried out with the parties and the local authority associations. Therefore, nothing can be concluded tonight. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed simply wished to have a demonstration of the Government's thinking on the matter. The more that I have thought about it, having flirted with the idea of a restricted list, the more I believe that the proposition in the White Paper is probably the best one.

Mr. Waller: Will my hon. Friend consider whether the category should be limited to justices of the peace, who are established in the Representation of the People Act 1983 as the only people who can sign applications for several purposes? If one said that any elector in a constituency who was not related to the applicant could countersign his application, in practical terms that might become a case of absent votes on demand, although it may not be so in theory. There would be no realistic way in which a returning officer could check whether an application was justified.

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend has moved back to another point, but perhaps I should deal with it. If the applicant is prepared to assert that the reason why he is not at his home address is that he is away on business, there is no penal sanction attached to that. One might just as well say in this case that, if someone is prepared to tell a big enough lie, no electoral registration officer can deal with him. We propose a much more formalised method of application which requires someone else to join in the deception, if there is a deception, and we are introducing a penal sanction. I do not agree that it will create absent voting on demand. We are making absent votes properly available to those who need them. There will always be some abuse, as there is with the present system.

As to my hon. Friend's point about justices of the peace, I believe that other hon. Members thought that that would be too restrictive, as do I. We must be practical about this matter. Although it is true that prudent people —the wise virgins who trim their wicks appropriately, as the biblical injunction states—will have made their arrangements for postal votes well before the whistle blows for an election, many people will not — [Interruption.] I am sorry if I have offended the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) by getting my biblical quotation wrong. The election will be called probably no more than three weeks and two days before the polling date, and postal votes will close about two weeks and three days before that date. There will be barely a week in which to make all the arrangements for postal votes. If all the people who will be away on holiday at the time of the election will frantically make arrangements, I wonder whether only justices of the peace could cope with it.

That is another reason why we must have the courage of our convictions and accept that the arguments advanced by some of my hon. Friends, and especially well advanced by the hon. Member for Rother Valley, are conclusive. We should not try to create categories other than that the countersignatory must be an adult elector who is not related to the applicant.

Mr. Beith: The debate has brought out some interesting matters, including a rather sharp division of opinion in the Conservative party. Some Conservative Members believe that there should be a much narrower category of people allowed to countersign an application for an absent vote—narrower than the category that I advanced in my purely probing amendment, and narrower than the Government considered at an earlier stage.

The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) suggested that it should be limited to justices of the peace. I have not so far detected any support for so restricted a category. However, other Conservative Members have given the impression that a countersignature should not be necessary. Unusually, I find myself midway between those two extremes of Tory thinking.

Absent voting must be extended with some care, for the reasons that I advanced earlier, and for the reasons which led the Government originally to have doubts about the extent to which they would make available a provision for absent voting. Therefore, a countersignature system must be necessary, and my thinking is moving along much the same lines as the Minister's on this matter.

The provision described by the Minister, which will feature in the regulations, together with penal sanctions, may be sufficient for this purpose, but the debate has brought out something else. Among the Government's supporters, the present arrangements for the approval of passport applications are viewed with something bordering on contempt. They are certainly viewed as an inadequate model for fundamentally important provisions, such as the right to an absent vote.

Those views have even more worrying implications, because the control of passports is related to the prevention of terrorism and to many other major issues with which the Home Office is concerned. The fact that this brief examination has displayed the inadequacies, as a model for absent voting, of the present list of people who can authorise passport applications demonstrates that the Minister will have to consider those matters as well. It would appear that there is no support in the Conservative party for the present arrangements for issuing passports. What we should do now when people come to us with their inevitable passport applications I am not sure.

The arguments put forward by the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) about who might be on a limited list, to use the Government's favourite phrase, apply equally to both issues. The passport list is out of date and does not provide an adequate model. I agree that wardens in old people's homes and wardens in sheltered accommodation would be appropriate for countersignature purposes. They are already sometimes involved in obtaining postal votes for people on medical grounds. There is no reason, therefore, why they should not also be involved in this part of the process. I agree with what the hon. Member for Rother Valley said about the extended categories that ought to be included for all of these purposes. If there is to be a list, it is logical that it should be the same for one Home Office purpose as for another.

On balance, the Minister is probably on the right lines in assuming that the more open attestation provided by an elector to whom the person is known is probably adequate for the purpose; but an element of danger still exists, and I am surprised and concerned that some hon. Members seem to be unaware that there is a problem. I acquit one or two Conservative Members of that charge. However, those who assume that the extension and ease of application for postal votes would create no difficulties do not understand what led to the Government having doubts in the first place about its extension to Northern Ireland. As hon. Members who represent Northern Ireland constituencies have mentioned, the problems there may be greater in scale, but they could arise on this side of the water. It is for that reason that the Labour party has been more cautious and unwilling to extend voting rights than either the alliance or the Government. That fact is not recognised by some Conservative Members.

I recognise that the Minister is putting forward fairly sensible proposals. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. William Powell: It would be wrong to allow clause 7 to pass without noting that it introduces a most important change, which fortunately has proved uncontroversial. By means of this clause we are extending the right to vote to people who are on holiday. A very important change is being made to our electoral law. I take this opportunity to congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State upon clause 7. The passing of this clause will mark a tremendous improvement in our electoral law.

Sir John Farr: The heading to clause 7 relates to the absent vote at a particular election and to the absent voters list. I wrongly put down an amendment relating to holidaymakers under clause 6. Holidaymakers are fully covered in clause 7. At the last election it troubled me greatly that one came across people who had lost their vote, either through their own ill health or through the ill health of a close relative. The Committee will say that we cannot cater for ill health or for the fact that somebody has suffered an unfortunate bereavement and therefore cannot be expected to leave the place of death or the family home to register his vote elsewhere.

At the last election I came across several instances of people whose close relatives were seriously ill. I have in my files a letter from one gentleman who had to spend his time continuously at the bedside of his wife. She had been taken gravely ill at short notice. He could find nobody to take his place in order to allow him to go and vote. I promised this gentleman and all the other people who wrote to me that when the Bill came before the House I should seek to introduce what I call an emergency clause.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) has pointed out many of the omissions from the Bill. It does not contain an emergency clause. I believe that there should be a longstop of that kind to cover a human tragedy. I should have liked to see an emergency clause, so that all the carefully laid plans of my hon. Friend in clause 7 could not be set at naught overnight. I should have liked to see an emergency clause so that we could do our best to bring some form of voting justice to those who, through no fault of their own, are deprived of the vote.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: In May 1983 the Leicester Mercury launched a campaign throughout Leicestershire calling for a change in the law to bring about absent voting and to give holidaymakers the right to vote.

Clause 7 is welcome on behalf of my constituents and others throughout the country. The campaign that was launched in Leicester was a great success. Democracy can now be seen to have an effective part to play. Many people will now use the opportunity to vote, and I look forward to seeing increased Conservative majorities in many constituencies.

Schedule 1

MANNER OF VOTING

Question proposed, That this schedule be the First Schedule to the Bill.

Mr. Waller: Part III of schedule 1 deals with absent voting at municipal elections in the City of London. This is the only part of a complicated Bill which is related to an area which has quite different elections from the rest of the country. It is important that hon. Members should be aware that the City of London corporation, a body much involved with pomp and tradition, is a significant planning authority. If one considers the number of electors in the city, it is almost the most important planning authority in the country. Enormously important decisions are made by that authority. Following the abolition of the GLC it will become even more important. It will become a unitary authority.

Why is absent voting in the City of London so important? It is particularly important because many of those who are entitled to vote in elections to the City corporation do not reside or work in the city. Any partnership which has premises in the City of London can provide for each of those partners a vote for every ward in the city in which those premises are situated.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: As a freeman of the City of London myself, I think that my hon. Friend will agree with me that it is inequitable that a partner in, for instance, a firm of chartered accountants may nominate certain wards in which to vote and thereby prolong an unfair voting practice.

Mr. Waller: My hon. Friend points to an important issue. Many firms have offices in several different wards. One well-known firm of chartered accountants with approximately 65 partners situated in various parts of the United Kingdom has premises in four different wards in the City of London. Many firms with more than 100 partners have offices in the city. I refer to partnerships, because companies are not able to endow their directors with votes. Sixteen firms have premises in more than one ward. The only requirement to qualify for a vote is that one should pay £10 in rates per annum. Therefore, one could have an entitlement to a vote in the City of London elections if the firm for which one worked had a car parking space.

The issue becomes more serious when one realises that some wards have as many as several thousand electors and others have as few as 30. It has been calculated that, by the expenditure of approximately £12,500 in the payment of rates in one year in carefully selected wards, it would be possible to take control of the City of London corporation and be responsible for all the important decisions made in that area. I do not suggest that that will happen in a conspiratorial way, but sooner or later doubts will arise about elections in the City of London for the reasons that I have put forward. It is therefore important, before it is too late——

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I am finding it a little difficult to relate the remarks of the hon. Gentleman to schedule 1 to the Bill, which is fairly narrow and technical. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can link his remarks to schedule 1.

Mr. Waller: A large proportion of those who vote in the City of London do so by post. As schedule 1, part III, is concerned with postal votes in the City of London, I consider this to be an important part of the Bill which has so far attracted too little attention. I hope that, by speaking tonight, I may have started an extended debate.

Dr. Marek: I support the sense of what the hon. Gentleman said about the City of London. I hope that some hon. Members will turn their attention to this matter, and table appropriate amendments on Report.

Clause 11

OFFENCES AS TO DECLARATIONS, ETC.

Mr. Bermingham: I beg to move amendment No. 79, in page 15, line 34, leave out

"offence"

and insert

"illegal practice".

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 80, in page 15, leave out lines 36 and 37 and add

"guilty of an illegal practice".

Mr. Bermingham: I suggest that we do not discuss amendment No. 80 because a penal sanction must be made under clause 11.

Amendment No. 79 would bring matters into line with other provisions of the Bill.

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his brevity. I am happy to tell him that anybody who makes a false declaration in order to become an overseas voter will commit an offence under section 61 of the Representation of the People Act 1983. Section 61 offences are punishable as illegal practices and the penalties would include disqualification from voting. I think that the hon. Gentleman already has what he seeks.

Mr. Bermingham: I beg to ask leave to withdraw amendment No. 79.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Dr. Marek: I hope that, when postal votes are checked at a count, the returning officer will be able to compare the signature on the postal vote with the original signature on the application form.

Clause 11 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 12

DEPOSIT BY CANDIDATES AT PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS

9.15 pm

Sir John Farr: I beg to move amendment No. 51, in page 16, line 6, leave out '£1,000' and insert '£500'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this, we may take the following amendments: No. 70, in page 16, line 6, leave out '£1,000' and insert

'£500 or such amount as the Secretary of State may by order determine; no order shall be made under this section unless a draft of it has been laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament'.

No. 52, in page 16, line 9, leave out 'one twentieth' and insert 'one tenth'.

No. 85, in page 16, line 9, leave out 'one twentieth' and add 'three fortieths'.

New clause 7—Abolition of deposit and increase in number of nominations—

'(1) In Schedule 1 of the principal Act, paragraph 9 ("Deposit") shall cease to have effect;

(2) In paragraph 7(1) of Schedule 1 in the principal Act, for the word "eight" there shall be substituted "at least one hundred".'.

New clause 8—Nomination papers—

'In Schedule 1 to the principal Act paragraph 7(2) shall cease to have effect.'.

New clause 11—Exemption from deposit—

'In Schedule 1 to the Principal Act (Parliamentary elections rules) shall be added a new rule 1013

"(8A) A candidate shall be exempted from the requirement of depositing a sum with the returning officer provided that he is the nominated candidate of a registered political party as defined in the Schedule (Registered Political Parties)".'.

New clause 23—Conditions for nomination—

'Schedule 1 to the principal Act shall be amended by substituting for rules 9 and 53 the following rule—

"A nomination shall not be valid unless it is signed by 500 electors of the Division for which that nomination is made; the nomination shall remain valid notwithstanding a margin of error in the number of five per cent.; and any such nomination may be presented for checking by the returning officer during a period of six months prior to the date of a parliamentary election".'.

Amendment No. 65—new schedule—

'REGISTERED POLITICAL PARTIES

(1) The Secretary of State for the Home Department may, by order, establish a scheme for the registration of political parties. No condition of eligibility shall attach to such a scheme, except that a registration fee, prescribed by the Secretary of State shall be payable.

(2) Any party so registered shall be a registered political party for the purposes of this Act.

(3) No political party will have to register to be able to participate in an election. Political parties not wishing to register will be able to continue to field candidates by the method otherwise prescribed in the principal Act.'.

Sir John Farr: We in the midlands have felt for a long time that £150 is too low for an election deposit. However, the Government's proposed deposit of £1,000 is unrealistically high. The £150 deposit was established many years ago, and, like the dog licence, it has remained unaltered. Action is obviously needed, if only to rule out the huge number of unsuitable candidates who stand for Parliament, particularly at by-elections.

In the past few weeks, I have received many letters from teenagers in schools in my constituency who want to know how to become a Member of Parliament. I have guided them to other constituencies and offered them good advice about their prospects in Leicester and Leicestershire for advancing their career. None of those teenagers has been deterred by the £150 deposit. If we raised the deposit to £1,000, surely that would deter teenagers who are still at school and who are keen on politics and may even want to set up their own party. Such a massive increase in the deposit would be a deterrent to those who aspire to enter Parliament.

I believe that, sooner or later, the House will be televised and that will lead to more people wanting to stand for Parliament. Whatever their reasons, we have no right to bar them by price from attempting to reach the privileged position that we are lucky enough to enjoy.

The deposit recommended in the Bill is definitely too high. No deposit is required in local government elections, but I accept that we must stop the sort of thing that happened in the Chesterfield by-election in February last year. The vast majority of the 17 candidates lost their deposits, but forfeited only £150 each. I will not list all the ridiculous names that appeared in the Chesterfield by-election, but 15 of them lost their deposit.

I want to consider what happens in other countries with which we are closely associated. We may be the oldest practising democracy; I think we are the best but we are not the only one. Fairly close to us is Belgium; the information I have this month is that no deposit is required for a candidate for either House. In Denmark, no deposit is required for a candidate for either House. In France, the deposit for a candidate for the Assemblée Nationale is 1,000 French francs which is about £100. In Germany, no deposit is required of a parliamentary candidate. In Ireland, a candidate for the Dail has to make a deposit of £100. In Italy, no deposit is required. In Canada, the deposit is 200 Canadian dollars. In Japan, it is 2 million yen; no doubt my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) can do an immediate conversion but I think it is about £120. In New Zealand, the deposit is 100 New Zealand dollars which, at the present rate of conversion, is about £80.

The Government have got it wrong in proposing a deposit of £1,000. It will be a deterrent to many people if they have to find such an amount. We want to encourage everyone who wants to stand for election to do so; we do not want them to be deterred by the price.

Mr. Winnick: I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman has told us about other countries. It does not persuade me that they are right and we are wrong. Does he know whether facilities such as free postage at elections are afforded to candidates in those countries on the same basis as here?

Sir John Farr: I have all the details but I do not want to detain the Committee too long. Some have requirements about the number of signatures required to support a candidate. Others have different formulae for the percentage of votes that a candidate has to obtain to retain his deposit. Basically they all have a smaller entry fee or membership fee than we have.

I hope my right hon. and learned Friend will accept amendment No. 51, which is fairly near to the suggestion in the report of the Select Committee. I think it recommended a deposit of between £600 and £1,000. I hope, too, that my right hon. and learned Friend will accept my suggestion in amendment No. 52 that the number of votes required to avoid forfeiting a deposit should be one tenth rather than one twentieth. If the deposit were reduced to £500 it would be better at the same time to double the percentage of votes required to save one's deposit from 5 per cent. to 10 per cent. I shall be interested to hear the response of my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Beith: Discussion on the Bill has been dogged from the beginning by the issue whether we should put a barrier of a £1,000 deposit in the way of someone who wants to stand for election.

It has been the contention of those who wanted that barrier not only that the £150 figure was long out of date, but that the barrier was needed to deter candidates who were frivolous, undesirable, threatening to our way of life or in some other way worthy of being deterred. It has been the contention of my party throughout the discussions—a contention shared by members of other parties and by a number of people outside the House—that that is not the right approach.

The imposition of a barrier of £1,000 would simply deter those unable to find that sum of money—not necessarily those who were frivolous or those whose motives in standing for election were wrong, perhaps for some commercial or undesirable purpose, or any of the other groups such as those with a racialist policy that some Members of Parliament have thought might be deterred by a high deposit. We have argued that such a high deposit would damage some of the smaller parties, such as the Ecology party, which has made representations to Members in all parts of the House, Mebyon Kernow and Plaid Cymru.

A high deposit would present problems even for parties that do not lose deposits. Our position is somewhat different from that of the Labour party which lost 119 deposits at the last general election. We lost barely a handful. Even so, having to put up so large a sum at the beginning of a campaign is a cash flow disability to a party fighting an election. For example, a party might have to find more than £500,000 before funding any of the expenses involved in fighting the election. At a time when its resources are most greatly stretched, that would be a considerable additional burden.

Mr. Winnick: Let us consider the matter on the basis of preserving our parliamentary democracy. Of course we recognise immediately that having a deposit of whatever sum—I am not in favour of £1,000—would not stop candidates whose motive in standing was to promote racial hatred. Does the hon. Gentleman really believe, and is he telling the Committee, that, if the system was changed to one of collecting signatures, that would not help such candidates? Is he not aware that it is such organisations as the National Front which have always advocated that change? Is the hon. Gentleman arguing that a deposit is no deterrent to such candidates and that, on that basis, we should recognise that that would not cause any harm to our parliamentary system?

Mr. Beith: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman because I believe that it is better for parties to stand for election and be shown, as the National Front has been shown, to command minimal support in the country as a whole. It received derisory support in relation to the claims it made. Should it be prevented from putting up candidates and provided with an opportunity to say that because it was denied that opportunity it must take to the streets to put its case? I do not believe that we should give it such an opportunity. The voters, quite sensibly, have shown that the vast majority have no truck with the appalling propositions of the National Front. I recognise that the hon. Gentleman believes that the barrier, whether deposit or signatures, should contribute to discouraging such organisations from putting up candidates at elections. Therefore, we start from a somewhat different approach.

As to the test itself, I believe it would be more relevant to ask whether a candidate enjoys support in the constituency in which he is standing than to ask him to produce money—wherever it may be from, whether inside or outside the constituency. The signature system is, at least in some measure, a test of support from within a constituency.

It is often argued that people can gather signatures in bus queues or while walking down the high street. It is not as simple as that, as those who have had to gather the minimal signatures now required must know. The signatures must be those of valid electors, with the electoral number placed alongside the signatures, which are then checked by the returning officers.

One of the two new clauses grouped with this amendment is designed to remove a technical difficulty from the present arrangements. Whether we have a large or small number of signatures, at present the nomination form must bear valid signatures and no provision is made for the discovery that one signature is accidentally found to be invalid. A new clause which stands in my name and which we will discuss later would ensure, if we went for a system of signatures, that it would be possible to submit 110 signatures, and so long as there were 100 valid signatures on the paper the test would have been satisfied. That is a technical point which I hope will receive the attention of the Home Office.

9.30 pm

The main issue is the test—whether the deposit is a reasonable test of a candidate's support in a constituency, and therefore whether money should be the test. My argument is that signatures are a more valid test and that money is no test at all.

The hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) is right to say that, even if we stick with the deposit system, we should not have a level as high as £1,000. Suggestions of £500, for example, seem a marked improvement in terms of the burden that would be placed on parties outside the House and on the initial capital burden which would be placed on the parties represented here.

If, as I believe they will, the Government move away from the £1,000 figure, they will help to relieve themselves of the charge that they might be influenced by the greater financial security of their party compared with others. A change in the deposit figure would help the Government to ensure that such a charge could not be made to stick.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that some Conservative Members would prefer the deposit to be even less, and that an amendment standing in my name suggests £250 so as to give anybody who wishes to stand the chance to do so?

Mr. Beith: It follows from what I have said that I would prefer the smallest deposit to which the Committee is prepared to agree. I do not believe that the size of a candidate's cheque book is a relevant test of any of the questions that we might ask to establish whether a person should avail himself of the opportunities of candidature. I appreciate that there are certain facilities and opportunities given to candidates and that those benefits cost money, such as the free delivery of post. There may be a case for not making those facilities available unless some test has been satisfied.

A financial test is not appropriate, however, and a deposit of £1,000 would be no answer. I would rather a candidate's financial resources were negligible, or virtually nil, so long as he could show that a number of people agreed to the proposition that he should be given the opportunity to stand. I would rather see him given that opportunity, however few votes he gets.

I do not accept the argument that the proliferation of fringe candidates at by-elections or even at general elections is a serious problem with which our democracy cannot contend. I fought a by-election in the early stages of what might be termed the blooming of a thousand flowers of fringe candidates. A number of interesting characters stood against me, representing a variety of strange causes, some from the Conservative and some from the Labour side. They represented various fringes of the political system, while some stood simply as individuals.

The conduct of that by-election in my constituency did not suffer from the presence of those people. Indeed, I do not believe that the Chesterfield by-election suffered materially or that the electorate were confused by the candidates. As it happens, I do not believe that the voters came to the right conclusion in electing the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). Those who voted for or against him were not materially or seriously confused by the presence of other candidates.

Certain other difficulties which arise—such as the ability of a candidate to veto a television broadcast in which a candidate from one of the principal parties wants to appear—should not be resolved by imposing a financial barrier. Such problems, if they need resolving, should be resolved by reference to the rules governing the television appearances of candidates and not by saying that only candidates who can afford more than £1,000 should be able to veto whether another candidate should appear on a television programme.

The deposit approach is mistaken, while the signatures approach is preferable. But if the Committee insists on persevering with the deposit idea, it would be wrong to accept the proposed figure of £1,000.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): In rising at this stage I want to make it absolutely clear that I am in no way seeking to truncate discussion. I merely thought that it would be convenient to give the Government's view.

Unlike the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), I think that the deposit is a perfectly respectable parliamentary barrier founded in principle. It is not just a financial barrier erected to make it more difficult for those who do not have the necessary money. The deposit is founded in principle because the essence of election to Parliament is the contest between people who have serious aspirations to represent a constituency. Everyone is entitled to stand; no one is prevented from standing. It is reasonable that the considerable privileges rightly enjoyed by parliamentary candidates should not be too readily available to those who stand for purposes other than a serious expectation of election. There is a variety of possible purposes. Personal publicity, the sheer fun of standing and the attempt to gain commercial advantage are among the motives that have influenced people to stand for election.

A more respectable motive is to advance a cause or an argument, even though there is no chance of being elected to Parliament. I do not believe that that is other than a distortion of the electoral process. It is possible for people to hold meetings outside an election context and to advance their views in a variety of ways, but if they are standing for Parliament the assumption must be that they regard themselves as people who have some credible chance not just of putting forward views that they would like to make more readily acceptable but of being elected to Parliament.

For those reasons, the deposit is a reasonable barrier—not an obstacle. It is not a barrier that prevents anyone from standing, but one that can be surmounted. The level at which that barrier should be set is a matter of degree.

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): Why is the deposit a reasonable test of a person's serious expectation of being elected?

Mr. Brittan: If he places the money down and is prepared to forfeit it, that indicates that he has some reasonable expectation of obtaining the number of votes required for him not to forfeit his deposit. There may be people who are simply prepared to throw their money away and have no serious expectation of obtaining the necessary number of votes. I suggest that there are not many of those people. Not many parties are prepared simply to do that. Therefore, the deposit is a hurdle that must be surmounted. It is not an absolute obstacle.

The benefits conferred upon candidates are considerable. The benefit of the free post is worth about £8,000 alone. It is reasonable to say that that benefit should not be enjoyed by someone who is not prepared to put something at risk.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed said that the problems, such as the veto on radio and television appearances, should be dealt with separately. I do not believe that that is so, because such aspects are part of our electoral system, which is designed to ensure fairness. I do not see why they should be removed simply to take away the problems caused by the proliferation of candidates. It is a matter of where one sets the level.

The Home Affairs Select Committee considered that aspect. The £1,000 figure has the respectable backing of the Select Committee's unanimous recommendation. That is the principal reason why that figure appears in the Bill. It is a respectable reason. One must consider that £1,000 is less than half what £150 in 1918 terms would be if translated into today's money. Plainly, any figure is bound to be arbitrary. Therefore, the Government have made it clear that they are prepared to listen to the views of all concerned and to see which figure would command the widest consensus among those who are prepared to accept that the deposit has a proper place in our electoral system.

I listened with great interest to what my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) said in support of the view that £1,000 is too high, and £500 is the right figure. It is no secret that we had discussions with all the parties about those matters, and in particular, as is right and proper, with the major Opposition party, the Labour party, which has a legitimate interest in these matters. As a result of the discussions, I came to the view that the figure of £500 would have the widest common consent in the Committee. Therefore, the Government now commend that figure to the Committee in the spirit of compromise and of wanting a measure such as this to go on the statute book with the widest agreement.

Mr. Winnick: We recognise the need for consensus and welcome the reduction from the proposed £1,000 to £500. Has it occurred to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the sum could have been increased by a more modest figure—say, £250—while retaining the number of votes that have to be gained before losing the deposit? Would that not have been a better way?

Mr. Brittan: I was going to come to that point.

I shall deal, first, with the suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) about the deposit not being forfeit, and exempting candidates from paying a deposit if they are nominated by political parties that were registered as such on a scheme to be prescribed by the order of the Secretary of State. I do not find it attractive to have such a registration system for the purpose of exemption of payments of deposits. I do not find it easy to see, although I have not had the benefit of hearing from my hon. Friend, why those parties that are formalised and organised in the way described should be given such a privilege. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, if he catches your eye, Sir Paul, will no doubt be able to deal with the argument as expanded rather than the argument as anticipated.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) asked about the threshold. The right balance is to increase substantially the deposit from £150 to £500, but to reduce the threshold not just from 12 per cent. to the 7·5 per cent. recommended by the Select Committee, but to 5 per cent. I have come to that conclusion because one is trying to set up a forfeit in the form of a deposit, if one wishes to look at it in that way, but a forfeit that should not be lost if the candidate concerned has established that he is a credible candidate in the sense of securing a reasonable percentage of the poll of those who vote in an election.

Again, there cannot be anything absolutely right when we talk about percentages. It can only be a matter of judgment or assessment. I am not proving or demonstrating that 5 per cent. is right or 7·5 per cent. is wrong. An analysis of recent elections will show that a threshold of 5 per cent. is sufficiently high to eliminate purely frivolous candidates, recognising that the word "frivolous" has a high element of subjectivity. At the same time, we should not inhibit the free expression of opinion, and the participation in elections of budding political parties that have serious claims to credibility at the time that they stand for election.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed discussed signatures. I do not commend the signature method to the Committee. The hon. Gentleman airily dismissed the technical problems. Any agent who has been involved in such matters for whatever political party would not dismiss the objections so readily. There might be ways round them, but even collecting the limited number of signatures required at present can be a headache for agents. One cannot simply disregard that.

9.45 pm

More seriously, I rely upon the question of principle. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed talks about 100 signatures and my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) in a new clause refers to 500 signatures. The number of signatures is not a proper test of support because those who sign do not promise their support for the candidate, but merely assent to nomination.

At the trial involving the election of my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) in 1983, it was alleged that one candidate collected his signatures in minutes at the pub opposite the town hall. People sign because they believe that a person should be allowed to stand, not because they support him. Even if we changed that and said that the person who signed was showing his support for the candidate, the problem would still exist. That would be a hollow gesture. It is possible to collect many signatures when all that is asked is to allow a person to stand.

The question is whether we believe it is right to erect some hurdle and impose a penalty if a person does not surmount that hurdle. It is reasonable and right that in an election to choose a Member of Parliament the hurdle should not be placed so high as to prevent serious candidates, but high enough to prevent abuses of the system of the type that have come to the fore in recent years.

In that spirit and for those reasons the Government commend the proposition that the deposit should be raised from £150 to £500 with a 5 per cent. threshold.

I beg to move, That the Chairman do report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

I move that in view of the hour, because many hon. Members wish to participate further in the debate and because we have made good progress.

Question put and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again tomorrow.

Housing Benefits

9.48 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Housing Benefits Amendment (No. 4) Regulations 1984 (S.I., 1984, No. 1965), dated 17th December 1984, a copy of which was laid before this House on 18th December, be annulled.

Those of us who watch these things with interest have seen a degree of activity by the Opposition, including the Official Opposition. The Minister can take it from that that there is an unusually high degree of interest in these regulations. They have been hurried through, arguably without proper consultation. They are ill-thought-out and will have adverse effects on bona fide claimants.

The DHSS seems to have responded with knee-jerk alacrity to some of the newspaper headlines and articles that were carried late in November 1984. The article carried in The Guardian on 17 November pointed out in its heading that the housing benefit loophole had appeared and could cost the DHSS as much as £190 million according to its estimates.

The Department responded by introducing these regulations. We have only to look at the front of the regulations to see that they were made on 17 December 1984; they were laid before Parliament on 18 December; and they came into operation on 19 December 1984. That was while we were in the course of the housing benefit review. Mr. Jeremy Rowe, CBE, has only just completed his report. I believe that it is in the hands of Ministers. They are in the course of a fundamental, far-reaching review of the system. Therefore, the least that the Government should have done should have been to defer the new regulations until they could have been incorporated into the complete review.

The introduction of the regulations goes against the Government's stated intention. Their circular HB(84)7 dated 20 December 1984 in paragraph 2 states:

"It is intended to avoid legislative changes wherever possible until decisions have been taken following the report of the Housing Benefit Review."

On 16 November, in a written answer, the Minister says much the same. Against that background, and if that is the Government's decision, why did they bring forward these regulations in this spatchcock and over-hasty fashion? The way in which the regulations have been introduced is undesirable. It raises an issue of some importance.

The way that the Department has operated during this Parliament on some of these issues does not bear careful examination. It does it no credit. Five other sets of regulations have attracted allegations of indecent haste. The first one that came to my attention when I became a Member of the House was in November 1983 when the springless mattress case brought forth a commissioner's decision. The timetable then was that the commissioner's decision was made on 2 November, regulations were laid on 4 November, they were in force on 5 November, referred to the social security advisory committee on 28 November, and debated by Parliament on 5 December. There are other such cases which show that the Department has in the past—I accept that the system is complicated—resorted to introducing regulations over-hastily. It has made something of a mockery of the consultation process.

As evidence of that, may I adduce the statement made by councillor John Donnelly, who is chairman of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities housing committee? His press release dated 9 January 1985 stated:

"effectively we were given only six working days to consider extremely complex proposals"— which they are—

"with wide-ranging implications. It was quite impossible to provide an adequate response in this timescale. To make matters worse, a few days after the original deadline, more changes were proposed. A response was demanded within four days. But this time the DHSS went one worse: they didn't even given us copies of the amendments proposed!"

Section 36 of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982—the parent Act of the regulations—makes it mandatory that the Secretary of State:

"shall consult with organisations appearing to him to be representative of the authorities concerned."

The Government are in danger of being charged, legitimately, that they are not proceeding or consulting with the appropriate authorities in good faith. That alone is a matter of concern.

Two regulations concern me in particular—regulations 11(3) and 18(3A), which create the new regulations governing joint tenancies. A joint occupier who, within the eight-week period prior to the creation of a joint tenancy or agreement, was a non-dependant of the other joint occupier or occupiers, will not now be eligible for housing benefit. Instead, he will continue to be treated as a non-dependant. That is unless the authority is satisfied that that joint tenancy or other agreement was not created to take advantage of the housing benefit system.

The other important regulation that I should like to discuss is regulation 23, which concerns so-called contrived tenancies. The regulations show that a person shall not be eligible for housing benefit where "it appears" to an authority that the tenancy was created to take advantage of the scheme, unless in the eight weeks prior to the creation of the tenancy or agreement that person already had a liability to make rent or rate payments in respect of that dwelling. Regulation 23 states that a person will not be eligible for housing benefit when he or she "resides with the person to whom he is liable to pay rent or, as the case may be, to make payments by way of rates" or

"is a close relative or the tenancy or other agreement between them is other than on a commercial basis."

The term "close relative" is defined to include step relatives and in-laws. That is the import of the regulations.

I should like to refer first to the joint tenancy provisions. In my opinion, the new regulation is unnecessary. I should be obliged if the Minister turned his mind to it. Authorities already had the power, before the regulations, to disallow benefit when a tenancy or agreement, or joint tenancy, had been created to take advantage of the housing benefit scheme. I should be obliged if the Minister will confirm that my interpretation of the previous statutes is right. If so, why was it necessary to rush through the provisions on joint tenancies?

We must also deplore the change because it will add to the confusion that already exists between the housing benefit regulations and the Housing Act 1980. An occupier can at one and the same time be a joint owner or a tenant under the Housing Act and a non-dependant under the housing benefit legislation. Moreover, the new power contradicts the Government's Housing Act. On the one hand, in the Act they are actively encouraging council tenants jointly to purchase their homes with their co-occupiers, yet on the other hand the new regulation will discourage council tenants from becoming joint owners.

The new regulation has been framed in such a way that authorities have a duty — as far as I understand the regulations — to refuse benefit unless they are satisfied that the joint tenancy or agreement was not created to take advantage of the scheme. If that is so, claimants are being viewed as guilfy until they are proved innocent. That is the wrong way round.

I have looked at the regulation carefully. Neither the regulation nor the official guidance HB(84)7, which accompanies it, provides authorities with any criteria that they should apply to satisfy themselves that a joint tenancy or agreement was or was not created to take advantage ofthe scheme. The Minister will know that the review procedure that is instituted to try to disentangle some of the problems is different from the procedures that apply under the social security scheme. There is a great danger that different councils in different parts of the country will interpret some of the regulations and provisions differently, and we shall end up with a patchwork of different decisions being taken by review panels. It is possible to take decisions to judicial review.

Local housing authorities will be trying to set up housing benefit regulations under the terms of the new order with little guidance and in some instances the Department of Health and Social Security will be saying that if benefit is paid when it does not think that payment is justified the payment will not be reimbursed. There are many problems that still have to be resolved.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Is my hon. Friend aware that in various parts of the country, including the one that I represent, some local authorities are making back-payments of benefit under the regulations which the ones we are considering supersede? I have in mind especially striking miners who are single men and living at home. Many striking miners sense that the regulations were rushed in to hit them. The inequity between local authorities seems even worse.

Mr. Kirkwood: I substantiate entirely that which my hon. Friend has put before the House. He has illustrated the argument that I am advancing. I sense that others may wish to take up the point about the miners because it forms an important part of the background against which the contrived tenancy regulations were introduced, but I do not seek to deal with it. It is true that there is great potential for confusion and differences in interpretation throughout the country.

My interpretation of the regulations leads me to the conclusion that regulation 23 is unnecessary. I think that authorities have sufficient power to disallow benefit where a tenancy agreement has been contrived to take advantage of the housing benefit scheme. I do not see that regulation 23 takes us very much further forward. As I interpret the regulations, they will disallow benefits where tenancy agreements are merely contrived or intended to be so. In some instances they will discourage tenants from renting a dwelling or spare room that they would otherwise wish to rent. If that analysis is right, the regulations will encourage the underuse of accommodation, which is something that I think the Minister would deplore.

Paragraph (1) of regulation 23 gives authorities blanket power to disallow benefit where it appears that a tenancy agreement has been created to take advantage of the housing benefit scheme. Neither the new regulations nor the accompanying circular HB(84)7 gives authorities any guidance on the criteria that should be deployed in deciding whether a tenancy has been "contrived". Is a tenancy to be regarded as contrived when the tenant knows, is friendly with, or on close and friendly terms with the landlord before he or she first rents the accommodation? It is clear that there will be great variations between authorities in the way in which that issue is interpreted. Unjustified variations will result in the income maintenance system.

Paragraph (2) of regulation 23 is equally misguided. Many people with a spare room are understandably unwilling to let it to a complete stranger but would be prepared to let it to those with whom they are familiar, such as relatives. The change in the regulations could prevent them from being able to do so. Relatives will be unwilling to rent accommodation when they will be unable to obtain housing benefit. In certain circumstances the regulation will encourage under-occupation, which is to be regretted.

The definition of "close relative" is so wide that it includes those such as step-relatives and in-laws, who may not be at all close. Some of us have in-laws who are close and some of us have in-laws who are not. The definitions as drawn in the regulation will cause many difficulties apart from the definition of "close relative" that is used in respect of non-dependants providing domestic assistance for disabled persons, for example. Why is there this contradiction?

Even more serious is the fact that many tenants of bona fide resident landlords will no longer be able to claim housing benefits. Many resident landlords let spare rooms, not for commercial reasons but to help to repay their mortgages, yet under the new regulations, if a tenancy is on other than a commercial basis, a tenant of a resident landlord will not be eligible for benefit. Again, that will make it more difficult for resident landlords to let spare rooms and will thus encourage under-occupation. It could even make it more difficult for people on low incomes to afford the cost of mortgages.

My complaint is that the regulations are unnecessary. I appreciate that there are many difficulties, and I am sure that other hon. Members will wish to deal with the contrived tenancy as it relates to the National Union of Mineworkers. The Government were ill-advised to introduce the regulations when they did against that background. I do not believe that they did so maliciously, but that they took an adminstrative decision in good faith. However, as politicians, they should have realised that a sensitive issue was involved. Their action served to exacerbate the industrial dispute. By any subjective or objective test, the regulations are unnecessary, premature and ill-advised, and if I have the opportunity later this evening, I shall advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against them.

10.5 pm

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Housing benefit has always had two purposes. The first was to help those in need with their housing costs so that everyone could live in some comfort whether they could afford it or not. The idea was always that we should charge whatever rent was necessary for good management and then subsidise the tenants who were in need. However, in practice, the housing benefits scheme has proved to do rather less and rather more than that. For example, many councils, which are the only bodies to have deregulated rents, do not charge enough rent. The reason why they do not charge enough rent is that they have the misguided idea that their tenants are paying the rent when in fact they are not. Many councils do not spend those rents wisely. They tend to spend the money, for example, on neighbourhood centres instead of on repairs. That is why there is such poor accommodation in many of our cities. Many councils now make a profit on their housing revenue accounts, which is one reason why public expenditure always increases. The DHSS is now subsidising the Department of the Environment, as I am sure my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench realise.

The secondary objective of housing benefits was to introduce some efficiency into the muddle of the different systems of rebates and to reduce the misappropriation of funds whereby tenants received rent moneys, but did not pay them over. But given the history of housing benefits since their inception nearly two years ago, perhaps the less said about their contribution to efficiency, the better.

In publishing the orders the Government have acted correctly to preserve the spirit of housing benefit as I have tried to enunciate it—to help those in housing need, with the better and more efficient use of public money.

A family claiming housing benefit is subject to deductions for each working non-dependant at home. In my view, that is right. We should expect such people, if they are working, to make a contribution. But if they became joint tenants, they could all claim housing benefit. The Guardian on 17 November 1984 estimated that about 700,000 households could do that, and so gain up to £500 a year at a cost of about £190 million a year to the DHSS. In addition, we have heard references tonight to striking miners. A person not eligible for supplementary benefit, such as a young miner on strike who lives at home with his parents—in other words, a non-householder would still be eligible for housing benefit if the rules were not changed, provided that he is paying some form of board and lodging. Therefore, either as joint tenants or as spurious sub-tenants, people would become eligible for housing benefit.

It is interesting to see the example that was quoted in The Guardian, which relates to the Newton family. They had a single tenancy. The husband and wife are low-paid workers earning £110 a week!—I thought we paid our Ministers rather better than that. They have an 18-year-old apprentice son earning £50 a week and a 14-year-old daughter at school. They pay £18 a week in rent and £6 a week in rates. Perhaps the changes that were introduced in a written answer last week by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House would encourage the Newton family to buy a second home and to claim mortgage interest relief from the parliamentary allowance. As a result, the Newton family is not entitled to claim housing benefit under the rules as they have been interpreted until recently. However, if the Newton family decide to have a joint tenancy instead and they split the rent into two-thirds parents and one-third son, they will then be entitled to receive £2·08 per week housing benefit for the parents and the son will receive £8 per week benefit. The total benefit is £10·08 per week, a gain of over £500 a year. That is a loophole of a very large kind and of a very expensive kind.

A question was asked a moment or so ago about why they should not be able to claim that money. In my view, it is inappropriate that £190 million of public money should be pirated in this way. I can think of much better ways of spending it—for example, on the National Health Service—and I can think of no good reason why the working miners of south Derbyshire should have to dig deeper into their pockets for the taxation which they worked so hard to earn in order to provide housing benefit for strikers in Yorkshire and one or two other places, whose main activity seems to have been to come and cause mayhem in my constituency.

But it was the headline of the Guardian article which caught my eye. It is called, "Yes please, Minister." That is exactly what is going on here, in my view. There is an entire industry of people in organisations like SHAC, Shelter and one or two others — which often do extremely good work in housing and look after people in housing need extremely well—scouring the thousands of pages of DHSS regulations and examining in detail the loosely knitted and ill fitting garment that is the housing benefit scheme looking for loopholes and gaps.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Does the hon. Lady recognise that if her Government restored the duty that DHSS officers once served under but which was removed by this Government, namely, to remind claimants of their rights, it might not be necessary for such an industry to exist?

Mrs. Currie: I have no doubt that however many DHSS officers we had there would be a number of highly competent people in voluntary organisations reading between the lines and trying to figure out whether they could encourage people to claim things which the scheme was never intended to give and which it is not funded to give at all. In my view, housing benefit has become a raiment which keeps out the cold only in isolated places. It has got holes all over it that are big enough to let the most unattractive of creatures get inside. The trouble is that it is the people in need who suffer and the people quids in who tend to clean up.

A large number of people are now dependent upon housing benefit. We spend over £4 billion a year on it and we aid something like 7 million households. Without meaning to we have created a major support for some of the most disadvantaged people in our society and a large number of others. It is a support which I suspect cannot now easily be abolished — all the more reason for ensuring that the system is sound and defensible. What Shelter and the other organisations were doing was contrived and exploitative and had nothing whatever to do with housing need. The Government were timely and correct to act as they did.

10.12 pm

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): Having heard the speech of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie), I am almost tempted to have sympathy for the Minister because of the impossible pressures he faces from his own Back Benchers.

As you will be aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, my speeches in the House are nowadays rare. There is as yet no Government Department to which I can relate. However, I speak on this occasion specifically because of the representations I have received from my own local authority. During the past year it has been alarmed at the growing number of households who find themselves increasingly in arrears following the dramatic rise a year ago in the non-dependant deductions. However, it discovered to its great delight at the end of November 1984 that it was legally possible for it to pay benefit to non-dependants who were making that deduction. But only three weeks later it found that this Government, having discovered that it was assisting those who were in arrears, were taking specific and speedy action to block up that loophole.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) referred to the miners who are claiming benefit by means of this loophole. The National Union of Mineworkers is relevant to this debate if only because the NUM showed ingenuity not previously shown by Shelter, CPAG or Temple Bar in discovering this loophole. It is to their credit that it did. I suspect that the miners are also relevant to the debate because of the remarkable speed with which the Government have acted.

Reference has already been made to the short period for consultation: six days for consultation on first appearance and four days for consultation with the amendments. Only the NUM could prompt the Government to act with such speed.

But at that point the miners and the NUM cease to be relevant to the regulations before us, because the regulations hit not just the miners but every family which finds itself in the same position. The regulations do not say specifically that they will deny benefit to miners who are non-dependants. Even the Government have not got to the stage of introducing a specific statutory restraint on miners which would take us back to the 16th century and the days of colliery serfs. The regulations will stop anybody in that position receiving benefit.

Let me draw the attention of the House to the lack of logic behind what is being proposed. On the one hand, the Government recognise that there are non-dependants who are close relatives and who are paying rent and rates charges to the chief tenant. The Government could hardly do other, having so increased the deductions from the benefit received by the chief tenants in respect of those non-dependants. Indeed, the Government now base their assumptions about the housing benefit that they will pay on the clear understanding that those non-dependants, those close relatives, are paying rent and rates.

Since April 1984, the charges that the Government have assumed are being paid by those non-dependants have more or less doubled. For an 18 to 20-year-old in work the charge went up from £4·55 in April 1983 to £8·80 in November last year. The reason for that dramatic rise in non-dependant deductions was not the sudden discovery by the Government of the importance of the filial duty of the son or daughter towards the chief tenant, but was purely and simply financial. The Secretary of State had to find £200 million in savings and he found half that sum by obliging non-dependants to pay an increased deduction towards the housing benefit of their parents.

The regulations rub salt into that wound. Having required those non-dependants, those close relatives, to pay rent and rates on a considerable sum to their parents, the chief tenants, they now prevent those non-dependants from getting housing benefit in their own right. It should be noted that on strict financial grounds, on the income criteria, the great majority of those non-dependants would qualify for housing benefit.

The income of teenagers has never been high. The Government have taken many measures to make sure that it goes down rather than increases. The general level of teenage wages in the population as a whole has declined under the Government. Indeed, the Government have introduced a system by which they will subsidise employers if they will pay teenagers £50 or less—the youth workers scheme. It is an interesting comment that tonight we are debating the Government's anxiety to avoid subsidising the teenager in meeting his housing costs, while on the other hand they are perfectly willing to subsidise an employer who will exploit that teenager's work.

The Child Poverty Action Group has carried out a survey of 111 households which are in a band relevant to these regulations. That survey of households which responded to a letter from the CPAG in the Daily Star discovered that the highest wage received by the non-dependants was £85 a week. That is below half average earnings. Most of those involved were well below that figure. Indeed, most of them were earning only about half that figure.

Many of those caught in those households, were it not for the regulations before us, could qualify for full rebate on the non-dependant deduction which the Government assume that they pay as a rent and rates charge to the chief tenant. Some of them have barely £8·80 a week left to give after they have paid for their food, heating and fares from their wage.

Hon. Members may accept, as the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South did so clearly and unequivocally, the principle of such a deduction, but there are strong grounds for challenging such a principle and it is interesting that that principle is applied in our law only to the poorest and most vulnerable families in Britain. I often have it brought home to me just how inequitable the Government are by how decently, nicely and sweetly they treat me. When my children reach the age of 18 and proceed to earn an income, even if they succeed in earning an income that rivals that of the Secretary of State for Social Services, not a penny will be wiped off the tax relief on my mortgage interest. It is only those who are the most vulnerable to whom the principle is applied.

Even if we accept the principle, there can be no doubt that the figures involved are exorbitant in relation to the wages of teenagers or to the rent charge on the house. For a chief tenant with a couple of teenagers who are working, the non-dependant deduction made in respect of those two teenagers may well equal the weekly rent and rates charges. Such a tenant will therefore be liable to pay full rent and rates, in effect, to have the full rent and rates charge met by the two sons or daughters in the household, although patently they are not occupying the full house, thus leaving the chief tenant in the undignified position of having the full rent and rates on his house met by his children.

The Government cannot have it both ways. They cannot deny housing benefit to the parents on the grounds that the children should pay rent and then deny those children the right to apply for housing benefit.

There is at least one element of logic in what the Government propose. They say that the housing benefit should be denied to non-dependants in these circumstances because there is no commercial contract for the payment of rent. In that at least the Government are correct. Most parents do not seek a commercial contract for the payment of rent in these circumstances, and many of those who try are unable to get one.

The survey of the Child Poverty Action Group found that, of the 111 households that contacted it, 79 tenants would not approach their teenage sons or daughters for the non-dependant deduction because they viewed it with repugnance. Of that 79, one was a widow living on the state pension of £33·10 per week. On that amount she was liable to a weekly rent and rates charge of £8·20 attributable solely to the fact that she had a son still living with her. She would not ask him to contribute to the rent because he was her son, he had always lived with her and he was saving for his marriage; nor would she put him out of the house.

Mrs. Currie: Why not?

Mr. Cook: The hon. Lady's question betrays the lack of her imagination, understanding and compassion. One reason why the widow was reluctant to do this — a reason cited by many others in similar circumstances — is the fear that her son would leave. Those who are widowed or single parents are reluctant to speed the day when teenagers leave the house. They are therefore reluctant to ask for what is now a large sum—indeed, it equals what many teenagers would have to pay to rent a single room. [Laughter.]

The hilarity of Conservative Members demonstrates their incomprehension and their total inability to understand what the sum of £8·20 can mean to ordinary people. It may be difficult for the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South to understand what that amount means in a household of this kind. I say to the hon. Lady that there is no reason why her constituents or the House should forgive her refusal to try to understand what this might mean in such cases.

We face double standards and hypocrisy in this measure. Conservative Members claim to be the party of the family. This measure which they have boosted to such an exorbitant level of income in the last 18 months has without doubt broken up families. There are recorded cases of non-dependants being obliged to leave the house because of this measure. In many more cases where a break-up of a family has not occurred there have been rows, tensions and deterioration of family life because of the non-dependant deduction. To compound all that evil, this petty measure is laid before the House to block up the one chink of light that had been offered to these households.

I mentioned earlier that my local authority has noticed a significant increase in rent arrears since the increase in the non-dependant deduction was introduced. My local authority is not alone in that. The Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities have called for the deduction to be abolished. The Association of District Councils has called for it to be reviewed in the interests of natural justice. The Institute of Housing Officers and the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives have argued that the present deduction is far to high. The Social Security Advisory Committee has expressed grave concern.

No one involved in the implementation of the non-dependant deduction is prepared to defend the principle and the level of deduction. It is a measure of the deafness and stubbornness of the Government that, faced with that consensus of alarm and criticism and the pleas for a review, they take this mean and petty action to block a loophole.

The measure is illogical, irrational, mean and spiteful and motivated by the Government animus against the miners. It will cause hardship to families who, at the end of November, were encouraged to hope that there might be relief from the problems caused to them by the Government's previous actions.

Housing Benefits

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) should make more speeches on social security matters and spend less time campaigning. He would be more successful in social security debates, and he has made a cogent and clear attack on the measure.

I want the Government to understand what the sequence of events has meant in mining areas such as my constituency. The picture that is painted, particularly by Conservative Members, is that a group of people rushed in and made a fast profit out of a loophole in the social security rules and thereby enhanced their already considerable financial ease. Nothing could be further from the truth.

We are talking primarily about single striking miners — young lads in many cases — who live at home, sometimes with a widowed mother and often in an improverished household which had previously depended on their contribution. In many cases it was not long ago that the miners were still at school and were making no contribution to the household.

Those youngsters in the mining industry, mainly aged between 16 and 21, have suddenly found that they are causing a drastic reduction in their parents' ability to make ends meet. We are talking about families who were among the poorest to start with. They were not households in which there were two or three miners bringing in a substantial income. I am thinking particularly of homes where there is a widowed mother on the old-age pension and a young lad who is on strike. At the end of last year those youngsters were led to believe that they would be able to claim back payments under the regulations. That was a chink of light for them in their desperate situation.

Some Conservative Members seem to want to dwell on the moral position of someone who reduces his own circumstances by going on strike. But we are talking about elderly parents who had nothing to do with the decisions of their sons. Those lads have been caught up in the strike. The parents played no part in their decisions and real hardship is being caused.

At the end of last year, it seemed that some back payment of housing benefit could be made. In some areas, the local authorities paid out, but in others they did not. Families in Castle Morpeth and in Alnwick in my constituency have not received any money. The Minister should realise that he has left the local authorities in utter confusion. He has left the people seeking benefit at a loss to understand why the person they normally work alongside in the pit is getting the benefit because he lives on the other side of the border, and they are not. That is the position in pits like Ellington in my constituency. A striking miner who lives in Ashington is getting the benefit and a striking miner who lives in Lynemouth or Ellington is not because of the confusion among local authorities.

I asked the local authorities why they are not paying out the back benefit, at least for the period until the new regulations came into force. They tell me that the advice they are getting from the Department of Health and Social Security is unclear and they do not understand what they are supposed to do. I wrote in November about one of these cases. In his reply, the treasurer of Alnwick district council defined the lad concerned and his widowed mother as unable to qualify for benefit. He said:

> "This is the position as the Regulations stand at present, but it is fair to say that certain local authorities are interpreting the Regulations in a manner which does not accord with the general view or the view of the Department of Health and Social Security."

So the local authority assumed that the DHSS would frown upon it even making back payments to which people thought they were entitled.

It has not ended there. There is still total confusion. I contacted Castle Morpeth borough council about other people who had been denied the back benefit, and was told that the council was still unable to come to a view on the matter and would probably be unable to come to a view at its next monthly council meeting because it had still not received satisfactory clarification from the DHSS of what it understood the position to be.

While this bureaucratic tangle is taking place, the Minister thinks he has carried out a nice, clean operation. He thinks he has neatly brought in new regulations which everybody understands and cleanly brought to an end the old arrangement. But there is nothing clean about it because some have received benefit and some have not. Of course, from now on eligibility has been greatly narrowed in the way hon. Members have described.

I plead with the Minister at least to get his officials on the telephone to the local authorities to sort out the mess. Those to whom I have spoken in local authorities are genuine local government officers. They are not motivated by any political or other view. They are in real confusion about the interpretation by the DHSS and are genuinely looking for guidance. I do not think the Minister can be satisfied when sums of £200 or £300 for housing benefit have been paid out reasonably to some of these "living in" youngsters who are on strike, while others, whose families are in equal need, are not getting a penny.

I urge the Minister to shut from his mind the idea that he is dealing with a group of people who are making a fast profit or who have somehow come into the money. He will have to look much nearer this building if he wants to find people who are in that position. If he goes among my constituents in the areas which are deeply affected by the strike, he will find real hardship which has been made worse by the regulations and sustained by the chaos and confusion over what back payments should be made under the original regulations. In many cases the hardship has nothing to do with any decisions which were taken by the elderly and hard-up parents of those young people.

10.32 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Most of the points that I wanted to refer to have been made. A debate later this evening will deal with another way in which the Government operate in their attacks against the poor and the most vulnerable.

There is no doubt that the reason why the Government brought in these regulations was that the National Union of Mineworkers, miners and the women's support groups had managed to find a loophole that enabled many local authorities, including Bolsover district council, to make these payments. No sooner had the local authorities started to put the plan into operation than the word was buzzing around here that the Government would take retaliatory action. It was not long before they did. Fortunately, many local authorities took advantage of the scheme and paid out money to miners who had been advised to apply for it, whereas other authorities that were Tory-controlled did nothing. They abided by what were, no doubt, the Minister's instructions. I suppose that, like the Prime Minister, he will claim that he had nothing to do with it. They continued to refuse to pay the benefit.

Although the provision does not affect the National Union of Mineworkers now, some miners did not put in their claims in time. Some miners in my constituency were not aware of the position. For example, someone living with a widowed mother might not be aware of the position. They are being penalised, yet they live next door to and under the same authority as others who are not penalised. Bolsover district council has been doing its utmost to get around the regulations. No doubt other authorities in north Derbyshire have been doing the same.

Mr. Beith: Should not the Minister make it clear today that, when the local authorities have not even decided whether they should pay out, it is a scandal that people are being told that they are no longer entitled to claim back payments for that period? If local authorities do not know where they are, the individual can hardly be criticised because he has not yet made a claim.

Mr. Skinner: That is a valid point, and one that has been exercising the minds of local authorities in north Derbyshire. I am sure that the coalfields throughout the country have run up against the same problem. It is all part of the Government's policy against the miners. They use every echelon of the establishment to try to hammer them into the ground. They have used the judges and the law courts to try to get them down. They have used the police —who are known in my area as Mrs. Thatcher's private army—to try to smash the miners and the NUM. They have uprated the £15 deemed strike pay to £16 in an attempt to starve the miners.

That was one aspect that Ridley had not — [Interruption.] It was called the Ridley plan. I am talking about the Secretary of State for Transport, but it goes under the name of the Ridley plan. It was an attempt to use all parts of the establishment to attack the miners. However, this benefit was no part of that, so when the Government came up against it they decided to have a go at that as well. The amount of money involved pales into insignificance when compared with the news from a leading Tory, the Chairman of the Select Committee on Energy, that during the miners' strike the CEGB has lost £2,000 million. That is all part of the folly of the Prime Minister in taking on the miners. These regulations are yet another example of a Government Department using its power to try to smash the miners.

This is happening in a week when, according to the newspapers——

Mr. Christopher Hawkins (High Peak): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the Labour party would give an undertaking to keep open all uneconomic pits and that it would not take on the miners, when its leader——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. We are discussing regulations and must relate our remarks to them.

Mr. Skinner: As I was saying before that intervention, which you kindly dealt with Mr. Deputy Speaker—I am pleased that someone else can be out of order—I was with the Deputy Speaker on Saturday when I bumped into one of those who have been deprived of the benefit. We were speaking at a joint rally in Doncaster. Mr. Deputy Speaker was put in his place because he was smoking on the platform.

We are debating this matter in the same week as Members of Parliament have been given the green light to get their housing benefits second time around. I understand that they can now use the £6,500 to buy a second home. The way in which the Government are tonight attacking people — not only miners but many others who are trying to make ends meet on a few quid a week—shows the double standards of the Tories.

It is worth remembering that the Government, who are attacking people living on the edge of poverty, are headed by a Prime Minister whose Private Office at 10 Downing Street cost £1,229,000 a year to maintain when she took office and is now costing £2,889,000. We can loosely call that her housing benefit. The right hon. Lady has three subsidised homes, one at Chequers, one in Downing street and one subsidised by the National Trust in Kent.

The Government have used every opportunity to try to bully and starve the miners back to work, but they are not succeeding. They could stop the drain on the pound and add no further to the £5 billion that it has cost the state to finance a strike that was engineered by the Prime Minister and her crown princes. The strike could be settled and we would not need to debate these regulations, which were born out of the strike and out of malice on the part of the Government. That is why I shall vote against them tonight.

10.42 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Yet again today we are commenting on ill-conceived, hasty and ill-directed Government action. I use the word "commenting" deliberately, because we are not debating. As my hon. Friends have pointed out, the regulations were made on one day, laid the next and brought into operation on the third. It is impossible to debate legislation with any degree of credibility when it has already been in operation for two months.

Mrs. Currie: Why bother?

Mrs. Beckett: Because there are people in a good deal of poverty for whom the loss of just under £9 a week is a desperate matter.

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Lady has made several interventions. I will give way to her later. There are people in desperate poverty who cannot afford to lose this money. They will be hit by what the Government are doing. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) seems not for a second to understand their anxieties, fears and desperate concern for how they are to meet their bills.

Mrs. Currie: If it is a matter of such great concern to Opposition Members, why are so many of those hon. Members who signed the prayer which we are debating not present?

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Lady is fond of making that point. When she last made it—not in this Chamber but on BBC radio—she was vocal about the fact that, when certain matters were debated, my hon. Friends would not be present but that she would. The following day they were debated and she was absent. I advise her to be careful when she makes that type of point.

Mr. Robin Cook: The percentage of the parliamentary Labour party present in the House is precisely the same as the percentage of the parliamentary Conservative party that is present.

Mrs. Beckett: We are told in the circular that the Government are consulting the authorities and the Social Security Advisory Committee. It is difficult to see how such bodies can be consulted when the regulations have been in operation since 19 December, and many authorities did not even get copies of the regulations until the middle of January. How can that be described as credible consultation?

The explanatory note to the regulations says that the matter

"will be referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee."

Have the regulations been so referred? If not, will they be? Is any reaction from that committee available? I raise those questions all the more because of the reactions that the SSAC has already had to these non-dependant deductions.

This depressing little measure is an attempt by the Government — perhaps it is unnecessary — to prevent people from avoiding these non-dependant deductions which the Government introduced at such an excessive level almost a year ago. Even if one argues that such a deduction is justified—the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) made this point—it is difficult to understand how the deduction can be justified at that level. When the increase was announced, it was pointed out that it was much more than the rate of inflation. According to the SSAC, the previous increase was beyond what was "fair and realistic". When the increase was announced the level of deduction in respect of rent was almost half the average local authority rent. That gives strength to the remarks of my hon. Friend for Livingston (Mr. Cook) and alliance members about the scale of the imposition on the families involved.

The Minister's predecessor, the hon. Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson), justified these deductions with a fine head of steam and indignation which was very much in the hon. Gentleman's best manner. His justification was that the Government were dealing with the selfish young. They were dealing with those who were living at home and earning — this applies also to those who were not earning — and who should be contributing to the household. He felt that the Government were teaching those young people manners, taking them in hand and enforcing a deduction which their parents would claim from them. For a variety of reasons, in many households — I think that many of us would understand these reasons if such circumstances occurred within our families — parents are unwilling or unable to extract contributions from their young relatives.

I have referred to constituency cases and the dozens of letters I have received as a constituency Member and as the shadow Minister, and this is one reason why I am especially concerned. I have referred to individuals who have come to my advice bureau in tears, saying that their working youngsters—for whose ability to obtain a job they had previously been grateful—are earning very low wages and, contrary to the supposition of the hon. Member for Brent, North, are paying substantial sums in board and lodging payments and towards rent and rates. Most young people are not as the hon. Member for Brent, North described them. Now such families are faced with a loss of income, because of the non-dependant deduction.

One mother said to me, "My son pays me more than he can afford out of his income. I cannot possibly ask for almost another £9. If he pays that sum to me, he will not be able to afford to go to work and pay for his meals." She was extremely distressed about how her family was to manage. The point is that the Government are taking this income from the family.

The regulations purport to deal with avoidance. We know that the Government are concerned more about avoidance in this respect than about tax avoidance. These ill-thought-out regulations will affect bona fide claimants as well as those about whom the Government are so concerned.

I have noted the reference in the Government's consultative document, a copy of which eventually reached local authorities. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed mentioned how confused local authorities are and how difficult it is for them to sort out what they are supposed to be doing. The circular is not especially forthcoming. It says:

"Authorities will need to make further enquiries about the joint tenancy/agreement and the circumstances in which it was created. Authorities do not need to make enquiries in respect of every claim".

No doubt that is very generous. Fear of the Department of the Environment and worry about possible demands from local authorities for extra staff crept in here. The advice continues:

"Authorities do not need to make enquiries in respect of every claim from a joint occupier but they should do so where it appears that the tenancy/agreement may have been entered into in order to take advantage of the scheme, for example where the joint tenancy/agreement was recently created and is between a parent and adult child."

It has already been said that the main purpose of the regulations has already been served. The powers that the Government sought to introduce through these regulations already exist. In that sense, the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston and by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed about the mining dispute showed that that has had a great bearing on what the Government have done. What reason could there be, other than the Government's determination to put further pressure on local authorities and families, for introducing unnecessary regulations, whose only effect is to shift the burden a little towards presumption of guilt rather than innocence, and to place local authorities under some threat?

Local authorities are confused about what they are supposed to do, about what their duties are and about the threats made to them by the Government that if authorities make payments—theoretically, that is left to authorities' judgments—the Government might refuse to reimburse them. What can the Minister tell us that would cast some light on how those matters are to be judged and on the criteria that the local authorities are to use? Even more to the point, what criteria do the Government propose to use when a local authority, having done what has been urged in the debate and examined the circumstances and the families, some with striking miners, decides to make the payments?

I note that if the Government decide that they will not reimburse, that will place local authorities in a difficult position. I do not know where they will stand with regard to the district auditor. I hope that the Minister will be able to allay an unworthy suspicion that arises — that the reimbursements that will be scrutinised will be those from Labour authorities or authorities that operate in mining areas. I doubt whether the Minister will be able to allay those suspicions.

We are speaking in the same context as the reductions that were made in the entitlement to benefit of the families of striking miners, because people on strike are not entitled to benefit. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) put his finger on the point. The Government deduct £16 from the benefit of families of striking miners. Single miners and their parents have no entitlement, but in this case the Government will continue to make a deduction from the housing benefit.

I am sure that we all recall the number of occasions on which the Prime Minister has told us how much she values Victorian standards. Some 150 years ago, there was a long dispute in a silk mill in my constituency. People were denied Poor Law assistance, specifically in the case of a poor widow, on the grounds that her children smelled of trade unionism. The Government appear to apply a similar standard today.

Most of all, in the context of the regulations, we are concerned about the confusion in the ill-thought-out treatment of non-dependants that seems to run throughout what the Government do. In the Housing Act 1980, the Government actively encourage joint tenancy, especially if that assists families to purchase their homes. Government assistance is used specifically to help families which are slightly less poor than many and which are able to purchase their houses with such help.

Under these regulations adult children are treated as dependants. The thrust of what the Government have in store for us is that adult children, in relation to board and lodging payments, must be treated as dependants. They must not be allowed to be away from home for more than two or three weeks if they are to claim board and lodging allowance. They are to be treated not as independent people, but specifically as children. Financially they are being encouraged to return home.

There are rumours about the Government's intentions for supplementary benefit entitlement for teenagers. A specific decision is being taken to treat them as children without any separate income. These regulations are different. They state that teenagers are to be regarded as non-dependant.

One theme runs through the Government's decisions, and it certainly does not involve logic. The Government adopt whatever course will save them money. Even the definition of "close relative" is different in these regulations. The definition does not refer to non-dependants giving domestic assistance to the disabled. The definition appears to be new. Perhaps the Government think that it will bring in the greatest trawl of financial saving.

What is meant in the regulations by the "commercial" basis of a tenancy. Who will define it? Will it be the local authority or the Government? If the authority is thought by the Government to get it wrong, will the authority lose out?

We are worried that many bona fide landlords and tenants will be affected and discouraged from letting accommodation. As the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed said, the regulations will encourage under-occupation.

We can contrast the treatment of the poorer young people and their families with that of those of families who are sufficiently well off not to be involved with the benefit system. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South said earlier that since such young people were earning money, they should contribute. I hope that if that is the Government's attitude, the next Budget will contain tax changes so that earning non-dependants, or dependants who receive benefit, will be forced to contribute to the household's income and housing costs, irrespective of the way in which financial assistance is received from the Government.

What happens today in a family poor enough to receive housing benefit is that the earnings of children are taken into account. By contrast, children in a better off family can earn as much as they like—as much as a Minister or the Prime Minister—and the Government will not care tuppence how much tax relief is given or what that means in terms of housing subsidies.

Mrs. Currie: Why should they?

Mrs. Beckett: Why should they not? Why should poor families, dependent on the benefit system, be charged in this way when earning children in better off families do not have to make a contribution? I see no justice in that, and I find it hard to understand how the hon. Lady sees any justice in it.

Mrs. Currie: Is the hon. Lady really saying that families in which people earn a lot of money should have unlimited tax relief on their mortgages? I correct her if she is under that misapprehension. Is she suggesting that such families do not pay tax on their income? They do; and they pay a higher rate. What she has just said is a little misleading.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Lady cannot have thought through what she has just said. Of course I recognise that such people pay taxes, as do the working young adults in the families we are discussing. What I am saying is that the mortgage tax relief received by the better off parents is unaffected by the earnings of their children. That is the point. If the hon. Lady has not grasped it, she should stay out of the debate.

The problem is that these regulations, as is so often the case, are a hotchpotch, a mess, and unnecessary. They are introduced in a panic, because the Government read a story in a newspaper that someone might be able to extract more money, but they did not realise that they had the means to stop that under existing regulations. They have been tabled with what one can only describe as a degree of vindictiveness to try to prevent people from gaining a small degree of relief from the exorbitant charge—by anyone's judgment, including that of the SSAC—that the Government have imposed upon them through these non-dependant deductions. They are tabled on the criterion which seems to be the only one about which the Government care—cutting public expenditure.

The regulations have produced and will produce neither effectiveness nor justice, and that is shared by most of the other policies of the Government.

11 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): It has been an interesting and rather instructive debate, although there was a moment when I did not care to be in the direct line of fire between Derby, South and Derbyshire, South.

As is clear, the regulations put into effect a number of changes in relation to housing benefit, to establish what had always been thought to be and was intended to be the position rather than to make savings in public expenditure in the way that the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) suggested. They were intended to prevent a rise in public expenditure that might otherwise have taken place.

The debate has concentrated on two aspects only of the regulations, the first being to close the unintended loophole relating to non-dependants and their potential claiming of housing benefit, and the second, on which a great deal of the latter part of the debate has concentrated, relating to contrived tenancies. There is an entirely beneficial third change in the regulations to which no one has drawn attention. It is designed to rectify an omission in the definition of rent which, although it was technical, placed a few people at an unintended disadvantage.

Although I cannot pretend that the sums of money at stake in those provisions which Opposition Members regarded as unattractive is on all fours with the sum of money that they found so attractive that they preferred not to mention it, it is fair for me to make the point that there is some balance in these regulations in that respect.

The unintended loophole allowed people living as members of their families' households to qualify for housing benefit if they made a payment for board and lodging that included an amount falling within the housing benefit definition of rent.

I believe that I can speak for previous Administrations in relation to the housing benefit scheme when I say that it was never the intention that people living in someone else's household, other than as commercial boarders, should be eligible for housing benefit. It was not allowed for under the old rent and rebate and rent allowance schemes which housing benefit replaced, and, as far as I am aware, at no stage did the hon. Lady or her predecessors in Government suggest that those former schemes should be amended to make possible what is now being demanded with such vehemence tonight. Such people cannot obtain supplementary benefit to meet the costs of their board and lodging.

The loophole would have allowed housing benefit to be paid to, for example, an adult son or daughter living in the parents' home where the only separate accommodation was the bedroom. In the light of what the hon. Lady has said tonight, I should be interested to know whether it is her party's policy to pay housing benefit under those circumstances, and if so whether she regards that as a priority for expenditure which we estimate could rise to some £200 million a year and which could be used for many more productive purposes whether in health, social services, social security or a number of other things.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): That is interesting, because some of what has been said in the debate relates to the payment to single miners who have been on strike for the past 11 months. The Minister quoted a figure. Did he see the Channel 4 news tonight which said that the strike has cost the CEGB £2 billion so far? In those circumstances, many Opposition Members think that it is very harsh of the Government to have introduced the regulations as swiftly as they have to stop the payment of housing benefit to single striking miners.

Mr. Newton: The comparison that the hon. Gentleman is making is pretty far-fetched. Like many other hon. Members — it happened again at Question Time yesterday—I must frankly say that I am absolutely fed up with hearing claims about the costs of keeping the fuel industries going during the dispute against a background in which the miners have caused hardship to pensioners and others by their actions.

Mr. Barron: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Newton: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman once more, but this is right off at a tangent.

Mr. Barron: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way again. The reason why I used that figure was that it was on the news on Channel 4 today. I am a member of the Select Committee on Energy, and the chairman of the Committee, the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd), who is absent for tonight's debate, was quoting that figure.

Mr. Newton: If the hon. Gentleman has reached such a stage of irrationality about the miners' strike that he thinks that it is sensible to make a case for spending £200 million on a wasteful form of housing benefit expenditure merely because the miners' strike has already imposed a wholly unnecessary cost of £2 billion on the rest of the economy, it shows the extent to which he and his party are now living in the economics of the madhouse.

Mr. Robin Cook: The Minister argued that it would be wrong to make housing benefit available to a son or daughter who might be occupying only a single bedroom. Why, then, is it right for his Government to assume that that son or daughter will make a weekly payment towards rent and rates of £8.80 a week, which may be half the total rent and rates charged for the entire house, when only one room is being occupied?

Mr. Newton: It is already clear that we shall not achieve an accommodation of view on the matter any more than on earlier occasions. I must simply state my view that if it is thought to be unreasonable to suggest that a young person earning the sums that the hon. Gentleman quoted from the CPAG, which ranged up to £85 a week, should be expected to make a contribution of £8.80 a week to the housing costs of the household in which he resides, before the rest of the people in the country are expected to provide housing benefit for that household, we must just agree to differ. I think that it is reasonable, and I suspect that I carry my hon. Friends with me.

Apart from the case that the hon. Gentleman quoted from the CPAG survey, on the figures for April 1984 average earnings for men aged under 18 are £63 a week and for those aged 18 to 20 £101 a week. I do not think that the figures that are quoted as non-dependant deductions are in any way unreasonable in relation to those averages.

Mr. Robin Cook: The Minister will appreciate that the figures that he quoted, including the figure of £85, are irrelevant to the regulations. Where those cases are eligible to apply for housing benefit, they would not qualify on income grounds. The only people affected by the regulations and who are denied benefit are those earning much smaller sums of generally less that £50 a week. It is those people whom he is preventing from getting benefit through the regulations.

Mr. Newton: Nevertheless there has been running through most of the speeches made by Opposition Members the proposition that it is unreasonable to expect contributions of this nature to the household costs of the households in question. I do not think that that is unreasonable.

As I said, all we are doing with this part of the regulation is restoring the position to what had always been intended, and what had been thought to exist. I should like to refute firmly the suggestion that the change is specifically directed at miners or any aspect of the miners' strike. It is simply the fact, which I acknowledge, that the loophole was discovered by the National Union of Mineworkers' lawyers in crawling over the housing benefit regulations. I pay tribute to them for their diligence. However, the loophole would have had consequences and implications going far beyond the miners' strike, and it was one that I do not believe any Government of whatever colour would have chosen to live with for any length of time. No previous Administration have sought to change the law to allow that to happen. I do not believe that a Government of whom the hon. Member for Derby, South was a member would seek to do so.

A non-householder — someone not responsible for household expenditure for supplementary benefit purposes —is not eligible for a rate rebate or rent allowance at that address. Regulation 23(2) provides that where a person resides with a person to whom he pays rent or rates and

"either that person is a close relative"

or the rent is paid

"other than on a commercial basis", he will not be entitled to housing benefit. Genuine arrangements—for instance, where a family has taken an aging parent into its home and provided separate accommodation—are unaffected by the change. In such cases housing benefit may still be claimed for any rent and rates paid.

It has been suggested by Opposition Members that it should be a major feature in the argument that some householders find it difficult to obtain payment from their dependants and that that would be a good reason for granting housing benefit. How would it be secured that the housing benefit in those circumstances was either asked for or paid over to the tenant? I know of no mechanism to ensure that the benefit would be paid over in circumstances where apparently the non-dependant is not paying over the non-dependant deduction.

In response to the request for information to explain why we felt that the change in the regulations was necessary, the existing provisions on contrived tenancies do not cover joint tenancies, on the advice that I have been given. We think it right that any adult non-dependant, such as a grown-up son or daughter living in the claimant's household, should be expected to make a contribution towards household expenses. So a deduction is made from housing benefit in respect of each such non-dependant. Suggestions began to circulate towards the end of last year about how non-dependant deductions could be avoided by creating joint tenancies, thus making the householder and former non-householder eligible to claim housing benefit on their share of the rent. Such action would be a clear abuse of the intentions of the scheme. This issue was brought out well and effectively by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie).

We thought originally that no action would be needed on the ground that few people would wish to apply for joint tenancies for this purpose and that local authorities would act responsibly in considering applications from their tenants. However, it began to appear that a small number of authorities might be planning actively to encourage tenants to exploit the scheme. We were told by some authorities that as part of their overall housing management policy it was their normal practice to grant joint tenancies whenever they were requested and that publicity would place them in a difficult position.

We therefore decided that it would be right to take steps to prevent exploitation of the scheme, and that is what we have sought to do with the regulations. It would clearly be unfair if certain households were able to avoid the deductions being made and obtain additional benefit merely by being in a position to create a joint tenancy agreement with a non-dependant member of the household. To avoid this happening, regulations 8 and 11 provide that where a joint tenancy or agreement to pay rent and rates has been created, and during the previous eight weeks the claimant was a non-dependant of the occupier at the address, he will not be eligible for housing benefit. He will continue to be treated as if he were a non-dependant unless the local authority is satisfied that the joint tenancy or agreement was not created just to take advantage of the housing benefit scheme.

Thus the local authority has discretion—I think that there has to be discretion—to determine whether a joint tenancy is being requested for genuine or exploitative reasons. The amendment does not affect joint tenancy agreements between husband and wife. It applies only to those where the agreement is clearly made to abuse the housing benefits scheme. Genuine arrangements — for example, where a son or daughter has gone to live with his or her widowed mother because she is no longer able to live alone, and has entered into a joint tenancy agreement to protect his tenancy in the future—will be unaffected by the change.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) asked why the change on contrived tenancies was needed, and perhaps I could explain that to him briefly. Regulation 23 allowed an authority to disentitle a person who resided with the person to whom he paid rent, or who paid rent to a member of his family where the tenancy was created to take advantage of the housing benefits scheme. It could not be applied to certificated tenancies—that is, people in receipt of supplementary benefit. Several cases arose where the claimant did not live with the person to whom he paid rent, and/or he was a certificated case, but the agreement to pay rent was clearly contrived to take advantage of the scheme.

One case that has been mentioned to me to illustrate the point was that of a man who bought a house on a mortgage, and contrived to give the house to a friend and then to repay the mortgage from a loan, and to remain in the house, in effect paying off the loan in the form of rent and obtaining housing benefit on those payments. That is clearly the sort of device that was not intended and which we are seeking to prevent.

Mr. Kirkwood: I agree that that is clearly an abuse, but my point was that the present provisions disqualified such people because it is a clear abuse of the system. Why do we need extra regulations?

Mr. Newton: The legal advice that I have been given is that the existing regulations were not sufficient to prevent such cases. In this case, given that a mortgage was involved previously, it would have been certificated housing benefit — the person in question would have been in receipt of supplementary benefit, not housing benefit. That is the problem that we are seeking to tackle. I hope that I have made the point sufficiently clear to the hon. Gentleman.

The provision for contrived tenancies covers the position where, in the past, local authorities could refuse housing benefit to a claimant not in receipt of housing benefit only if they believed that the agreement to pay rent and rates was clearly contrived to take advantage of the housing benefits scheme. There is no reason why supplementary benefit recipients should be treated differently from other claimants, and the regulation now provides that in any case where an authority considers that a person who was not previously liable to pay rent and/or rates in respect of his present accommodation has created an agreement to pay rent and/or rates to take advantage of the housing benefits scheme, it may treat him as not entitled to housing benefit.

I should mention briefly the more favourable provision of the regulations, which no other hon. Member mentioned during the debate. The definition of rent in the housing benefits regulations covers payments made by former tenants if they continue to occupy the accommodation after the tenancy agreement has been terminated. It was always the intention that payments made by former licensees should also be eligible for benefit. However, we were advised that the previous definition did not cover such payments.

It might be helpful if I explained the sort of case that could be involved. One example would be a family living in Crown property, where the husband, who was the tenant, no longer lived with his wife and children in the home. Although the wife was a regular occupant of the property, she would not have been entitled to housing benefit, but she would have had to continue to make payments for rent while the family remained in the home. The amendment puts that right and enables her to receive housing benefit. I understand that this point is of special importance to some people formerly living in service accommodation.

Much has been made of consultation on the regulations. The regulations were made as much as anything to protect local authorities from the extremely difficult and anomalous tasks that they had to face as a result of one unintended loophole, and one device deliberately contrived to exploit the regulations. As I explained to the local authority associations in writing, there are bound to be occasions when we must move quickly in the interests of efficient local administration of the scheme. Of course, central and local government must work in partnership in this, and I regret that, on this occasion, one association evidently believes that we have not done so. I should make it clear to the hon. Member for Derby, South that the Social Security Advisory Committee agreed not to have the regulations referred to it in advance, because it accepted that they were either beneficial or essential. In other words, it accepted that this was a proper use of the emergency provisions under the social security legislation in relation to references to the Social Security Advisory Committee.

Mrs. Beckett: I was under the impression that it had been agreed that the first part of these regulations should not be referred to the SSAC but that particularly contentious regulations were to be referred to it. I believe that that appears on the back of the regulations.

Mr. Newton: May I look further into that matter? If I have misstated the position, I shall be very happy to correct it. I should not want to mislead the House.

The SSAC accepted that the use of the urgent procedure was appropriate. There was only a brief consultation period, because we felt that we had to move quickly, in view of the nature of the changes that we were seeking to make. We did all that we could to facilitate quick consultation, including offers to meet to discuss the proposals with the associations — offers that were not taken up. I accept that it would have been easier both for us and for the associations if more time had been available, but that would have made life acutely difficult for some of the local authorities administering the scheme, which in some places were faced with a considerable number of applications to exploit the scheme in a way that was never intended and which added unreasonably to their administrative problems.

Mr. Beith: The phrase the Minister has used is precisely the kind of phrase that led at least some of the local authorities to believe that the Department is telling them not even to pay those claims that were valid under the regulations before 19 December. Will he please do something to unravel this confusion and remove the injustice whereby people in some local authority areas are being told that, on the say-so of the Minister's Department, they are not entitled to benefit when in fact they are?

Mr. Newton: I shall turn straight away to the point that the hon. Gentleman has raised. The position, as I understand it, is that there is no provision for backdating claims to housing benefit. If a claim was made before the change in the regulations, some discretion may be available to the local authority, but no provision is made under the regulations for backdating a claim. Therefore, any claim made after 19 December could not be backdated.

Mr. Beith: Is the Minister aware of the injustice of that position, particularly in the case of those people who were advised before 19 December that their claims could not be entertained, because it was then thought that there was no entitlement? Therefore, people were discouraged from making claims. Is there any justice in the Minister's statement? And is not either the local authority or the Minister likely to find that they are arraigned before the Parliamentary Commissioner or the Local Government Commissioner if this line of argument is pursued?

Mr. Newton: I am not deploying a line of argument. I am simply stating that I have been advised that there is no provision within the housing benefit regulations for the backdating of a claim. Local authorities must make their own judgments about the legal position under the housing benefit regulations. It is not appropriate for me to determine what those judgments should be. However, the advice I have received is that there is no provision for backdating claims under the housing benefit regulations. There may be a provision for backdating an award once a successful claim has been made but that is not quite the same point.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Is my hon. Friend inviting the House to believe that the regulations are made by some power exterior to the House of Commons who is in his Department? If the regulations are clearly nonsense because people were told that they were not entitled to what they were entitled to, it is open to my hon. Friend or to the Secretary of State to lay amending regulations before the House. My hon. Friend cannot claim that the regulations are outside the control of the Government. He must give a proper answer to that point.

Mr. Newton: I am sorry if I have caused my hon. Friend some consternation. I hope that I have not in any way misled the House or suggested that I am attempting to discard Government responsibility for the housing benefit regulations or the possibility of the Government putting before the House potential changes in those regulations which the House can then seek to agree or disagree as it sees fit. All I have been seeking to do is to set before the House what I am advised is the position under the regulations, which is that there is no provision for the back-dating of claims.

Having been taken aback by the question of the hon. Member for Derby, South, let me confirm that I have been assured that the SSAC did agree in both cases that it was appropriate and reasonable for the urgency provision to be used.

I do not accept that in pressing on with the changes we have disregarded our obligation to consult. Indeed, the facts do not bear that out. There were two stages of consultation. The associations were given two weeks to comment on the proposals to close the loophole affecting non-dependants' ability to claim housing benefit on the rent element of their board and lodging charge and on the technical change in the definition of rent.

The Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of District Councils and the London Boroughs Association all replied within the period that we asked, or within a day or two. They were given only a week to comment on the third proposal about joint tenancies because that issue arose at a later stage. However, we received comments from the AMA and from the other associations before the regulations were made. However inconvenient the short notice, they were able to reply; and I am grateful for that. Therefore, views were in practice sought and received, and they were taken into account in our formulation of the regulations.

However, as I have already said, I am unhappy that this problem has arisen and that the AMA in particular feels that it was not properly consulted; we shall be writing to the associations forthwith to offer a meeting to discuss how consultation might proceed in future in order to reach a better basis of understanding with them. I hope that there will be a mutual agreement about how urgent matters can best be dealt with.

At the moment, we are still unaware of what changes, if any, the AMA would wish to see in the regulations. My earlier understanding was that it did not object to their substance. If it does have comments of substance on them, we shall be more than happy to consider them. Having checked the mounting abuses of the scheme by making the regulations in December we can consider further changes to them if there are respects in which any association thinks that further change is needed. If the case for such changes is made out, there can be further consultation on the details of those changes, perhaps with less urgency than we felt necessary in December when the abuses still had to be checked. We shall be writing to the associations tomorrow to explain all that.

I hope that I have explained the regulations to the House, and, in particular, why we felt that they were needed to close the loopholes, and with some urgency. I hope also that I have been able to deal with at least some of the points that hon. Members have raised. However, I hope that, having heard those explanations and comments, the House will not accept the prayer tabled by the Opposition.

PETITIONS

Human Embryos

11.40 pm

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that of the House, I beg to ask leave to present a petition entitled that has been signed by 1,589 of my constituents in Inverness, Carrbridge, Tomatin, Farr, Croy, Fort William, Kinlochleven, Wester Lochaber and Ardnamurchan, mainly from church congregations of the Free Presbyterian, Free Church, Church of Scotland and the Baptist persuasion, but also from other denominations and the general public.

"Petition for the Protection of the Human Embryo"

The essence of the petition, which is in the same form as others that have been presented, is the assertion that the human embryo has a right of protection of the same kind as is afforded to a developed human being.

The petition concludes:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves the purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment . . . And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

I beg to ask leave to present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Buses

11.41 pm

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that of the House, I beg leave to present a petition on behalf of the people of Jarrow regarding the White Paper on buses which is now enshrined in the Transport Bill which had its Second Reading this week. I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans) is here, because both he and I have at many meetings pointed out the dangers in the recommendations of the White Paper.

This petition contains almost 2,000 signatures. The people are concerned that the recommendations in the White Paper, now enshrined in the Transport Bill, will affect them adversely. In my constituency of Jarrow we have miners not millionaires, engineers not racketeers, shipbuilders not shipowners. There is a very low car ownership. The people will be hit hard by the legislation. It is a pity the Government did not attack car owners for the £2,000 million which is alleged to have been lost to the Chancellor through evasion.

I pay tribute to Len Symes and Hugh Carlin who organised the papers for the people to come to sign. They did not even have to take the petition round, because the people were so concerned about how the legislation would affect them. In my constituency, one out of every two people relies on housing benefit and one out of every three is out of work.

The petition says:

To the Honourable the Commons of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The Humble Petition of the citizens of the Jarrow Constituency.

SHEWETH

That the proposals contained in the White Paper on Buses will have a detrimental effect on the residents of the Jarrow

Constituency who use public transport, will put in jeopardy the Tyne and Wear integrated transport system known as one of the best transport systems in the world.

Will put under threat the concessionary bus passes used by pensioners, disabled, unemployed and school children, and will cause further loss of jobs in the transport industry in an area of already high unemployment and will have a damaging effect on the wages and working conditions for those who are left in the transport industry.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House urges the Secretary of State for Transport not to put into effect the proposals of the White Paper on Buses.

And your Petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

I beg leave to present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Severe Weather Payments

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lang.]

11.43 pm

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): The purpose of the Adjournment debate is to secure guarantees from the Minister about the future of heating additions for the 2·5 million households who depend on them and to ask the Minister now as a matter of urgency to make exceptionally severe weather payments available to thousands of the poorest pensioners and low-income households throughout the whole of Britain who are being denied urgently needed help because of his Department's system for administering Single Payments Regulation No. 26 on exceptionally severe weather allowances. It is a system that has never been debated or discussed in the House until tonight. It is a system that has no statutory authority whatsoever. It is a system that has so redefined our view of what is exceptionally severe weather that in some cases old people would have to freeze to death before any payments would be offered.

When respectable medical evidence shows that up to 900,000 old people in this country could be at risk from hypothermia, when deaths from cold and cold-induced diseases could have risen by as much as 40 per cent. during this winter period of bad weather, when many pensioners tell me and my hon. Friends that they have to choose in this cold spell between heating and eating, no one can deny that the cold weather and the Government's pitifully inadequate response to it has brought suffering and hardship on a national scale and is a national disgrace.

Single Payments Regulation No. 26 provides that cash help will be made available to the poorest of supplementary benefit claimants where there has been a period of exceptionally severe weather and where fuel bills are higher than normal as a result. Under that regulation, in 1982 the Department made payments amounting to nearly £4 million to 280,000 supplementary benefit claimants, including many thousands of pensioners. But since 1982 not a penny has been paid out. Until a month ago, not a penny had been offered to any claimants, simply because of the invention by the Department in 1982 of a new formula for administering the scheme. That formula has no legal standing; that formula has been described as legally irrelevant by the only social security tribunal that has scrutinised it; that formula, I have been advised, would not stand up in any court of law—at least in Scotland—because of the Court of Session Act 1868 that obliges public bodies to fulfil their statutory obligations.

Quite simply, what the Government have done is to redefine what exceptionally severe weather is. According to the Government, exceptionally severe weather does not exist in most of the country, even if the temperature is consistently below freezing point every day for a week, or even for a month. According to the Government, exceptionally severe weather does not exist in northern parts of the country—and Scotland in particular—even if the temperature hovers between zero and minus 4 deg.C or minus 5 deg.C each day for weeks on end. According to the Government, exceptionally severe weather does not exist even if temperatures fall as low as minus 23 deg.C —as they did on one day last month in the north of

[Mr. Gordon Brown]

Scotland — or if, in some areas, the temperature has been as low as freezing point for six days and is between zero and minus 30 deg.C on the seventh day.

The Government have decreed that our weather is almost never sufficiently cold to qualify as being exceptionally severe. By underestimating the degree of cold and by underestimating the need for heating, the Department and the Government are conspiring to underpay needy claimants. They have done it by the invention of a cold weather formula consisting of four elements, all of which are of dubious legal and technical standing.

On the Department's own admission, the heating needs of claimants are calculated from standards designed to measure and monitor temperature levels not in people's homes, but in factories. Pensioners with only a one-bar electric heater are assumed to have the same heating needs and requirements as factory workers surrounded by electrical equipment, power-loading equipment, lifts and even central heating. The assumption behind the regulation and formula is that 15·5 deg.C is an adequate temperature for an old person at home, when all respectable evidence shows that at that temperature pensioners are dangerously close to the risk of hypothermia.

The last Conservative Government of 1972 published what they called simple guidance notes for those engaged in helping old people, in which they said that with a temperature at freezing point outside, to keep old people warm in winter the living room temperature should be about 70 deg.F, which is about 21 deg.C.

If in 1972, when the present Secretary of State for Education and Science was Secretary of State for Social Services, the official view was that the safe temperature at freezing point in pensioners' homes was 21 deg.C why, under the present Government, is the safe temperature only 15·5 deg.C, 5·5 deg. less, and for some people the difference between life and death?

Have the heating needs of pensioners changed during the last 12 years? Have pensioners somehow become more resistant to the cold? Or have the Government changed in that they are pursuing policies that are vindictive even beyond monetarism?

The heating formula is even more flawed. Benefit is triggered for pensioners and others, if at all, not by how cold it actually is but by how much colder it has been than the coldest temperatures of the last 20 years. The colder it was in the past, the colder it must become for claimants to benefit. To claim for benefit, temperatures must stand at zero in places such as Aberporth, but at minus 3 deg. in Aberdeen; at 0·5 deg. above freezing point in Plymouth and the south-west, but at 2·5 deg. below freezing in Glasgow and most of Strathclyde.

Does the Minister expect the nation seriously to believe that pensioners in Cowdenbeath in my constituency are somehow less sensitive to cold than are pensioners in Kent; that families in Braemar in the north have lower fuel bills than families in Bournemouth; that the very old are less at risk from hypothermia in the Shetlands than in Surbiton?

This absurd system has already been declared irrelevant by the only social security tribunal seriously to have scrutinised it. When, in addition to all these matters, temperatures to calculate the qualification for benefit are gathered at only 19 weather stations in the country, some more than 100 miles away from where pensioners and others live, and when, for administrative convenience, five or six days of cold weather, however severe, are not enough to justify help, surely that social security tribunal which scrutinised the formula was right to conclude that the formula is arbitrary and that the DHSS has been unable to elucidate, explain and justify the reasons for it.

If heating an entire home with a one-bar fire were comparable with maintaining the temperature in a busy factory; if abrupt changes in temperature were to conform to the Department's idea of a weekly cycle; if it were true that old people in the country's colder areas were somehow less at risk of death by cold; if we were prepared to discount the Department of Energy's view of the whole system as unsatisfactory and not a reliable indicator of fuel needs among pensioners; if the best judges, as the formula implies, of the needs of pensioners for heating was the Factory Inspectorate of the Department of Energy, advised by Meteorological Office weather stations 100 miles away and reporting to statisticians burrowing in the weather records of 20 years ago, we might be able to convince ourselves that nobody died from hypothermia.

I am not accusing Ministers of lying about the weather. But they are, to say the least, guilty of meteorological inexactitudes when, no matter how cold it is, the sun shines out of their statistics—and for one purpose only; to cheat pensioners and other poor families of a few pence by way of allowance. Here are a Government who put saving money before saving lives, even when the sums involved are minuscule and when the lives involved are the most frail and vulnerable in society.

Rather than reassess the level of benefits for old people, the Government are prepared to reassess the level of weather at which benefits are paid, making weather at freezing point too generous, Siberian conditions too warm and Arctic temperatures too kind for a cold weather benefit.

The Minister will say that the new formula is the nearest objective test available for defining exceptionally severe weather. He will say that it was not conjured up with the objective of saving money and will speak in the way that the Prime Minister has constantly tried to assure us of the Government's generosity towards pensioners. If the Government are so generous, may we be told why, before the formula was invented, 250,000 claimants, many of them pensioners, benefited, whereas since then not one claimant has received a penny?

If the Minister is so generous, why is it estimated in my constituency and other constituencies that, under the formula, help would have been given to pensioners and others in only three weeks of all the winter weeks of the last 20 years? Why have statisticians, fuel efficiency inspectors and weather men been engaged in conducting surveys of dubious value at vast cost to the Exchequer, invariably to conclude that no Exchequer costs need to be incurred in helping pensioners and others with their fuel bills?

The fact is that a legal regulation which, if properly implemented, would give help to 250,000 people—the poorest citizens — has been systematically and deliberately undermined by a formula of dubious standing under which almost no one can benefit. Having deliberately forced up gas prices by more than 100 per cent. in four years, having deliberately forced up electricity prices by 74 per cent. in the four years from 1979, but having allowed pensions to increase by only 50 per cent.—half as much as the increase in gas prices—having made many thousands of pensioners £1 a week worse off with the so-called uprating in November last year, the Government can make no claim to have been generous to the elderly. In Scotland—I am surprised that no Scottish Minister is here this evening—the Scottish Office is so generous to the elderly that, because of a cost-cutting exercise, it has withdrawn what it calls "hypothermia thermometers" which were issued last winter to old people and which could be life-saving devices for many people.

Because the formula under which benefits are denied has no legal basis and no statutory authority, the Government should now concede for every low-income household a special payment to help with crippling fuel bills. They should urgently investigate the possibility of introducing a hypothermia warning whereby, in weeks during which the weather is deteriorating, people are warned of the risk of hypothermia and neighbours and relatives are alerted to the need to provide assistance to elderly people. The Government should urge old people to use their heating and offer to pay the additional costs in their gas and electricity bills.

Last Thursday the Prime Minister told the House that the Department of Health and Social Security was reviewing the system of cold weather allowances. She said specifically:

"there is a review of these provisions, and that is being undertaken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security."—[Official Report, 7 February 1985; Vol. 72, c. 1101.]

This week, when I asked about the nature of the review, its terms of reference, the committee members and the evidence that is to be invited, the Minister could only say:

"the Government are looking at the provision for meeting special expenses of this sort in the context of the supplementary benefit review".—[Official Report, 11 February 1985; Vol. 73, c. 76.]

That is not a special review of the provisions for severe weather payments and not a review that is being carried out within DHSS. We all know that the supplementary benefit review has reported to the Minister; the Minister has now reported to the Cabinet; and the review has completed its work. The Cabinet is now discussing the recommendation. Having cynically undermined their own laws since 1972, having underestimated the needs of the community, and having done their best to withhold the most meagre of benefits from the poor, the Government are now retreating under smokescreen of a now completed review from all responsibility in this matter.

Now that these social security reviews have reported to Cabinet, I have to ask the Under-Secretary of State whether these reviews recommend the amendment and improvement of the exceptionally severe weather allowances to ensure proper help during this cold weather. Do they—as most of us fear—recommend their abolition so that the benefit will not be paid, no matter how cold the weather? Can the Under-Secretary of State give us a guarantee that pensioners and others—the 2·5 million householders which depend on heating additions—will not, as most of us fear, lose this vital help altogether under cover of a review which is becoming a cynical and heartless raid on the poorest and weakest in our society?

When the lives of elderly people are at risk, the House has a right to expect answers which are more detailed and frank than the empty rhetoric we have had so far from the Prime Minister and other Ministers. So that the cynical reassurances that the Prime Minister has given us do not become a callous betrayal in the spring, the House has a right to expect some detailed answers from the Under-Secretary of State.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Mr. Ray Whitney.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney) rose——

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I called the Under-Secretary of State. In an Adjournment debate, hon. Members need the agreement of both the hon. Member whose debate it is and the Minister.

12 midnight

Mr. Whitney: I am delighted to offer the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) some direct answers, in particular having heard such a farrago of misrepresentations. I am more pleased than I thought that I would be to offer corrections to his facts. First, we must put the situation into perspective—and after those flights of fancy, that is particularly necessary. The hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends have been seeking to fill the Scottish media with similar fantasies in the past few weeks.

Payments for exceptional weather conditions represent only a small addition to the great help with heating costs that the Government give to those in need in Scotland and elsewhere. We spend billions of pounds on social security, and we have maintained all the major benefit rates ahead of rises in prices during the lifetime of this Government. We are now spending no less than £400 million a year on extra fuel for consumers on low incomes.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the increase in fuel prices, but he should consider that there were times, under the Labour Government, when he was not in the House, when fuel prices were increasing by 2 per cent. every six weeks. During the period of this Government, while fuel prices have increased by about 108 per cent. between November 1978 and November 1984, the heating additions paid in the supplementary benefit scheme have increased by 147 per cent. over the same period.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of a pitiful and inadequate response, but he should study the record of the Labour Government.

He spoke about hypothermia among pensioners, but he should study the rise in fuel energy costs during the dreadful years of the Labour Government.

All that means that, despite the inescapable constraints on public expenditure, the least well-off in society, be they pensioners or others, are better off than they were when the Conservative Administration took office in 1979.

Dr. M. S. Miller rose——

Mr. Whitney: No, I shall not give way. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East has left me little time to make the many corrections that I must put to the House.

The least well-off in our society have substantially higher additions to pay for the fuel that they need to keep warm than they did when the Labour Government were in office. Quite apart from ignoring those major facts, the remarks of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East showed that he, like many other people, is mixing up—I suspect sometimes deliberately—two separate issues.

One issue is whether those on supplementary benefit, and who are therefore likely to have their financial affairs on weekly budgets which are very tightly balanced, should be given a little extra help when the weather becomes extremely severe and those budgets come under strain.

The other issue is whether there should be permanent differences in the rate of supplementary benefit paid in various parts of the country to take account of the fact that some parts generally have somewhat lower temperatures than others.

Let me deal, first, with the question of the special payments for exceptionally severe weather conditions. It is important here to make absolutely clear what we are talking about. The essential basis of the "exceptionally severe weather" provision is that it is an emergency arrangement to provide budgeting help, if necessary, in periods of exceptionally—and I stress the word——

Dr. M. S. Miller: Get off the brief!

Mr. Whitney: If the hon. Gentleman would listen, he would learn a great deal to his advantage. He has only just arrived.

Severe weather means conditions so bad that the claimant could not be expected to foresee and budget for the fuel that he used.

Dr. M. S. Miller: The hon. Gentleman should leave his brief for a moment and look at the humanitarian aspects of this matter. People are dying of hypothermia, not only in Scotland but in every part of the country. I know that the hon. Gentleman is humanitarian, and he should not be sticking to a brief that he has been given by his civil servants. Instead he should be seeing what he can do to improve the situation.

Mr. Whitney: We have paid considerably more in heating addition than the Labour Government—£140 million more. Of course we are concerned about the problems suffered by old people because of the cold, but we are showing that concern in a practical manner which the Labour Government did not.

Payments before 1980 were made at the discretion of the local DHSS office or of individual officers. The rules were not made public and no objective test was applied. The regulated scheme was introduced in 1980, but there were still problems in applying the scheme in the winter of 1982. Following that winter, the Chief Adjudication Officer decided to introduce a new system which would be clearer and fairer in its operation. In consultation with the Meteorological Office, he devised an objective means of deciding when payments were due and how much should be paid. Details of those procedures are available in the House. The details are clear, and any hon. Member can study them.

The effect is that what is regarded as "exceptionally severe" weather in Cornwall might not be regarded as such in the north-east of Scotland. However, the differences are not large—the biggest being between the average daily temperature required to reach the trigger point in Aberdeen and that needed in Plymouth, which is less than 3½ deg. C.

There are other differences which many people might find surprising, particularly in view of the hullabaloo to which the public have been treated in recent weeks. For example, it has to be slightly colder in Birmingham or Suffolk than in Glasgow to reach the trigger point. The levels at which the trigger points are set reflect meteorological data collected over many years.

Hon. Members have mentioned exceptionally low temperatures reached at a particular time in a particular locality. We have heard much about Braemar. It is suggested that we use shorter and different periods and act more frequently. There is talk of temperatures reached in one day. The Chief Adjudication Officer will take note of such comments, but I must make two points clear.

First, a fairly brief cold snap—for only a few hours—would not make the difference to individual fuel bills that we are considering. Secondly, our supplementary benefit system is already complex and overburdened. One of the objectives is to simplify it.

Reference has been made to the coverage by weather stations. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East said that there were 19 such stations, when there are only 17, seven of which cover Scotland. They were chosen on expert advice, and the Chief Adjudication Officer will be examining again which weather stations he should use for this purpose.

Anxiety has been expressed about the complications of the scheme and the need to publish details. We take all reasonable steps to publicise the help available. Posters are put up in local social security offices and elsewhere and claimants can obtain leaflets explaining how and when to claim. The Department also tries to ensure that the local media in the areas affected are fully briefed.

The formula might be complex, but claiming is simple. It is possible to apply a ready reckoner to the fuel bill to work out how much a claimant is entitled to.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Is the Minister defending the present system, or is he, as the Prime Minister appears to be saying, unhappy with the present system? Does he realise that it is possible for the DHSS to discard the formula and to pay the benefit now?

Mr. Whitney: I am seeking to set right the hon. Gentleman's complete misapprehension, which he is seeking to carry throughout Scotland for his own well-known political reasons. When he understands that, we shall go on to discuss what we propose to do in the future.

Let me now deal with the issue with which the concept of payments for exceptionally severe weather conditions is frequently confused—the idea that there should be some sort of "cold climate allowance" for particular parts of the country. Like Ministers in previous Governments, we have consistently taken the view that there are strong arguments against any deviation from the principle of national benefit levels. Apart from heating, there are many regional variations in prices which affect the amounts which people spend on different items. It would be possible to make a case, for example, based on the variation in transport costs in different parts of the country, and others would seek to point to other variations in living costs. If we do that, the task of setting and changing all the benefit rates each year would become impossibly complicated, at a time when one of our objectives is to make the system simpler and therefore better understood by claimants. Besides that, there is evidence that there is little variation between the amounts spent, on average, on fuel by people in different parts of Great Britain, and that that remains true at all levels of income.

In conclusion, let me return to the issue of payments for exceptionally severe weather conditions. I should stress that this winter is the first time that this new objective method has been triggered, and I know that the Chief Adjudication Officer will be looking carefully at the guidance he has issued in the light of experience gained this winter——

Dr. M. S. Miller: People are dying.

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Gentleman says that people are dying. Many more people would be likely to die if we were to make payments for heating of the kind that the Labour Government made. The Chief Adjudication Officer will no doubt be considering whether any changes are called for.

More generally, I would remind the House, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has done, that we are looking carefully at all the provisions for meeting special expenses of that sort in the context of the review of the supplementary benefit system. It must be right to await the outcome of this fundamental exaination of the whole scheme which we have been conducting before taking further decisions on the future of this particular regulation.

I welcome the opportunity to set the record straight about the deliberate confusion that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East and many of his hon. Friends and members of the Scottish National party have sought to sow in the minds of many people in Scotland. It is not a cold climate allowance; it is help with exceptional budget circumstances occasioned by changes in climate. The allowance is available to people north and south of the border on published, known and objective criteria.

I understand that this approach gives Opposition Members problems, but I am sure, now the matter has been explained, that at least fair-minded people—I must exclude Opposition Members who have listened to the debate—will understand the objective.

The main help with heating, as with all other assistance on supplementary benefit, relies on social security payments which have increased in real terms since the Government came into office by no less than 27 per cent.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Home-produced Food (Consumption)

1. Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the drop in food consumption from United Kingdom production over the last four years.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): Agricultural production, at constant prices, has increased by about 12 per cent. over the last four years. During the same period home-produced food has maintained its share of a static domestic market but exports have increased significantly.

Sir Peter Mills: I thank my hon. Friend for her answer, but is it not true that there has been a considerable drop in the consumption of certain products? Is that not a serious matter for British agriculture? Will my hon. Friend be careful not to over-react in company with the health lobby, which is always saying that certain products are bad for us? Finally, is it not the height of folly to seek to do away with the beef premium, which encourages people to consume beef rather than to put it into intervention?

Mrs. Fenner: There is no question of over-reacting. The report represents the best scientific and medical advice available to the Government, and the nation's health is of vital importance. My hon. Friend is right to say that the beef variable premium plays an important role in maintaining the consumption of beef in this country.

Dutch Horticulture Industry

2. Mrs. Roe asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in attempts to prevent the Dutch Government from subsidising its horticulture industry through cheap gas prices.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): The Commission is now considering what action to take in the light of comments received from member states and other interested parties since it instituted proceedings under article 93(2) of the treaty of Rome.

Mrs. Roe: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his reply, but will he accept that the reintroduction of preferential gas prices for Dutch growers has been a matter of concern to United Kingdom glasshouse growers? Even if it is halted now, a competitive advantage, particularly against the long-season protected crop producer, will have been gained by the Dutch during the winter months because of lower energy costs for produce to be marketed now and in the coming months. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it seems to be a calculated policy of the Dutch Government to create an unfair advantage so that our producers simply cannot compete?

Mr. Jopling: I have the greatest sympathy with my hon. Friend in her forthright and clear views. That is why the Government have put the strongest possible pressure on the Commission to require the Dutch to suspend the preferential gas price while considering whether the practice is compatible with the terms of the treaty.

Mr. Torney: In view of the struggle that our horticulture industry will have when Spain and Portugal join the EEC, and as this is the second time recently that the Dutch have kicked the question of fuel prices, thus seriously affecting the United Kingdom industry, does the Minister agree that it is time for concerted action by the Government, without waiting for the EEC to agree, to police the Dutch, otherwise the industry will go bang?

Mr. Jopling: We have raised this matter at every meeting of the Council of Ministers since it became apparent. The hon. Gentleman is right, in that in 1981 the Commission decided that the practice of a state controlled company operating a preferential gas price for horticulturists was incompatible with the treaty of Rome. I am not aware that matters are at all different now. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall keep up the pressure.

Mr. Hunter: As the Dutch Government are providing comparable assistance for the poultrymeat and egg sectors, what representations does my right hon. Friend intend to make to combat this form of unfair competition?

Mr. Jopling: If I can be provided with firm evidence of unfair competition by the Dutch in those sectors, I shall be glad to take the matter up with the Commission.

Mr. Stephen Ross: As the Dutch Government have been found guilty of subsidising their growers, why is it not possible to impose a levy on their products? They are swamping our growers. Growers in my area pay 10p a gallon more for their diesel fuel than anyone else on the mainland. They are going to the wall.

Mr. Jopling: At the most recent meeting of the Council of Ministers I proposed to the Commission that it ought to take steps to recover the unfair advantage that Dutch growers have had through what we regard as an illegal subsidy.

Mr. Mark Hughes: In view of that reply from the Minister may I ask whether, if the Government do not get a satisfactory answer from the Commission, the right hon. Gentleman will take unilateral action to protect our growers?

Mr. Jopling: We shall be prepared to do whatever we can, within the law, to ensure that Dutch growers do not get this type of unfair advantage. We shall press the Commission hard to ensure that the Dutch enact the law.

Beef and Sheepmeat

3. Sir Hector Monro asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the future of the beef premium and the sheepmeat regime.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): In its proposals for the 1985 common agricultural policy price fixing the Commission has made no provision for keeping the beef variable premium scheme. I believe that the scheme has served producers and consumers well and, in the current market situation for beef, should be maintained. As in previous years, we shall be pressing for its continuation. As to the sheepmeat regime, it has worked reasonably well but we shall continue to seek changes which will make it easier for our lamb to be exported to the rest of the Community and which will improve the stability of the home market.

Sir Hector Monro: Is my hon. Friend aware of the crucial importance of these two subsidies to the livestock areas of the west and north? Is he further aware that, without those subsidies, income from the hills of the west and north will be affected disastrously and that he must make every conceivable effort to ensure that the subsidies are maintained this year and in the future?

Mr. MacGregor: We had a tremendous struggle last year on the beef variable premium scheme, but my hon. Friend will know that my right hon. Friend the Minister was highly successful in maintaining that scheme, albeit in a somewhat changed form. We shall do everything that we can to persuade other member states of the merits of the scheme, which we believe benefits both producers and consumers and reduces the need for costly intervention. We shall resist any changes to the sheepmeat regime that discriminate against our producers.

Mr. Nicholson: I welcome the Minister's firm declaration in support of the beef variable premium scheme. I assure him that it has the support of farmers in Northern Ireland, who recognise the great need for it. In view of the continuing delay in the payment of the 1984-85 ewe premium, will he ensure that an interim payment is made to alleviate the hardship that is felt especially by hill livestock producers?

Mr. MacGregor: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's comments on the schemes. As for the delay in payment, I think that he is talking about the rates of advance payment in less-favoured areas. I know that they are important to farmers at this time of year, but a new method of calculation, which we do not believe is quite right, has been introduced. It is important that we get it right. There have been discussions this week on the advance payment issue, and I hope that there will be progress on the matter before too long.

Mr. Cockeram: Does my hon. Friend accept that both the beef premium and the sheepmeat regime are vital to the continued viability of farming in hill areas, not merely around Ludlow, but elsewhere? Does he agree that if the two schemes were to be ended it would be a sad day, because many hill farms would cease to be viable?

Mr. MacGregor: I hear what my hon. Friend says. I am sure that he also welcomed the improvements in the hill livestock compensatory amounts last year for hill farmers, in that they are now also payable in marginal areas.

Mr. Strang: Is it not scandalous that yet again the variable premium is under threat? Will the hon. Gentleman ensure that it continues and seek to establish it on a permanent basis, so that year in, year out we are not threatened with its removal?

Mr. MacGregor: The problem is that the scheme is not permanent and it was not this Government who negotiated the position of not making it a permanent scheme. It is difficult to get the beef variable premium on the table every year. As I said, we did it last year, and we continue to believe that it is not in the Community's interest to end the scheme.

Mr. Andy Stewart: In view of the speech of the president of the National Farmers Union on Tuesday, when he claimed that every success in agriculture, including the retention of the beef variable premium scheme, was due to the union and every failure was due to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, would my hon. Friend care to put the record straight?

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It was entirely due to the efforts of my right hon. Friend the Minister, whom I was pleased to assist, and not to anyone else, that we managed to retain the beef variable premium scheme.

Mr. Kirkwood: In addition to the threat emanating from the European Community Commission's proposals on the sheepmeat regime, will the Minister take careful account of the problem faced particularly by Scottish producers because they do not have access to the new qualifying group of animals?

Mr. MacGregor: I am not sure precisely what the hon. Gentleman has in mind. One or two points are worth taking up with the Commission, and perhaps the hon. Gentleman will write to me about the matter.

Sir John Farr: Is my hon. Friend aware that although most beef producers have received the beef premium for most of the weeks of the present year, beef has still been largely unprofitable and people are already leaving beef production? Will he do whatever he can to ensure that the scheme, which is so valuable, continues, otherwise, with the milk quota production, whole sections of the British countryside will change their character as people leave horn and find an alternative?

Mr. MacGregor: Both the variable premium scheme and the changes in the intervention system have had a beneficial effect on the market this year, in that the returns to the producers have been about 98 per cent. of the target price. I repeat that the variable premium scheme is beneficial to both producers and consumers and ensures that beef is consumed instead of going into intervention.

Mr. John: Since the schemes are justifiable on their own merits because they benefit producers and consumers, will the Minister resist any attempt to use the retention of the schemes as a lever to get unjust padding in other parts of the common agricultural policy, under which too much subsidy is already paid?

Mr. MacGregor: Our position on subsidies for products in surplus is extremely clear. The hon. Gentleman will know that we are to enter into negotiations, but these have not yet begun. Last year we had considerable difficulties with the schemes, and obviously we shall have to see how we get on in the negotiations.

Drainage

5. Mr. Yeo asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to publish his review of drainage.

Mrs. Fenner: We expect to issue the consultation paper on the financing and administration of land drainage, flood protection and coast defence in March.

Mr. Yeo: I welcome that reply. Is my hon. Friend aware of the urgency of this issue? It is well illustrated by the proposals of the Anglian water authority for the River Stour, which will desecrate the world-famous landscape in Dedham Vale. Does my hon. Friend agree that the only way, ultimately, to prevent that from happening will be to use yet more taxpayers' money to persuade landowners to refrain from growing products which the country neither needs nor can afford?

Mrs. Fenner: I regret the delay in the publication of the paper, but I am confident that it will now be issued in March. It will not cover conservation issues as such. Its prime purpose is to seek views on financial and administrative issues.

Mr. Haynes: Is the Minister aware that there is a firm in my constituency which makes pipes for land drainage? Will the Minister bear in mind what I have just said, because that firm has a marvellous record for exports, which are important to the economy, but it desperately needs some help with the home market?

Mrs. Fenner: The purpose of the paper is to consult interested parties on the present arrangements and to obtain their views on any improvements that are considered necessary. I do not believe that it will affect the hon. Gentleman's firm.

Mr. Cormack: Will my hon. Friend reconsider the reply that she gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) and accept that conservation is of widespread interest and is extremely important?

Mrs. Fenner: Yes, I wholly agree with my hon. Friend that conservation is important. I merely pointed out that that was not the purpose of the drainage paper.

Mr. Beggs: Is the Minister aware of the importance to agriculture of capital grants for land drainage and reclamation schemes in maintaining the jobs of employees of agricultural contractors, quarry operators and those who supply stone and gravel for drainage schemes? Will the Minister advise the House of the estimated number of job losses that will arise from the proposal to cut £13 million from the allocation to Northern Ireland and £27 million from the funds allocated to the mainland for capital grants?

Mrs. Fenner: Land drainage has had an enhanced rate of grant for some time now, and it is only fair that it should take its share of public expenditure cuts. The paper will review the present grant-aid arrangements, not fix future levels of grant-aid.

Mr. Mark Hughes: Will the paper deal with the problem of Wakefield, which is in a most difficult position between the hon. Lady's Department and the Department of the Environment? Does she accept that there are major difficulties in balancing conservation and agriculture, and that her answer that conservation is not included is disturbing?

Mrs. Fenner: I have had a good deal of correspondence on this issue with the right hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Harrison). I am aware of the problem. I note that the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Hughes) is interested in conservation, and I share that interest. The paper is about financial and administrative arrangements and seeks consultation about changes or improvements.

Agricultural Smallholdings

6. Mr. Ashdown asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the practice of Somerset and other counties in selling off their agricultural smallholdings.

Mrs. Fenner: It is the Government's policy to leave decisions on the sale of smallholdings to the smallholdings authorities concerned.

Mr. Ashdown: Is the Minister aware that such is the opposition of the National Farmers Union to Somerset's attempts to flog off its smallholdings for a little one-off help with the rates that the union is currently considering advice from a QC that there may be a reason to take Somerset to the courts to test the legality of the matter? In view of the Government's recent embarrassment over court decisions, will the Minister advise Somerset and other county councils which are considering agricultural asset stripping to stay their hand, at least until the legalities of the matter are established?

Mrs. Fenner: I note with interest the hon. Gentleman's statement about the NFU. There is no intention to reimpose any limitation on the freedom of local authorities to act in the way that they think best on smallholdings.

Mr. Hardy: Has not hon. Member after hon. Member on the Conservative Benches in recent years prated about the need for young people to have an opportunity to enter farming? Is it not the case that those authorities which are selling their smallholdings are merely emulating the dogma of selfish and shortsighted privatisation which is so eagerly served by the same hon. Members who talk about opportunities?

Mrs. Fenner: On the contrary. Unfortunately, smallholdings have not generally proved effective in providing that first rung on the farming ladder, largely because of the absence of further rungs, which owes a great deal to the Labour party's Agricultural Land Holdings Act 1976. In the 10-year period to 1980-81 only about 14 tenants per year succeeded in making that transition.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the Minister aware that the Northfield report said that smallholdings should not be sold in view of the urgent need to retain farm holdings to let? As recent legislation has only too plainly failed to encurage private landlords to let more farming units, has the Government any policy to deal with that?

Mrs. Fenner: The hon. Gentleman is well aware that the Act has hardly been in force for long enough to have made any considerable difference. It is our hope that it will in time, but that is no excuse for contending that smallholdings have provided that rung, when all the figures show that they have not.

Protein Crops

7. Mr. Key asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action the Government are taking to promote the output of protein crops such as peas and beans.

Mr. MacGregor: The Government have actively supported Community action to encourage the protein sector, which includes the payment of a subsidy on peas and field beans production. We fund research designed to produce improved varieties of these protein crops and advice to growers is available from the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service.

Mr. Key: In view of the need to reduce cereal output next year, to what extent does my hon. Friend regard protein crops such as peas and beans as a viable alternative? As the yield is about 3 tonnes per hectare, but Rothamstead says it should be 8 tonnes, what is he doing to encourage that experimental station?

Mr. MacGregor: As I indicated, we are funding quite a lot of research into improving consistency of yield and uniform ripening of the crop, and also into high resistance to pests and diseases. On his first point, my hon. Friend will know that United Kingdom pea production increased by 60 per cent. between 1983 and 1984. He is right in saying that it provides an alternative to cereals and other surplus products. That is one of the two reasons why it is sensible to encourage it, the other being that we are still in substantial deficit in protein crops.

Mr. Haselhurst: Has my hon. Friend made a careful assessment of the extent to which this could be a help to farmers to get out of grain, and thus to deal with the overall problem of surpluses?

Mr. MacGregor: Farmers must make up their own minds about what they wish to do, but we have been giving encouragement in this area.

Mr. Mark Hughes: What advice are the Government giving about lupins?

Mr. MacGregor: As the hon. Gentleman will know, there is quite a lot of discussion about lupins in the United Kingdom. There are still considerable difficulties in growing them successfully, but some day that may be an alternative crop. Some producers are certainly getting interested in it.

Potatoes

8. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Eood if he is satisfied with the operation of the scheme for the sale of potato quotas.

Mr. MacGregor: This is a matter for the Potato Marketing Board. However, at my request the board has re-examined the operation of the quota system and has introduced greater flexibility.

Mr. Howarth: Given that about half our potato consumption consists of imports, does my hon. Friend agree that it would be best to wind up the board? If the producers want the board, let them finance it out of their own resources, rather than making further calls on taxpayers' funds.

Mr. MacGregor: Just this morning in Committee we passed amendments relating to the Potato Marketing Board which have had thorough consideration and are supported by more than 97 per cent. of growers. If the proposals go through Parliament as a whole, the growers will be paying a higher levy and the Government's open-ended commitment on deficiency payments will be withdrawn.

Mr. Geraint Howells: Can the Minister give an assurance to potato producers that the Government have no plans to abolish the Potato Marketing Board?

Mr. MacGregor: As today, with the approval of the Committee, I have carried amendments in regard to the Potato Marketing Board which will last for five years. I think that the position is clear.

Mr. Colvin: Now that we have a scheme for the sale of potato quotas, why can we not also have a perfectly controlled scheme for the sale of milk quotas, which is a form of marketing that is favoured by both the National Farmers Union and the Milk Marketing Board?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend will know that that was in response to a paper which we put out recently suggesting various alternatives for greater flexibility in the milk levy sytem. That is one possibility that we will consider in response to all the representations that we have received, but it will have to be negotiated in Brussels.

Milk Quotas

9. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements he is making for allocating secondary milk quotas in the year following 31 March 1985 and subsequent years in relation to the needs of farmers who are part way through development plans.

Mr. Jopling: The Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations allow the tribunal to make awards of secondary quota only in respect of expansion plans giving rise to production in the 1984-85 milk year. If we had made provision for plans extending into later years, this would have necessitated a bigger reduction in calculating quotas for other producers, and I do not think this would have been the right course.

Mr. Ross: Is the Minister aware that many producers, particularly those undertaking development plans, will have a rude shock at the end of March when they find that their quota is 30 per cent. less than they had bargained for? Is not the answer for the Minister to extend the outgoers scheme so that there will be more money to provide a fairer quota for those engaged in milk production?

Mr. Jopling: I think that we did immensely well to get £50 million for the outgoers scheme, and it has been a satisfactory sum. However, I am aware of the problems of producers who made firm plans before quotas were introduced, but who will not have finished the work until the end of 1984-85. I am prepared to give the matter further thought. The amount of quota available is very limited, and I would find it hard to justify going beyond 31 March 1985, when awards in respect of the current year will themselves be subject to scaling down.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Will the Minister comment on Mr. Andriessen's proposal that the regional quota be spread over the whole national territory so that this year Northern Ireland will be exempt from paying superlevy?

Mr. Jopling: We have arrangements that are being discussed in Brussels at the moment, which would allow one to redistribute quota beyond the area of the dairies that were originally in the regulations. Those are still matters for discussion. However, I see that the amount of milk being produced in Northern Ireland is coming back towards the quota level.

Miss Maynard: In view of the fact that we now know that farm workers, dairy workers and some transport workers are losing their jobs because of the milk quotas, is the Minister prepared to go back to the EEC to get some money in compensation for workers who have lost their livelihood as a result of the milk quota scheme?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Lady, to whom I have answered a similar question before, will know that we have arrangements for redundancy payments in this country and that some firms, for instance the Milk Marketing Board, provide redundancy terms that are considerably more generous than those of the state scheme.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim: Is my right hon. Friend aware that producer-retailers are still unable to sell the full amount of their production quota direct to the public? Is he further aware that flexibility of wholesale quotas does little to alleviate that situation? Does my right hon. Friend remember that some nine months ago he committed himself to sort out the situation as soon as possible?

Mr. Jopling: We have been raising that matter at every meeting of the Council of Ministers since the middle of last summer, and I am glad to say that one of the first things that the new Commissioner did was to introduce some proposals that sought to deal with the problem of inflexibility between a direct and a wholesale quota when they are on one farm. We are continuing to discuss that. I hope that we shall be able to sort it out and finalise it at the next meeting of the Council at the end of the month.

Mr. John David Taylor: Does the facility that makes it possible to transfer quotas from one part of the United Kingdom to another apply to this year only?

Mr. Jopling: We have limited arrangements, as the right hon. Gentleman will know, for transferring milk from one farm to another. He will also know that my Department recently issued a consultation paper to try to find ways in future of making that simpler.

Mr. Maclean: Notwithstanding my right hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross), is he aware that there are a few farmers in my constituency who are halfway through a development scheme, who will have no quota at all from 1985 onwards? In addition to trying to bring the 200,000 litre men up to full strength, will my right hon. Friend change his mind and attempt to find some quota for those small farmers who will have no livelihood unless they get some quota for 1985-86?

Mr. Jopling: I am not absolutely clear in my mind about the question that my hon. Friend asks because, as I understand it, the problem concerns quota being available for future expansion after 1 April this year. However, if my hon. Friend cares to send me details of specific problems, I shall have a look at them and see what can be done.

Mr. Home Robertson: Since the tribunals' recommended allocations of secondary quota are being scaled down by 42·5 per cent. in Scotland and 35 per cent. in England and Wales, and since it is likely that Britain could be 200 million litres short of its national quota this year, which is equivalent to the production of about 40,000 cows, will the Minister now accept that he has made a shambles of this and do something about it by expanding the outgoers scheme and allowing the milk marketing boards to do something about transferring quota between producers?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman has the wrong end of the stick altogether. The awards of the panels and tribunals will have to be scaled down, but that is a function of the extra 2·5 per cent. by which we lowered the primary quotas of milk producers in order to deal with hardship cases. I took advice from the National Farmers Unions at the time on whether it had a better figure than 2·5 per cent. in mind. Of course, we could have helped if we had taken 3 or 3·5 per cent. off milk producers' primary quotas, but the unions told me that they did not have a better figure than 2·5 per cent. in mind.

Caribbean (Ministerial Visit)

10. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the purpose of the official visit by a Minister in his Department to the Caribbean in late January; how many persons were in the official party; and what was the total cost to public funds.

Mr. Jopling: For the purpose of my hon. Friend's official visit, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) on 4 February. The party comprised four persons and the total cost is now estimated at £9,900.

Mr. Hamilton: Was that extravagant jaunt approved by the Prime Minister, or was she on holiday at the time? Was the cost of the Minister's husband, who was in the party, paid for by the taxpayer, and did she bring back with her any banana skins for the use of Ministers?

Mr. Jopling: I see that the hon. Gentleman is up to his usual rather snide form. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary embarked on that visit on my instructions to ensure that the promised steps were being taken to improve the quality of bananas coming to the United Kingdom—which enjoy preferential access—from the Windward Islands and Jamaica. We have in the past received many complaints from importers about the quality of imports, but I am glad to say that British housewives are already enjoying better quality fruit as a result of our pressures, not least those from my hon. Friend.

The hon. Gentleman probably does not understand how much help on overseas visits a spouse can be. My view is shared by right hon. and hon. Members on the Opposition Front Bench, because I understand that between 1974 and 1979 Ministers from my Department, accompanied by spouses, took part in 14 visits, to Venice, Warsaw, Copenhagen, Moscow, Amsterdam, the United States, Fiji, New Zealand, Australia, Italy, Martinique, Guadaloupe, Canada, Scandinavia, West Germany, Brazil, Mauritius, India, Singapore, Japan and Hong Kong.

Mr. Budgen: Was the visit perhaps with a view to setting up a banana regime within the enlarged EEC? If banana growers within the enlarged EEC were given what they would call an adequate rate of return, might it not be possible for the EEC to become self-sufficient in bananas? Would that not be in the finest traditions both of the Ministry of Agriculture and of the common agricultural policy?

Mr. Jopling: There is no intention in my mind of having a banana regime. If my hon. Friend cannot do rather better than that, he would have done better to stay in the Whips' Office.

Farm Incomes

11. Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will consider reviewing the presentation of statistics about farmers' income in the Annual Review of Agriculture.

Mr. MacGregor: The tables on these matters have all undergone considerable changes during the last two years and now provide more detailed and better information about farming income than was previously available. But I am always willing to consider suggestions for improvements to these statistical tables.

Mr. Jackson: Does my hon. Friend agree that in the presentation in the White Paper insufficient weight and prominence are given to the many qualifications which the White Paper admits must be attached to the estimates of farm incomes?

Mr. MacGregor: We have gone to considerable lengths to try to get this right in this particular year, and I believe that that is reflected in the comments on the figures in the media and elsewhere. My hon. Friend is entirely right to say that we should not look at just one figure and that there are very considerable variations between different sectors of agriculture, which are very firmly brought out in tables 26 and 27. He is absolutely right to draw attention to that.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Minister ignore the current cant of the National Farmers Union, which is only bleating on behalf of its membership? Is it not right that for the next 10 years the farmers have to face some pretty rough justice, because, increasingly, money must be transferred within the European Community's budgets from agriculture to industry and they will have to take their fair share of the cuts?

Mr. MacGregor: We have made it clear that we believe that change has to come in agriculture where we have surpluses in the Community and in this country. That is what we are doing in all the negotiations on price fixing. But it is a great mistake to concentrate on certain sectors of farming. It is very important to stress that there are many farmers with extremely modest incomes who work all hours of the day and night to achieve them.

Mr. Forth: Will my hon. Friend consider including, as well as income figures for the farming community, the capital value of their assets, which are rarely reflected when these matters are considered and reported?

Mr. MacGregor: Those figures also are contained in the White Paper. The difficulty is that so much information is contained that it is very important to get the balance right, and that is what we endeavour to do.

Mr. John: However the statistics are presented, does the hon. Gentleman agree that the 22 per cent. rise in farmers' incomes must mean that the cereal sector, where we are already heavily into over-production, must have done very well indeed? Can he justify the continuance of that?

Mr. MacGregor: We have made it clear for some time now that we are endeavouring to get a better balance between the cereal and livestock sectors, and we shall continue to do so.

12. Mr. Hardy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the present structure and balance of farm incomes.

Mr. MacGregor: I am concerned that broadly there continues to be an imbalance between the arable sectors and most livestock sectors. We will take account of this imbalance during the forthcoming CAP price fixing.

Mr. Hardy: Will the Minister accept that the large cereal producers, many of whom are to be found on the Government Back Benches, have done extremely well and continue to do well despite the great difficulties the small farmer generally faces? May we take it that the Minister will acknowledge that the small farmer today is for the first time feeling the cold breath of the 1930s, and does the Minister still expect the small farmer to continue to support the Conservative party?

Mr. MacGregor: Again, one has to look at different types of small farmer and different areas, but I certainly accept that in some areas the small farmer is having a difficult time, and I have made that clear. It is precisely because of our anxiety to help farmers of this sort that we are seeking a better balance between cereals and livestock. After all, the drop in cereal prices this year has undoubtedly benefited the livestock sector, and we shall continue with that approach.

Sheepmeat

13. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what he expects will be the total percentage self-sufficiency in sheepmeat production in the United Kingdom for 1984-85; and what is the anticipated self-sufficiency of the European Economic Community.

Mr. MacGregor: Forecasts are not available for the 1984-85 marketing year. Self-sufficiency for the 1984 calendar year is now estimated at 77 per cent. for the United Kingdom and 75 per cent. for the European Community.

Mr. Shepherd: Does my hon. Friend agree that the profound changes now taking place in agriculture mean that sheepmeat production will assume ever-increasing importance in British agriculture? Is he aware that his commitment to resist strongly any change in the variable premium schemes will be well received? Will he especially resist the Community proposal whereby any loss of return from the operation of the limited gap in the variable premium is not compensated by an increase in the ewe premium?

Mr. MacGregor: The Commission has proposed this year to put a ceiling on the variable premium. As this would help our exporters and could save money, we shall need to examine it carefully. We shall not, however, accept any mechanism of the kind to which my hon. Friend has referred, which is known as a recovery bar and discriminates particularly against British interests.

Milk Quotas

14. Mr. Hicks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has submitted to the European Economic Community Commission any proposals to introduce greater flexibility into the milk quota scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: As a result of our repeated pressure the Commission has now made proposals designed to provide greater flexibility between wholesale and direct sale quotas. I shall be pressing for the urgent adoption of these necessary measures.

Mr. Hicks: I welcome my right hon. Friend's efforts in this direction. Is he aware that many producer retailers find themselves in a ludicrous position and look to my right hon. Friend to improve the situation as quickly as possible?

Mr. Jopling: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comment. We have been pressing for this since last summer and I am very glad that the new Commissioner, almost within the first week of his duties in Brussels, has put forward proposals to make these necessary changes.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 14 February.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with the Prime Minister of Italy.

Mr. Kirkwood: As the flaws in section 2 of the Official Secrets Act have come to a head in the Ponting trial this week, but were originally brought to the attention of the House by Lord Franks in 1972, and as the present Attorney-General and Home Secretary condemned the provisions of that section as long ago as 1978, will the Prime Minister find time in her busy schedule today to convene a meeting with the express and urgent purpose of planning the early repeal of that section so as to create greater freedom of information and reserve only explicitly stated matters which must be subject to confidentiality?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman has said, the Franks report was produced in 1972 by three Privy Councillors and a number of other hon. Members. A White Paper was issued six years later in 1978. In 1979, when the Conservative Government which I led came to power, we introduced a Bill to implement the Franks recommendations, but that Bill did not find favour with Parliament and we have not tackled the matter since. Many people want section 2 changed, but there is precious little agreement on how to change it.

Q2. Mr. Robert Adley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 14 February.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Adley: In the light of the barrage of allegations following the Ponting trial, does my right hon. Friend agree that the disclosure of intelligence information is inevitably bound to be useful to potential enemies? Will she assure the House that if there is any conflict between disclosure to the House and national security she will give first priority to national security?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree wholly with my hon. Friend. There is no right to information which may imperil the safety of the armed forces. Indeed, the Government have a duty to prevent the release of such information, and it is a duty which I shall continue to discharge.

Mr. Kinnock: May I first say how completely I agree with that last answer on the matter of national security. The Prime Minister will know that I have today written to her, having received her assurances that she was not involved in the joint decision to prosecute made on 17 August 1984 by the Law Officers, and on that point I am prepared to accept her assurances. I have said this to the Prime Minister in my letter of reply, and I have also enclosed several other questions relating to the decision to prosecute Clive Ponting. I now want the right hon. Lady to answer the question which she avoided answering on Tuesday.

A vetted jury unanimously concluded that Mr. Clive Ponting had not broken the law by exposing the attempts of Ministers deliberately to mislead Parliament and the public. Did the Prime Minister know about the proposed deception of Parliament and, if she did, did she endorse it? If she did not know about it, will she now condemn it, and condemn it strongly? Will she now answer the question?

The Prime Minister: I have received the right hon. Gentleman's letter. It contained no trace of apology or withdrawal of anything which he said — no trace whatsoever. Indeed, in many respects he repeated the assertion. He quoted from a letter written by—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] I shall answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say to the House that it is unseemly to shout.

The Prime Minister: In his letter, the right hon. Gentleman referred to a letter written by the former Labour Attorney-General. The right hon. Gentleman quoted from it, but what he did not say was what the former Labour Attorney-General said at the beginning of his letter. The letter was written to The Times on 26 September 1984. The former Labour Attorney-General, Mr. Sam Silkin, said:

"the Prime Minister emphatically asserted that 'the Law Officers did not seek the view of, or consult with, any other minister, nor was the view of any other minister conveyed to them, before they took their decision to prosecute Mr. Ponting.'"

Mr. Silkin continued:

"As a statement of fact I do not question this assertion."

Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to be making a similar statement? [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."]

Mr. Kinnock: I am more than content to have the whole of Sam Silkin's letter quoted, but unfortunately the right hon. Lady, with her selective tastes, still does not answer the question which I asked.

As far as my repetition of assertions is concerned, may I say that that is still because the primary points have not been answered in anything that the right hon. Lady has sent to me.

On the matter of apologies, yes, apologies are in order —[Interruption.]—apologies from the right hon. Lady for the utterly disreputable action of her Ministers in seeking to mislead and let down Parliament, as the documents leaked by Clive Ponting conclusively demonstrate.

The Prime Minister: I notice that the right hon. Gentleman does not have the grace to agree with the former Labour Attorney-General.

May I now come to his question, and answer it in my own way. There has been no attempt whatsoever to mislead the House. [Interruption.] I have made it absolutely clear that the Government have a duty not to reveal intelligence which could be of assistance to the enemy or which could imperil the safety of our own forces. I notice that our enemies are very careful not to let us know how much and when they knew of our movements and operations. They are not being questioned in that way. We have a duty not to disclose that. [Interruption.]

Mr. Foulkes: Rubbish. Everyone knows it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a very serious matter, of very great interest to the House and to everybody. I ask the House to give the Prime Minister a fair hearing.

The Prime Minister: Where information has lost its operational significance, we have given a full account of the facts, which have been published in the Official Report and have not been challenged. Other information still has great operational and intelligence significance, especially in a situation where the Argentine has still not ceased permanent hostilities against this country.

Mr. Kinnock: Wherever the national security or the safety of our troops and sailors is concerned, or wherever they may be imperilled, this House should be at one. Where questions of the integrity of Ministers is concerned, this House should be at one. The knowledge of movements of the battleship Belgrano is now encyclopaedic and detailed, and has been for many, many months. There are now no longer any details that could conceivably be related to any possibility of imperilling our troops.

Those documents and matters being considered by Ministers have been released. Is the right hon. Lady saying that the documents that were disclosed by Mr. Ponting were forgeries, or is she saying that he committed perjury, or is she saying that the jury was wrong?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is going right off beam. What I said, and have made perfectly clear—[Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman is right off beam. He clearly knows nothing about intelligence matters. Where information has lost its operational significance, we have given a full account of the facts. Indeed, I think that if there is a charge to be made against me, it is that I have given too many facts that might best not have been given.

I want to say this to the right hon. Gentleman about intelligence—if an enemy or anyone who has been in hostilities with us has intelligence information and knows not only what it is but the time we got it, he will be well on the way to knowing where we got it and he will take the appropriate action. Those methods are still in existence. To give away intelligence now, when the Argentine still has not ceased hostilities, would imperil our armed forces. It is no earthly good the right hon. Gentleman saying that we are all at one—his actions reveal that we are not at one.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the majority of people in this country feel that the action taken over the Belgrano — whether it was steaming away at 50 knots or sailing round in circles— was the right action to take? Does she further agree that the Leader of the Opposition is naive in thinking that we should disclose how we got the knowledge, when and where, when it still has great military significance for our armed forces?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has it absolutely right. The interesting thing is that out of the whole Falklands affair, brilliantly conducted and carried out, the Opposition can find only a couple of little quibbles. That shows what sort of people they are.

Dr. Owen: The Prime Minister must be aware that the charge of misleading the House is not a quibble—it is a very serious charge. Therefore, is it not incumbent upon her to come to the House on Monday to defend the position that she adopted following November 1982, when she became aware of the fact that some of the statements that had been made in this House were incorrect? That is a simple thing. The Prime Minister is, quite rightly, intent on getting a proper apology out of the Leader of the Labour party because there is a convention in this House that we trust each other's word. That convention is also based on the understanding that the record in Hansard is corrected at the earliest opportunity. That the Prime Minister did not do. She, as the head of the Government, should explain why it is that civil servants and Ministers appear to have misled this House and a Select Committee. She should do that in debate on Monday.

The Prime Minister: The debate on Monday will be taken by the Ministry of Defence and by my right hon.

Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. I have already told the right hon. Gentleman, had he listened — I understand that he might not have heard, because it was a bit noisy — that where information has lost its operational significance we have given a full account of the facts. That full account of the facts was published in several columns of Hansard on, I believe, 29 October. Not one single fact or figure there has been challenged.

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does it relate to Question Time?

Mr. Nellist: Yes, Sir. You will no doubt be aware, Mr. Speaker, and the House will be interested to know, that a couple of hours ago Mr. Clive Ponting was sacked by the Ministry of Defence—[HON. MEMBERS: "Quite right."] My point of order is that although Mr. Ponting was cleared by a jury——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that I have anything to do with that. There is a debate on the matter on Monday, and I should have thought that that would provide an admirable opportunity for the hon. Gentleman to raise the issue.

Mr. Nellist: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman can only raise a point of order that I can answer, and I cannot answer the question that he is asking me.

Mr. Nellist: My point of order is simply this, Mr. Speaker. Have you received a request from the Ministry of Defence for permission to make a statement that will clear up the question of how a man can be found not guilty in a court of law and then sacked for the same offence?

Mr. Speaker: I have not.

Mr. Flannery: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In Question Time there are now so many leaders around us all over the place—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I got as far as "leaders".

Mr. Flannery: There are now so many leaders that it is increasingly difficult for a Back-Bencher to be called. Interesting as the exchanges are, will you, Mr. Speaker, take note of that and question yourself about it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has raised a very fair point. Indeed, I mentioned it this week, last week and, I believe, the week before that. It would be a great pity if Question Time involved only exchanges between the Front Benches. However, I do my best where I can to ensure that Back Benchers have an equal share of the time.

Business of the House

3.33 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 18 FEBRUARY—There will be a debate on the sinking of the General Belgrano, which will arise on a Government motion.

Motion on the Agricultural and Horticultural Co-operation Scheme.

TUESDAY 19 FEBRUARY — Second Reading of the London Regional Transport (Amendment) Bill.

Remaining stages of the Water Fluoridation Bill.

Motion on the European Community Document No. 4421/85 on the Milk Supplementary Levy Scheme.

WEDNESDAY 20 FEBRUARY — Motion on the Rate Limitation (Prescribed Maximum) (Rates) Order.

Remaining stages of the Trustee Savings Banks Bill.

THURSDAY 21 FEBRUARY—Remaining stages of the London Regional Transport (Amendment) Bill.

Motion on the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 (Continuance) Order.

FRIDAY 22 FEBRUARY—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 25 FEBRUARY — Remaining stages of the Representation of the People Bill.

[Debate on Milk Supplementary Levy Scheme February 1985:

Document
4421/85 Milk quotas and levy.
Relevant Report of European Legislation Committee
HC 5-ix (1984-85), para. 2.]

Mr. Kinnock: I am glad that the Government have changed their mind and will after all, be tabling an amendable motion for Monday's debate. However, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that my hon. Friends and I consider that the choice of subject by the Government is nothing more than an evasive gimmick designed to distract attention from the main current issues of the conduct of Ministers and the decision of the Government to prosecute Mr. Clive Ponting? The Government will not succeed in their efforts to distract attention by the use of this stratagem.

Will the Leader of the House confirm that we will shortly have the debate on the public expenditure White Paper to which he said he has been giving consideration?

May I ask the right hon. Gentleman once again whether the Government will provide their own time for a debate on the problems that will arise from the closure of a third of the skillcentre network, particularly as we now discover that there is no majority on the Manpower Services Commission for that course of action?

Will the Government provide time for an urgent debate on Britain's immigration laws in view of the disturbing evidence in yesterday's report from the Commission on Racial Equality that our immigration system operates unfairly and unjustly against black families and is a source of tension in race relations?

Mr. Biffen: Perhaps we might pursue through the usual channels the question of a debate on the report of the Commission on Racial Equality on the application of the immigration laws. I make the same comment as I did last week about the possibilities of a debate on skillcentres.

To answer the right hon. Gentleman's question about a debate on the public expenditure White Paper, I understand that the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service will shortly report on the matter. I hope that a debate can take place soon thereafter, and certainly ahead of the Budget debate.

I note that the right hon. Gentleman is happy that Monday's debate should take place on an amendable motion. I listened to his rehearsed trailer for the whole character of the debate on Monday, and I can only comment, in all generosity, that if it is to be a question of an evasive gimmick, he is giving us a generous standard by which to measure ourselves.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Will my right hon. Friend try to find time for an early debate on the need to reform the Official Secrets Act? Is he aware that some of us are disturbed by the somewhat doubtful line which appears to be emerging from the Treasury Bench to the effect that there is no need to tackle this subject again because previous attempts, particularly the 1979 Bill, ran into difficulties? As he will recall that the 1979 Bill was never debated on the Floor of the House but was withdrawn by the Government because of difficulties over the Blunt disclosures, will he agree that that is not a valid comparison and that there is now a new situation which merits an early debate?

Mr. Biffen: As my hon. Friend reminded a radio audience earlier today, he has himself done his time in dock in respect of the Official Secrets Act and therefore he speaks on the matter with added authority. I cannot give him an optimistic reply today, but I shall draw attention of the Home Secretary to the point that he makes.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Will the Leader of the House take note of what I think is a widespread view, not only inside but outside the House, that as the Prime Minister is in charge of the nation's security and is the only member of the War Cabinet still in office it would be treating the House with contempt for her not to take part in the debate on Monday and to clear up the remaining issues once and for all?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman will have heard the answer that my right hon. Friend gave to his master, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen). I shall put to her the point that the right hon. Gentleman makes.

Dr. Brian Mawhinney (Peterborough): Has my right hon. Friend noted that the Secretary of State for Social Services has promised a decision on the Government's policy on limited lists before the end of this month? If that decision is made next week, will my right hon. Friend arrange for a statement to be made? Although the House has been promised a regulation for debate, in the light of other factors that have emerged in recent weeks, particularly relating to the behaviour of the pharmaceutical industry and some in the medical profession, will the Leader of the House arrange for a much longer debate than might normally be associated with the consideration of a mere regulation?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend underlines the importance of this topic. I shall certainly bear in mind the importance of a statement being made. I shall take account of his representations that there should be a longer debate than is normally the case.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Prime Minister's refusal to take part in the debate on Monday will confirm the growing feeling that, when there were military victories bought with British lives in the Falklands, she was very ready to step forward to claim the credit but that when there are criticisms of her conduct she offloads the responsibility on to other Ministers or shields behind an artificial defence of national security? The impression which she gave today and which emerges from her decision not to speak is that under the image of a great war leader, which she so sedulously cultivates, lies the heart of a coward.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must ask the right hon. Member to withdraw that last word.

Mr. Benn: It is not my wish to use unparliamentary language, Mr. Speaker, but I think that I am entitled to draw a contrast between the Prime Minister's conduct when——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Member is a very experienced Member of the House. He knows that he may not use that word in relation to another right hon. Member.

Mr. Benn: I withdraw the word "coward", Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Biffen: May I say in the cause of the virtues of anodyne language that, on reflection, I think that I was unnecessarily rough in the comment I made to the leader of the Liberal party about his relationship. It was meant in the kindest of spirits.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) is an experienced debater. I have no doubt that he believes that a legitimate part of politics is playing the man, or woman, as well as the ball. I have no doubt that he will be able to do that next Monday. I have no doubt also that the right hon. Gentleman heard the answer that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave to the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen). I believe that, on reflection, he will realise that that was a perfectly valid explanation.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): Will my right hon. Friend consider the difficulties facing the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, of which I have the honour to be Chairman, and other Select Committees? When recommedations are made by the Committee of Selection that hon. Members should join a particular Committee, such as the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, there has been an increasing blockage in implementing the Selection Committee's recommendations. For instance, the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Mr. Conlan) was prevented for three months last summer from joining the Select Committee on Trade and Industry and my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) has been prevented for more than a month from joining the Select Committee because the Liberal/SDP alliance will not accept the membership of those hon. Members on the Committee.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has referred to a real problem. I shall certainly look into the matter, although I have a limited role in this regard, to ascertain whether anything can be done.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): May the Secretary of State for Energy be called here next week to explain why he has refused on numerous occasions to disclose to the House the state of the electricity board's accounts? A member of his own party, the Chairman of the Select Committee on Energy, has confirmed that the electricity board has lost £2 billion as opposed to its £240 million profit in the year before the strike. Surely it is high time the Secretary of State for Energy made a statement to the House on that matter and disclosed the current state of stocks. The right hon. Gentleman is refusing to answer parliamentary questions that have been tabled continuously since Christmas. There are many aspects of this strike, including costs, about which the House should know. It is high time the right hon. Gentleman was brought here to explain himself.

Mr. Biffen: My right hon. Friend is first for parliamentary questions on Monday. Although the hon. Gentleman may feel disposed to disparage the technique of parliamentary questions, I think that he is rather good at it, and I hope that he will persist.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): On next week's business, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that the unwritten constitution can work only if all hon. Members behave as gentlemen and not as cads?

Mr. Biffen: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend. It would be totally impossible, and out of the character of this place, to try to prescribe with precision how we conduct relationships. We must proceed on the basis that my hon. Friend has suggested.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Has the Leader of the House seen the amendment put down to early-day motion 341 by a group of Conservative Members?

[That this House congratulates the Newcastle Evening Chronicle for its report on Tuesday 29th January, revealing that a meeting of senior National Coal Board officials was held in the National Coal Board Staff College, Longbenton, in September 1981, to hear a statement that it was the intention of the current government to 'privatise' the coal industry, the objective was to make the reduced coal industry attractive to outside speculation, and the future would be with around 100 profit-making pits, largely in the central coalfield of Britain; considers that the revelation vindicates the National Union of Mineworkers' reasons for their splendid defence of the mining industry and exposes the real reasons for Her Majesty's Government's desire to prolong the strike; and accordingly condemns any suggestion that the nation's coal industry assets should be sold off.]

The amendment calls for the privatisation of the coal industry. As the Secretary of State for Energy has now written to me saying that he has no plans to privatise the coal industry, may we be told whether the Government reject the views of their own Back Benchers or those of the Secretary of State?

Mr. Biffen: That is an issue that could profitably be tossed around during Question Time on Monday.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): The famine in Africa has been called the greatest disaster ever to afflict the globe. Will my right hon. Friend try to find time to debate both the issue itself and ways and means in which we can give additional help?

Mr. Biffen: I recognise the importance of that point, but no provision has been made for a debate in the near future. I hope that, in any case, my hon. Friend will try his own luck with such chances as may be offered by the Adjournment.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): As the Leader of the House is still using the Select Committee as an excuse for his failure to arrange a debate on the public expenditure White Paper, will he have a word with the Chairman of that Select Committee and ask him to hurry up?

Mr. Biffen: I will most happily draw the Chairman's attention to the hon. Gentleman's observations.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): When is it likely that we shall have a debate on the important subject of the north-south divide in this country, which is gradually manifesting itself more and more clearly in the public mind? Should we not be given an opportunity to discuss the matter?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend is a robust campaigner —and properly so—for the region and the constituency that he serves. Alas, however, Government time is at a premium, and I think that it will fall to my hon. Friend to find the occasion for such a debate.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Leader of the House reflect on his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) about the Secretary of State for Energy? May we be given an assurance that, on Monday, we will be given a definitive view by the Secretary of State for Energy — perhaps backed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer — on the question whether the exorbitant cost to the nation of the strike is still considered by the Government to be a worthwhile investment?

Mr. Biffen: I believe that Question Time on Monday will provide an opportunity for such questions, but I will buttress that reply by referring the hon. Gentleman's point to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Did my right hon. Friend have the good fortune to see the excellent inquiry into the need for safe riding hats that was conducted by the BBC programme "That's Life" on the past two Sundays? Is he aware of the enormous concern of those who ride, and of their understanding of the need for proper riding hats approved by the British Standards Institution? Will he ask the appropriate Minister to come to the House at an early date to make a statement to reassure the public and to answer questions with a view to banning unsatisfactory foreign imports?

Mr. Biffen: I think that my hon. Friend has in mind my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport as being responsible for such matters. I shall cheerfully pass my hon. Friend's message to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): The Leader of the House will remember that, last week, I raised with him the desperation of miners who are in a dispute that should never have been. The Government's policies have also driven the teachers to desperation. Strike action is imminent and a second front will be opened. May we have a debate on the problems facing teachers, especially on the miserable wages that they are given?

Mr. Biffen: Without going into the merits or otherwise of what the hon. Gentleman has said, may I remind him that, on Tuesday, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science will be top for questions. The hon. Gentleman might find that a useful opportunity to make his point.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): In view of the importance of the issues dealt with in the recent White Paper on financial services, does my right hon. Friend think that there is any chance of debating that White Paper in the reasonably near future?

Mr. Biffen: It is an important topic and I am aware that my hon. Friend is not alone in wanting a debate on it. However, I had better say at this stage that such a debate is not contained in the programme for the immediate future.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Although I welcome Wednesday's debate on rate capping, which no doubt gave the impetus to the Secretary of State for the Environment to admit the catastrophic errors that he has made in connection with rate capping for Leicester and other cities, surely the debate is far too short for such tremendously important issues for many cities. Will we not be sitting in on another edition of the funeral rites of local democracy?

Mr. Biffen: No; I do not think that it quite bears that interpretation. The hon. and learned Gentlemen will find that the debate is of reasonable length and on an important subject. It will be made that much more sharp and enjoyable if he makes a short speech.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call those hon. Members who have been rising in their places as they have had rather a rough time today in terms of the time element.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the Leader of the House aware that it would be intolerable if a senior civil servant who put his first duty and responsibility to the House of Commons were witch-hunted out of the Civil Service? Does he agree that it would be wise for the Government to bear in mind the events that troubled the United States which involved Richard Nixon? Perhaps the Leader of the House will ensure that a statement is made about Mr. Ponting's future. We should like such a statement quite separate from Monday's debate.

Mr. Biffen: I shall convey that comment to the appropriate Minister.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Has not the time come for a debate on the arts? [Interruption.] The Government's closing of one of our national theatres is no laughing matter. The crisis has been referred to, in the context of cuts in local authority expenditure, by the chairman of the Arts Council, the director of the National Gallery, the director of the British museum and now by the director of the National theatre. The award that has been given is about one third of the rate of inflation. The name of the play currently being performed in the Cottesloe theatre is "Doomsday", and it seems that the Government intend to bring that about for the arts. May we have a debate soon?

Mr. Biffen: I am afraid that I cannot promise the hon. Gentleman the debate for which he asks. I agree that this is an area of public affairs in which there is, albeit a minority——

Mr. Buchan: Come on.

Mr. Biffen: I am sorry, but the hon. Gentleman must be aware that the arts world is a valued but none the less elitist minority.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Has the Leader of the House noticed that there are now several all party early-day motions arising out of the report of the chief medical officer that 100,000 premature deaths are caused by cigarette smoking? The motions have been tabled by the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims), my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Mr. Roberts) and me. Will the right hon. Gentleman find time for the House to debate this matter before the Budget, with a view to taking some clear action to prevent those deaths?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman is a doughty campaigner on this issue, and on more than one front. However, any debate could more appropriately arise in private Members' time.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is the Leader of the House aware that his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) was utterly unsatisfactory as, although the Ponting case, which ended last Monday, has occasioned a statement to the House and a debate on Monday, two or three hours ago Mr. Ponting was told that no position is available for him in the Ministry of Defence? That should at least justify a statement from the Minister of State for the Armed Forces on how the dismissal took place.

Mr. Biffen: I am sorry that my previous answer did not satisfy the hon. Gentleman but alas, I must refer him to it.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): The Leader of the House is already aware of the Government's determination to restrict expenditure in the National Health Service. In the light of disclosures contained in last week's "TV Eye" programme, which highlighted the gross way in which certain consultants are manipulating and swindling the nation of fees that should be paid to the NHS, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is high time we had an early opportunity to explore that position further and to give the House a chance to express its opinion about it?

Mr. Biffen: I did not see the "TV Eye" programme to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. I can offer no prospect of any early debate during Government time. However, I shall refer his point to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Has the Leader of the House found time to consider the views of his hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw), who offered widely shared criticisms of the European Commission's record on providing food aid to the Sudan? Does he recall that his hon. Friend described that record as representing bureaucratic arthritis? Given the fact that the British public are becoming increasingly impatient about those problems, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that as a matter of urgency the House should have a debate about it?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman raises a point that is broadly similar to that raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack). This afternoon I must rest my reply to the hon. Gentleman on the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Gordon A. T. Bagier (Sunderland, South): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the north-east county council association understands that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is requesting a cut of 28 per cent. in the grant to the North of England Development Council? Will he ensure that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry comes to the House next week and makes a statement about it, especially in view of the tremendous unemployment problems in the region,, and the fact that this seems to be a cost-cutting exercise in an area that is already devastated by unemployment and cannot afford to lose that money?

Mr. Biffen: I understand clearly the economic factors that give rise to the hon. Gentleman's anxiety. I shall refer his argument to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will the right hon. Gentleman find time to rearrange next week's business so that the House can debate with him his problems as Leader of the House, which he discussed at the constitutional Conservative Back-Bench committee last night?

Mr. Biffen: Just as I do not watch much televison, I am a slow reader. I have yet to read any reports of that private meeting. If the hon. Gentleman can enlighten me, I shall do my best.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 364 about the military attack on the Molesworth peace camp?

[That this House expresses its utter disgust at the decision of the Secretary of State for Defence to mount a full-scale military operation against the Peace Camp at Molesworth; and believes that the stark contrast of barbed wire and troops — paving the way for United States nuclear missiles — with wheatfields for the starving people of Ethiopia, illustrates vividly the priorities of the Government; notes that this nocturnal attack is a further major escalation of the harassment and intimidation of Britain's mass movement against nuclear madness; and pledges its support to the continuing resistance to United States nuclear bases throughout Britain.]

In the light of that, the growing anxiety about telephone tapping, the possible destruction of the chapel at the camp, the road blocks, and the fact that the Ministry of Defence denied that a shooting took place at Greenham common on Tuesday night, despite the fact that a tape recording exists, which contains the internal communications of the base and demonstrates clearly that a serious shooting took place, may we have a statement, or preferably a debate, on what is happening at the American bases at Molesworth and Greenham common?

Mr. Biffen: I can offer no prospect of a debate in Government time—at least, not for some time. I shall refer the hon. Gentleman's points to the relevant Minister.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I thank the Leader of the House for the undertaking that he gave earlier this afternoon to consider the possibility of a debate in Government time on the recent report by the Commission for Racial Equality on immigration procedures. Will he ensure that the debate is held soon, that it is a whole day debate, and that it is not relegated to an obscure Friday?

Mr. Biffen: I know that the hon. Gentleman is trying to be helpful. My terminology referred to the "usual channels". I object to the concept of an obscure Friday. No Friday is obscure. It is valuable parliamentary time, and its status depends upon the use to which Members of Parliament put it.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Will the Leader of the House ensure that the Foreign Secretary comes here next week to explain his visit to Turkey this week where he said that he firmly supported the restoration of £400 million in EEC aid to that country despite the fact that other EEC countries say that that aid should be withheld until full democratic rights are restored in that country and despite the fact that Amnesty International briefed him on the fact that thousands of people are still being tortured in Turkish prisons and that those prisons hold thousands of political prisoners including trade unionists and peace protesters? Will the Leader of the House ask the Foreign Secretary to explain why the Government firmly support a country which continues to deny human rights to its citizens?

Mr. Biffen: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary will be in the House on Wednesday afternoon next week to answer questions. I have no doubt that the hon. Lady will then have an opportunity to make those points. In any case, I shall ensure that he is appraised of her comments beforehand.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Will the Leader of the House consider arranging an early debate on housing in view of the Government's 1985-86 HIP allocations which councils throughout the country of all political persuasions are saying will create major housing problems? The building employers are also saying that the Government's policies will result in a large increase in unemployment. A debate is needed on that important issue.

Mr. Biffen: I cannot offer any hope of an early debate in Government time. I am not sure to what extent the broad issue might be included in any comments on rate limitation. I shall of course draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to the points that have been made.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Is the Leader of the House aware that the Government's proposed cuts in social security payments for homeless people living in board and lodging hostels will mean that many of them have no money left for food? They will have to choose between a bed and food, between the streets and starvation? Is he not ashamed to be part of a Government who are creating a society in which some people sleep in a bedroom inside a house and others have to sleep outside under arches in cardboard boxes? Is it not time that we had a full debate on the problems of homeless people?

Mr. Biffen: No provision has been made for a debate upon the homeless. I recognise at once that it is a most important topic. The hon. Gentleman might consider the opportunities that are open to him as a private Member to pursue it.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Now that it is clear that the Prime Minister is running scared of coming to the Dispatch Box next Monday and has decided to appoint two Defence Ministers to run up the flag in a most disgraceful way, will the Leader of the House give the House an assurance that the Prime Minister will be in her place during the debate next Monday?

Mr. Biffen: I note what the hon. Gentleman says. I fancy that he is rattling his sabre to drown the knocking of his knees.

Coal Industry Dispute

4.3 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the cost of the current mining strike to the Central Electricity Generating Board, the level of coal stocks and the possible increase in electricity prices to consumers."

I believe that the matter is important in view of the leaked document that was broadcast to the nation at 7 pm yesterday by Channel 4 news that the estimated loss by the CEGB this year will be about £2 billion and that only £450 million of that can be accounted for by interest payments. Its estimate is that £1·8 billion is directly related to the current miners' dispute. I believe that the House should debate that issue in view of the statements made by the CEGB when giving evidence to the Select Committee and by Ministers on the Floor of the House. That issue alone should be debated.

The House should have the opportunity to debate the matter with the Minister responsible for the present level of coal stocks at power stations. I say that for two reasons. One is that we have never been able to get an up-to-date estimate of the level of coal stocks and the other is that in my constituency and the neighbouring one, yesterday, for the first time for 11 months, strike-bound coal that was mined before the dispute started has been moved by lorries that I suspect are non-trade union. There has also been a massive police presence in my communities once again. That presents problems for the communities.

Ministers have stood at the Dispatch Box over the past 11 months and told the House that there has been no need to move any of that strike-bound coal and that coal stock levels were adequate to provide electricity. We should be given a chance to debate that issue. The CEGB's estimated loss for the current year implies a rise of 20 per cent. to electricity consumers. It would be intolerable to make that increase in view of the fact that the Select Committee on Energy earlier last year made a report to the House saying that the Government had deliberately put up the price of electricity, and gas by the use of the gas levy, to tax energy.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has used electricity price increases as a means of raising revenue for the Estimates. He made a statement to the House that he felt that the cost of the strike was money well spent for the nation. Consumers might have a 20 per cent. increase in their bills. I believe that the matter should be debated urgently in the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the cost of the current mining strike to the Central Electricity Generating Board, the level of coal stocks and the possible increase in electricity prices to consumers."

I have listened with care to what the hon. Member has said but I regret that I do not consider the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

BILLS PRESENTED

Interception of Communications

Mr. Secretary Brittan, supported by the Prime Minister, Secretary Sir Geoffrey Howe, Mr. Secretary Younger, Mr. Secretary Hurd, and Mr. David Waddington, presented a Bill to make new provision for and in connection with the interception of communications sent by post or by means of public telecommunication systems and to amend section 45 of the Telecommunications Act 1984: And the same was read the first time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 83.]

Re-Acquisition of Public Assets

Mr. John Golding, supported by Mr. Jim Craigen, Mr. Reg Freeson, Mr. Gregor MacKenzie, Mr. Harry Ewing, Mr. Alexander Eadie, Mr. Martin O'Neill, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mr. Bernard Conlan, Mr. Frank Dobson, Mrs. Renée Short, and Mr. Sydney Bidwell, presented a Bill to take back into public ownership those assets privatised since May 1979: And the same was read the first time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 22 March and to be printed. [Bill 85.]

Reform of the House of Lords

Dr. John Marek presented a Bill to abolish the present composition of the House of Lords and to provide for a new membership based solely on an equal directly elected representation from all the regions of the United Kingdom: And the same was read the first time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 5 July and to be printed. [Bill 86.]

Control of Political Expenditure

Mr. Bernard Conlan, supported by Mr. Gordon A. T. Bagier, Mr. John Golding, Mr. Harry Cowans, and Mr. Hugh McCartney presented a Bill to control the amount of money spent by political parties during general elections; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the first time; and ordered to be read a Second time and to be printed. [Bill 84.]

Orders of the Day

Representation of the People Bill

Considered in Committee

[Progress 13 February].

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Clause 12

DEPOSIT BY CANDIDATES AT PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS

Amendment No. 51 proposed [13 February], in page 16, line 6, leave out '£1,000' and insert '£500'.—[Sir John Farr.]

The Chairman of Ways and Means: With this, we may take the following amendments: No. 70, in page 16, line 6, leave out '£1,000' and insert

'£500 or such amount as the Secretary of State may by order determine; no order shall be made under this section unless a draft of it has been laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament'.

No. 52, in page 16, line 9, leave out 'one twentieth' and insert 'one tenth'.

No. 85, in page 16, line 9, leave out 'one twentieth' and add 'three fortieths'.

New clause 7—Abolition of deposit and increase in number of nominations—

'(1) In Schedule 1 of the principal Act, paragraph 9 ("Deposit") shall cease to have effect;

(2) In paragraph 7(1) of Schedule 1 in the principal Act, for the word "eight" there shall be substituted "at least one hundred".'.

New clause 8—Nomination papers—

'In Schedule 1 to the principal Act paragraph 7(2) shall cease to have effect.'.

New clause 11—Exemption from deposit—

'In Schedule 1 to the Principal Act (Parliamentary elections rules) shall be added a new rule 1013

"(8A) A candidate shall be exempted from the requirement of depositing a sum with the returning officer provided that he is the nominated candidate of a registered political party as defined in the Schedule (Registered Political Parties)".'.

New clause 23—Conditions for nomination—

'Schedule 1 to the principal Act shall be amended by substituting for rules 9 and 53 the following rule—

"A nomination shall not be valid unless it is signed by 500 electors of the Division for which that nomination is made; the nomination shall remain valid notwithstanding a margin of error in the number of five per cent.; and any such nomination may be presented for checking by the returning officer during a period of six months prior to the date of a parliamentary election".'.

Amendment No. 65—new schedule—

'REGISTERED POLITICAL PARTIES

(1) The Secretary of State for the Home Department may, by order, establish a scheme for the registration of political parties. No condition of eligibility shall attach to such a scheme, except that a registration fee, prescribed by the Secretary of State shall be payable.

(2) Any party so registered shall be a registered political party for the purposes of this Act.

(3) No political party will have to register to be able to participate in an election. Political parties not wishing to register will be able to continue to field candidates by the method otherwise prescribed in the principal Act.'.

4·9 pm

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The reasons for an election deposit were outlined by the Home Secretary yesterday. I cannot see any objection to a deposit, but, at the same time, I am not over-enthusiastic about such a large increase from £150 to £1,000. I take the point that the equivalent of the 1918 £150 would be in the region of £2,000; nevertheless, a jump from £150 to £1,000 in one go is unnecessary. I think that the point has been established.

It is important in these matters, which are not dealt with frequently in Committee, for obvious reasons, that we should try so far as possible to reach a consensus. The idea of the collection of a certain number of signatures has some support on the Government Benches, but I do not believe that that would be an adequate substitute for a deposit. It would be easy in some circumstances to collect signatures. As the Select Committee rightly said, the getting of signatures would be an easy step for certain candidates whose interest in the democratic system can be questioned. There are merchants of racial hatred involved in standing for election. Such people know full well how, in certain circumstances, at sensitive moments, it is possible to collect signatures by making the point that people do not have to vote for the person concerned, but that he merely wants to stand as a candidate and should not be denied that right.

I am not concerned about the frivolous candidate. I accept the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) on Second Reading that there is little evidence that frivolous candidates cause any harm to the democratic system. I do not mind whether Lord Sutch or Lord Double Sutch stands as a candidate. Indeed, it can be argued that such candidates bring a certain amount of gaiety to the hustings—more so at by-elections, for obvious reasons. Like my right hon. Friend, I see no argument that having a large number of these candidates, as there were in the Chesterfield by-election, does any harm to the democratic process. If harm is done, let us see the evidence. Those candidates do not cause me sleepless nights.

I am concerned about candidates whose motive in standing, particularly at by-elections, but sometimes at general elections, is race hatred. They do not bring any gaiety to the hustings or to any other feature of national life.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that class hatred would be equally obnoxious? If he is moving in the direction of taking a stance on what he is calling race hatred—I hope he will expand on it if he is to give it any meaning—would he bring into the category people on the extreme Left generally who make class hatred one of their main platforms and who seek to divide society in the same way?

Mr. Winnick: Not surprisingly, I anticipated such an intervention. If the hon. Gentleman puts his question seriously, I will answer it.

Mr. Forth: It was.

Mr. Winnick: If the hon. Gentleman wants an answer, I shall be only too pleased to give him one. If he was just making an intervention for the sake of it, I shall not waste my time. He may not be satisfied with the answer. It can be said in regard to class hatred that the Government need no lessons from anybody, not only on the promotion of class hatred, but on carrying out policies which cause the maximum difficulty to working people through mass unemployment.

I would have no objection to any party to the right of the Conservative party, which I suppose is possible, which was not concerned with matters of race hatred, putting forward an extremely Right-wing point of view. I would not say that that is necessarily an obstacle to, or a difficulty for, the democratic system. I shall try to answer the hon. Gentleman by saying that it is the same with candidates on the ultra-Left, if I may use that term. I know that I may not carry the hon. Gentleman with me, but this is my reasoning. The difference is that the candidates on the ultra-Right, such as the National Front, are concerned with trying to stir up as much hatred, suspicion and xenophobia against ethnic minorities——

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has not noticed that the revised selection list includes new clause 29, which deals specifically with the matter on which he is touching and which seems unrelated to the amendments that are before the Committee. It might be in the best interests of the Committee to wait until then to raise these matters.

4.15 pm

Mr. Winnick: I am pleased that new clause 29 has been selected for debate, but the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) asked me a question which I was trying to answer. If I may say so, it is related to the reasons why I believe that a deposit, and not simply a collection of signatures, is necessary. I think that I have answered the hon. Gentleman. We shall see later whether he has been persuaded by what I have said.

Referring again to the candidates of race hatred, to save their deposit is a sign for them, though not in our eyes or in the view of the community, that they have achieved electoral credibility. They can say that they have saved their deposits in so many constituencies. This is why I make the same point to the Minister as I made yesterday during the Home Secretary's speech.

I favour a more modest increase in the deposit. I accept that there should be some increase. It might have been increased to £250 or £300, with the retention of a threshold of 12·5 per cent. of the total votes cast, as now, or a threshold of 10 per cent. I should have thought that that would achieve a wider consensus in Committee than what is proposed. That is why I argued that point of view in the appropriate place, but at the end of the day one has to accept the position outlined by the Home Secretary yesterday.

I do not want to exaggerate the danger of the National Front. It would be wrong to do so. Fortunately, our society is sufficiently mature not to support candidates who clearly stand for election, in the same way as the Mosley movement stood in elections before the second world war, to stir up as much racial trouble, strife and hatred as they can although they try, usually unsuccessfully, to keep within the law. By and large the latter-day movement, like the pre-war movement, has hardly got off the ground.

Although I do not have the figures for the last election, in the 1979 contest the National Front obtained more than 5 per cent. of the votes though, fortunately, only in five constituencies. The very fact that it was able to get that amount of electoral support, limited and modest as it was, gives rise to anxiety among people like me who believe that a 5 per cent. threshold is too low. I know that the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) does not agree with me because, if I may say so, he is a kind of fanatic for the collection of signatures as a substitute for a deposit. Clearly I shall not carry him with me. There is a divide in the Committee, and why not?

Mr. William Powell (Corby): The hon. Gentleman says that he accepts the need for an increase in the deposit. He wants a rather more modest increase. Can he explain to the Committee why any increase in the deposit is necessary?

Mr. Winnick: With respect, the hon. Gentleman should direct that question more to his own Front Bench. Ministers were concerned that there should be an increase. I do not usually like to be associated with Ministers in argument, but fairness demands it. The Select Committee looked into those matters and recommended the figure of £1,000. Obviously, the hon. Gentleman is aware of that. As I have already prayed in aid the Select Committee, perhaps I could also pray in aid the fact it recommended a threshold of 7·5 per cent. An amendment along those lines is being taken with this group. In my view, it would be better to have a threshold of 7·5 per cent. I imagine the Committee will agree that the deposit should be £500. However, perhaps the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West will divide the Committee on that. We shall wait and see.

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West) indicated dissent.

Mr. Winnick: I see that the hon. Gentleman will not do so, as he is shaking his head.

I hope that on Report the Home Secretary will consider the possibility of increasing the threshold from the proposed 5 per cent. to 7·5 per cent. That would serve the democratic process better. I stress that I speak for myself on those issues.

It would be difficult to change the threshold and deposit on a later occasion. We all know that they were established way back in 1918. If there were a change in the electoral climate, which I do not expect for one moment, or if there were a danger, as we have seen in France, of a Fascist revival, it would be difficult to change the law, because the people to whom I have been referring would say that the law was being changed purely and simply because of them. These matters should be considered in a proper way, bearing in mind that we are not likely to deal again with the issue of the deposit or threshold for a long time to come. Those are the reasons why amendment No. 85 should be given sympathetic consideration.

I agree with those who argue that standing for Parliament is first and foremost a serious business. There are advantages to be gained, as was stated last night. Candidates receive about £800 worth of free postage, and there is publicity. Other advantages are given—in my view rightly so—to a candidate. That is why I feel that it is right and proper that, unlike in local elections where those facilities are not given, there should be a deposit. If we cannot retain the present deposit and threshold, we should try to reach a consensus. Presumably we have done so on the basis of what the Home Secretary said last night.

Before we come to a final conclusion on Report and Third Reading, if I may say so with due modesty, we should bear in mind some of the points that I have raised. At the end of the day we are concerned with preserving our democratic system, with all its faults—and no doubt there are many. Living in any dictatorship, Left or Right —[Interruption.]—though my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) and I may disagree about whether it is really Left—is a nightmare. We have the virtue of living in a democracy, and long may it remain so. Part of our job is to try to ensure that the manner in which we go about our business, laying down rules and regulations for standing at elections and so on, is such that we can say that we, as a House of Commons, are making our own contribution to ensuring that our democratic system survives and is in safe hands, and does not give an opportunity to those whose main motive is——

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I cannot for the life of me understand why my hon. Friend should introduce me in a debate about what is Left and what is not. The point that I was making under my breath was that one can say that a candidate gets advantages, but if he does not have the organisation behind him, all the free postage in the world does not mean a damned thing. There is not much of an advantage unless one has support.

Mr. Winnick: I was praying in aid my hon. Friend because I thought that he would agree with me. I did not want to cause controversy between the two of us. When the Liberals and the smaller parties argue about how difficult the obstacles are, let us bear in mind how our party came into existence. We did not have the aid of television, press coverage or much sympathy, yet despite all the difficulties, within 24 years, fortunately, we became one of the two main parties in the state. I know that my hon. Friend agrees with me that we shall remain one of the two main parties in the state.

Mr. Parris: What the hon. Gentleman's party did have were the combined financial resources of the trade union movement to draw upon for putting up parliamentary deposits.

Mr. Winnick: In the beginning the amount of trade union support that we had was minimal. At any time the amount of financial support that we get from the trade unions is a trifle compared with the contributions which the Conservative party gets from big business and other such interests.

In conclusion, I believe that we should be careful about how we set the threshold and the deposit, bearing in mind that we should not do anything that undermines our parliamentary and democratic system.

Mr. Parris: One would think from listening to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) that the way to decide these matters was to survey the range of political parties likely to stand, decide which ones were the most offensive to oneself and set the level of the threshold at such a point that those parties would be most severely penalised financially. The hon. Gentleman has fallen into the trap of using the very argument that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary studiously avoided last night. That argument will be seized upon by parties such as the National Front against what the Government are now proposing.

Parties such as the National Front will say that this is a measure to obstruct democracy and prevent parties like it from even standing. As they cannot afford to stand they will feel that they have a moral right to take to the streets or indulge in extra-parliamentary action instead. If I had listened to the hon. Gentleman in the frame of mind in which such parties will listen to him, I might have felt some moral authority for such a response. That response would be wrong and dangerous, and we should do nothing to encourage it. My concern is that the measure might encourage it.

I should like to speak to my new clause 11 and the associated amendment No. 65, which is a new schedule. I do not ask hon. Members to weary themselves going through my wording in any detail. It is sure to be technically defective. It may even be the wrong way of going about what I seek to achieve. I should like to outline my aims and ask my hon. Friend the Minister to reply.

I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary for the concession that he announced last night reducing the deposit from £1,000 to £500. I do not wish to be churlish about that; it is a major improvement. My concern is for the devastating effect that the loss of all those deposits would have on a small party that wishes to field a respectable number of candidates at a general election and wishes to say that it is at least fielding enough candidates to have a chance, should it receive sufficient support, of forming an important part of the Parliament that follows the election. There would be a devastating effect if that party failed to get the 5 per cent. of votes that it needs to retain its deposit. For instance, I reckon that if the Ecology party decided to field a candidate in every constituency at a general election to show that it was a major national party, it would probably lose the deposits for all 650 candidates, which would come to about £325,000. I doubt whether a small party such as that could afford to risk such a loss at a general election.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): My hon. Friend is a fair man. He will appreciate that in many elections, particularly by-elections, candidates are not nominated candidates of a registered political party but stand as individuals promoting an individual philosophy. Is not my hon. Friend's proposal likely to give to the nominated candidate a more favourable status than that accorded to the non-nominated candidate?

4.30 pm

Mr. Parris: Yes, it is. For that reason my proposals are not perfect. They come to the assistance of a certain class of candidate without necessarily coming to the assistance of every candidate whom I would wish to help. I cannot imagine any system of parliamentary deposits which would assist every worthy candidate or which may not in some circumstances punish a worthy candidate.

Mr. Winnick: I may be doing the hon. Gentleman an injustice, but I am not aware that he campaigned against deposits before the Bill became an issue. After all, deposits for standing at an election have been around for many years. If I am wrong, obviously the hon. Gentleman will tell me. If it is such a great issue with him, why did not he campaign before?

The hon. Gentleman said that I was giving assistance, so to speak, to racialist organisations. Will he bear in mind that legislation passed by both Labour and Conservative Governments in the past 15 or 20 years has been directed at race hate organisations. There has been legislation against incitement to race hatred and there is no doubt about who it was directed at. Action was taken before the war to prevent people from wearing paramilitary uniform. Again there can be no question who were to be the victims of such a law. The hon. Gentleman should bear those points in mind.

Mr. Parris: I do bear them in mind. As long as such laws exist, and they do and should, and so long as political parties are prepared to keep within the law, and they do and they must on pain of prosecution, they should be allowed to field candidates at elections.

Mr. Winnick: I am not saying that they should not.

Mr. Parris: Good. The hon. Gentleman is not saying that they should not; he is just saying that he would like to set the threshold and the deposit at such a level that it is difficult or impossible for them to do so.

The deposit was, I think, introduced in 1918. I was unable to campaign against it at that time and so was the hon. Gentleman. I have never thought that the deposit was a fair test of a candidate's seriousness. The larger the deposit is, the less fair the test. Therefore, the proposal to increase it to £1,000 makes the injustice a more pressing one and I said so on Second Reading.

I seek to set up a scheme whereby a political party can limit its liability to loss of deposit at a general election. I propose a voluntary scheme whereby a political party may register as a political party. The registration would serve no purpose and give it no privileges, immunities or benefits of any kind, other than the benefit which will flow in relation to the parliamentary deposit. There will be no test of whether a party may or may not register other than its preparedness to pay the registration fee. The registration fee should be set at a level which discourages any but the serious parties from wishing to register—£5,000, £10,000, £15,000 or perhaps £20,000.

The registration would, in essence, be a tendered group parliamentary deposit. Having paid that registration fee, the party would then be able to field as many candidates as it liked without paying any further deposit for those candidates and without risking the loss of further deposits. For example, if the Ecology party or the National Front could collect the money necessary to register, it could field candidates in every constituency at a general election.

The payment of that fee would be a serious test of a party's interest in a general election. No frivolous party or candidate would be able to stand. At the same time there would be a limit to the amount that a party could lose by standing at a general election and it would not be open to a party to say that, although it had support in the country, it had been prevented from fielding candidates by the system of parliamentary deposits.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My hon. Friend has had a most ingenious idea, but will he consider one drawback? He is talking about a registration fee which he suggests is a sort of collective deposit. However, I think that he will agree that the registration fee would probably not be fixed by statute, whether primary or secondary legislation. If that is right, who will set the registration fee? Assuming that it is done under the diktat of Government, what is to stop the Government, by some form of authority of their own, increasing the registration fee to such a level as to serve as a deterrent?

Mr. Parris: I envisage that the fee would be set by order. Even if one were to assume that orders passed through the House without receiving the parliamentary attention they deserve, it would, as my hon. Friend says, be within the power of any Government to make it impossible for a small political party to register as a political party. That would not make it impossible to field candidates by payment of the ordinary deposit. I am not suggesting that we abolish the £500 deposit. That will stay within the power of any candidate. That will be an additional benefit to a registered political party. So long as the matter is treated in good faith by the Government of the day, it will be a helpful benefit.

There has been argument about whether the threshold should be 5 per cent., 7·5 per cent., 10 per cent., 12·5 per cent. or whatever. Five per cent. is better than 10 per cent. Nevertheless, any party must start from zero. A party is likely to start with a level of public support which would not give it even 5 per cent. of the votes cast in a general election across the constituencies in which it fields candidates. Therefore, it does not particularly matter whether the party is blighted at 2, 5, 7 or 10 per cent. Any threshold which makes it impossible for a small party which is just starting up to field a credible number of candidates in a general election is a serious disincentive to small parties. Our first-past-the-post system is already a serious disincentive to small parties and we need not add to it through our system of deposits.

Mr. Winnick: What about the Labour party?

Mr. Parris: It is said that the parliamentary deposit was introduced in 1918 as a result of a deal cobbled up between the Whigs and the Tories to prevent the emerging Labour party from emerging any further. I believe that the amount was a working man's wage in a year. If that was so, the deal failed. It failed because the Labour party had the organised trade union movement to draw on, not only for parliamentary deposits but for the 10 or 12·5 per cent. of votes that it needed in every constituency.

A small party can start up despite a crippling parliamentary deposit if it starts up on the back of an existing national institution or organisation such as the trade union movement, or, perhaps, the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. It is much more difficult for a party such as the Ecology party, or, indeed, for the Liberal party at one time. I imagine that that party would have been crippled by the proposals had they been in force between the 1950s and the early 1970s.

My scheme may not be perfect—I am sure that it is not—but I want to see a system that does not stifle small political parties at birth. We are strong enough to tolerate the existence of such parties and to stand against them in general elections. We should not rule them out at the first post.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Let me take the opportunity to welcome the Government's movement away from the original proposal and thank them for having responded to recommendations and represenations that were made to them earlier. I represent a party that has a vested interest. We have far too many lost deposits, and a deposit of £1,000 would have been a real deterrent to standing at elections.

It is in the interests of democracy in Wales—whether or not people in Wales agree with our policies—and indeed in other parts of the United Kingdom that those who have a coherent view to put forward in a democratic way, or any view for that matter, should have an opportunity to stand at elections. That should be part of the system.

I appreciate the dangers in some areas, where there has been racial tension arising from the activities of the National Front, but I prefer to have a system in which any party has to stand up and be counted and be shown to be as small as it is, rather than to masquerade under the pretence that it has a greater following by virtue of the fact that it is not standing for election and has an excuse for not so standing.

I want a system that allows the maximum participation, and the £500 and 5 per cent. is not unreasonable compared with the position in the past. Obviously, anyone who has to fork out a deposit for an election and is in danger of losing it would rather have no deposit at all.

I incline towards having a number of names attached to the nomination rather than a means test of any sort. I can see the danger that some people would nominate just to allow somebody to stand, without any intention of giving him support. It may be that the vote of the person who nominates should, by virtue of the fact that he has nominated, be deemed to be cast in that process. Alternatively, it may be that a smaller number than the 100 which has been mentioned should be required to be present at the registration office, so that it takes a bit of effort and is not just a matter of signing a piece of paper so that whoever is on the doorstep goes away as quickly as possible. That is one possibility if we are to consider having names instead of a financial disincentive.

There is the real problem, which has been mentioned by Liberal Members, of having large sums of money tied up. That problem will still arise from this formula. With 38 seats in Wales, at £500 a time, £19,000 would be tied up in deposits. That is a lot of money, and it is money that is needed to fight the election. Over the whole of the United Kingdom it would be that much more.

The position of the Ecology party should, I think, command a certain degree of sympathy and support within the Committee. That party has a valid viewpoint to put forward, and it should be facilitated in the democratic process. If the Ecology party were to put up candidates for 600-odd seats, that would cost £300,000, which would be totally unrealistic.

Having agreed so far with the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris), I wish to turn for a moment to the new clause and the amendment. I recoil from the idea of registration of political parties, because that has a flavour of going towards a corporate approach to our politics. I do not like the idea put forward in amendment No. 65 of a registration fee prescribed by the Secretary of State, because there would be a real danger of that being increased as time goes on. The idea appears to be a sort of discount system for those who intend to fight on a wide scale. A deposit of £20,000, for a party such as Plaid Cymru, which wishes to fight only 38 seats out of 600, is unrealistic. I do not see any merit in that, although I recognise the problem.

It would appear that, for some months, we have been moving towards a compromise. The proposals are not ideal as far as we are concerned. We would rather not see finance coming into it, but, to the extent that finance is going to come into it, we thank the Government for having put forward a compromise that goes some way towards meeting the problem.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I wish to speak briefly to amendment No. 70, which stands in my name. Essentially, it has two points. It suggests that the deposit be fixed at £500 and that Parliament should have the power to raise that sum by affirmative resolution.

I was pleased to hear my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary meeting the views of the Committee by decreasing the proposed £1,000 to £500. That is a very useful concession. I feel sure that most hon. Members will applaud his decision on that matter. The reason is clear. This is a constitutional issue of considerable importance, and I think it desirable that it should receive as widespread support as possible. At £1,000, it did not seem to me that general support was likely to be forthcoming. Therefore, I think that my right hon. and learned Friend deserves the thanks of the Committee.

My second point relates to the proposal that it should be possible to raise the deposit by affirmative resolution. The chance of primary legislation on these matters coming before the House of Commons in the near future is remote. I hope to be in this place for many years—20 or 30 years is the minimum that we should consider for my presence here—but I should be rather surprised——

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): That remark can only be aimed at hon. Members behind the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg)—the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) and others.

4.45 pm

Mr. Hogg: The Conservative party does not stab its members in the back. The hon. Gentleman is confusing the two sides of the Committee.

I am making a serious point. It is unlikely that we shall see primary legislation dealing with this issue in, say, the next 10 or 20 years. Yet, however good the Government's economic policy may be, I shall be surprised if we see no inflation in that period. In the course of time the value of the deposit will decrease substantially in real terms and we shall be facing the same kind of problem as we are facing now, with a deposit of no value. That being so, I should like Parliament to have the power to increase the deposit without recourse to primary legislation.

I am as aware as any hon. Member of the defects of orders. I recognise that they are unamendable and that, with the Government's majority today, it is difficult to defeat them. Therefore, there are criticisms to be made of making important changes by way of orders. But I hope that the Committee has sufficient confidence in the affirmative resolution procedure to give the Government the power that I have in mind. If we do not do something along those lines, we shall again have meaningless deposits in, say, 15 years' time.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): The deposit is a [illegible] important way of demonstrating that one wishes to [illegible] a general election or a by-election. I particularly welcomed the concession made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary late last night when he announced the reduction from £1,000 to £500.

In amendment No. 99, standing in my name, I had called for it to be further reduced to £250, and I very much wish that it could have been that way, because no one should be deterred from standing. It is a great honour, it costs something to stand, it is not free, and £250, a much higher threshold and a larger number of assenters would make much sense.

The most important point and the reason why the question of deposits is suddenly very much on the agenda is that in the general election of 1983 2,578 candidates were validly nominated, working out at 3·9 candidates per seat, of whom 679 were from other minor parties or independents. Excluding those who belonged to the Ecology party and other such parties, there were 474 true independents devoid of any known political party. In comparison, in 1979 there were 2,576 candidates standing, working out at 4·1 candidates per seat, with 754 independents or candidates with other non-party definitions. The votes cast for those independents and others amounted in 1983 to over 1·6 million—slightly down on 1979, when the figure was 1,677,417.

The real problem, however, is in by-elections, when one sees the deposit issue, the problems and the abuse by so many people standing for the most strange reasons. The opportunity might be used to promote the cause of a person in prison or as a public relations exercise to promote the sale of vodka. In Chesterfield, 17 candidates stood—some of them mad, including the one who was elected. [Interruption.] There was even a Monster Raving Loony candidate, so that makes at least two.

In 1979, 156 candidates in by-elections lost their deposits. Candidates stood for ridiculous and frivolous causes—Reclassify the Sun, Fourwheel Drive, Yoga, Elvis Presley, Soon to be Unemployed and an Official Loony. There is clearly a need to deter such frivolous candidates. Reluctantly, I concede that a £500 deposit is acceptable, but we must consider how many candidates have lost their deposits in the past. In the 1983 general election, 739 candidates lost their deposits — five Conservatives, 119 Labour, five Liberal, six SDP, 54 British National Party, 35 Communist, 108 Ecology party, 60 National Front, 32 Plaid Cymru, 53 Scottish National party, 21 Workers Revolutionary party and 241 others. In other words, a large number of strange candidates lost their deposits and were not elected.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Some strange candidates certainly were elected.

Mr. Bruinvels: I am pleased to see that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is now present. He said yesterday that it would be easy to get 500 people to sign an assentors list. I disagree, although I know that some people will sign anything that is put before them. My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) and I have put down new clause 23, which provides:

"A nomination shall not be valid unless it is signed by 500 electors of the Division for which that nomination is made; the nomination shall remain valid notwithstanding a margin of error in the number of five per cent."

That seems a sensible way to show that the candidate is not frivolous. Some candidates of that type have obtained more than 500 votes in recent by-elections, so the nominators clearly meant what they said. In Enfield, the Turkish Troops out of Cyprus candidate polled 687 votes. In Cynon Valley the Communist candidate polled 642 votes and an Independent in Chesterfield gained 1,355 votes. Clearly, those who nominated the candidates genuinely wished them to stand.

Mr. Wigley: The difficulty is that the candidate does not know where the 687 supporters are in Enfield, so 500 signatures still seems too many. Rather than just signing a paper, nominators should have to show that their support is solid, perhaps by going to the registration office. In those circumstances, 100 would seem a more reasonable number.

Mr. Bruinvels: I am not convinced that 100 is sufficient, although I take the point that one does not always know who one's supporters are. I believe that a requirement for 500 signatures will discourage recklessness and frivolity. One hopes that the 500 voters will then put their money and their vote where their mouth is.

I wish genuine candidates to be able to stand and not to be deterred by a high deposit. If new clause 23 is accepted nominations will be properly handled, but we do not want difficulties caused by complicated procedures for signing. I hope that, whatever the Committee decision, clear guidance will be given as to the way in which the nomination form should be signed. Even in my own case, one of the 30 assentors did not sign properly. Time is often of the essence, so clear guidance is important.

Amendment No. 52 deals with the number of votes needed to save the deposit. I believe that the 10 per cent. threshold suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) and myself is reasonable. In the light of the number of candidates who did not lose their deposits, if we are tightening up the rules and preventing some candidates from standing, the rest should still be able to stand. In 1983 there were 2,578 candidates. I want the democratic process to survive and to grow. I want real candidates to be able to stand for real constituencies. Therefore, although I am disappointed that my amendment No. 99 did not find favour, I support the Government's proposal for a £500 deposit.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): I wish to speak to new clause 23 and to develop the theme so eloquently introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels). The new clause proposes that a nomination form should be signed by 500 electors, and I wish to deal with the practical aspects of that.

First, I should make it clear that the proposal is based not on some quirk of my own but on considerable study of other legislatures. Our proposal is in sympathy with practice in other democracies, whereas the current procedure is not.

For instance, nominations to the Belgian Chamber of Representatives must be supported by 200 to 500 electors, depending on the size of the constituency. For the Belgian Senate, directly elected Senators must be supported by 100 electors. There are no deposit requirements for either House.

In Denmark, between 25 and 50 signatures are required for nomination. Again, no deposit is required.

In West Germany, nominations for candidates for the Bundestag must be signed by 200 electors entitled to vote in the constituency concerned. In the Land party lists, parties not previously represented by at least five members but recognised as political parties—this has been a major theme in speeches from all parts of the Committee in this debate—must have nominations signed by one elector per thousand entitled to vote in the previous general election up to a maximum of 2,000. Again, no deposit is required.

[Mr. Conal Gregory]

In Italy, between 351 and 700 signatures are required for nomination to either House, depending on the size of the constituency. Again, no deposit is required.

In Canada, at least 25 supporting signatures of electors in each constituency are required for nomination to the House of Commons. A deposit of 200 Canadian dollars is required.

Finally, although I could spend a long time citing other legislatures that support my argument, in the Netherlands candidates in each electoral district for both Chambers must be supported by a minimum of 25 electors.

5 pm

One can see, therefore, that requirement for support on a far wider basis than the United Kingdom nomination paper, with its simple procedure of proposer, seconder and eight subscribing electors, is in use. A cash sum is not a bar to publicists who are not genuine. I believe that it is a real disincentive to truly democratic candidates who should have the right to stand. I therefore favour removing the outdated £150 deposit and replacing it with a nomination roll of 500 electors. Such rolls could, as now unofficially, be submitted in advance to the acting returning officer to be checked for any errors.

I deal now with the practical problems that right hon. and hon. Members may raise. There is no problem of verification elsewhere, and I do not believe that our local government staff are any less efficient than others. I therefore allow the period in the proposed new clause of six months for any political agent to offer a list for verification with the provision of a further six months. To overcome the difficulty that would arise if anybody should move away from a constituency or to a higher place—in which case, I understand, such a person does not participate in our elections — I have introduced a provision for a margin of error of up to 5 per cent.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East rightly referred to some of the absurdities who tried to stand for Parliament in the Chesterfield by-election. One accepts that aspect of British eccentricity, but it hardly endears itself to serious candidature for the House of Commons.

In my view, we should consider five principles. The first is the argument that might have been suggested—although I am sure that in his wisdom the Minister will not do so—that the electoral system is being damaged by an increasing number of candidates standing at parliamentary elections. In that connection, I refer to the evidence submitted by the Home Office to the Select Committee on Home Affairs inquiry into electoral law and procedure in 1983, that there was "little evidence of serious abuse of electoral privileges by candidates who do not come from the main political parties."

Secondly, there is the argument that an increase in the parliamentary deposit would deter frivolous candidates. The Committee should be mindful that at the general election a number of companies and trade bodies considered putting up 650 parliamentary candidates purely for the purposes of publicity and free literature. A bar of £150, or £500, would be no disincentive. Furthermore, such candidates bodies might be looking to the possibility of obtaining television time, and so on. Such abuse will not be dealt with under the present system. Under the proposed new clause, the requirement of 500 assentors or electors will overcome this difficulty. The genuine Conservative in south Wales or the Left-wing candidate who would like to put up on the sunny south coast where prosperity under the Conservatives prevails will thus be entitled to that democratic right, as will the various ethnic and Celtic interests which may wish to be represented in a wider way in the House of Commons.

Thirdly, it has been suggested that there is no reasonable alternative to raising the deposit. The advantage of my proposed alternative is that it demands political commitment from the prospective candidate. If we go down the road of increased deposits, we will be putting a bar on genuine parliamentary candidates who are not able to afford, out of their own pockets, to stand for Parliament.

Fourthly, it has been argued on occasion that 100 signatures, or, as I have suggested, 500 signatures, would create problems for the electoral returning officer. I have overcome that difficulty by suggesting that political agents can submit these for verification up to six months before a general election. To counter the argument about the uncertainty of the date of a general election, when somebody is of the view that a general election is likely, he could submit a list and continue to do so on a six-monthly cycle, with an allowance for a margin of error of 5 per cent.

Finally, the argument has been advanced that £500 is not much to raise for a parliamentary deposit. I believe that all political parties will be faced with the problem of having to put up front significant sums of money to contest elections. If the deposit is increased, the smaller parties, or those which wish to demonstrate a serious intention, will be in difficulties. The answer to all the problems that have been raised are in the proposed new clause.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): Having listened to my hon. Friends the Members for York (Mr. Gregory) and for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), I think that one major disadvantage arises. If there is a requirement for that number of signatures to support a candidate, this will be prejudicial to a candidate who is adopted at short notice. Will not such a candidate be kept out of the competition altogether?

Mr. Gregory: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. I do not regard that as a problem. If a candidate has the foresight to consider the matter beforehand, he has the relevant period of time in which to obtain the signatures. The vast majority of political parties select their candidates, many months—indeed, years—beforehand. Even the fringe parties have that in mind. The suggestion seems to be that some of the loony candidates, deciding that they have a spare £150—or, as it will be, £500—rather than put that money on a horse race will invest it in a forthcoming general election or by-election. How otherwise could Mr. Piccaro have put up as the Official Acne Candidate, or, indeed, the candidates who stood for "Reclassify Sun Newspaper" or "Chesterfield in Thame"? The serious contender to the mother of Parliaments will have considered this before the calling of a general election or by-election and will have prepared the ground beforehand. I believe that the local government objections will be overcome.

On those grounds, I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to accept the clause and not to prevaricate. This is not something new that I have thrust upon him, because I have been in correspondence with his Department for approximately a year and a quarter. During that time he will have had an opportunity to compare our system with that of other legislatures, he will wish to bring Britain into line with them, he will appreciate the flexibility that I propose in the suggested 5 per cent. and six months, and, in his wisdom, he will want to accept the clause.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): I have taken time out from the Committee that is considering the Local Government Bill. I apologise to this Committee for the fact that I may have to leave the Chamber after I have spoken to make a further contribution to the consideration of the Local Government Bill by my physical presence, if nothing else.

I wish to raise a matter that arises on new schedule 65. In my view, there is a growing problem with regard to the masquerading of political parties. Such a masquerade occurred recently in Birmingham. A council faced a problem in the council elections in the Erdington district when a disappointed Conservative candidate stood as a Conservative candidate against the official Conservative candidate. The impersonation of the political party extended to the distribution of almost identical literature. This resulted in confusion among the electorate, who mistakenly voted for the wrong candidate. Had the 350-odd votes mistakenly cast gone to the official Conservative candidate, he would have won the seat. It was not a problem of losing the seat. The problem was that confusion was sewn in the minds of the electorate. Following the election, we questioned many people in that community and found that they genuinely did not know who was the real Conservative candidate because they had been confused by the literature that has been disseminated among the electorate. That is wrong as an electoral practice.

It is a growing problem, not only with our party, but with the Labour and Liberal parties. People stand as Independent Labour candidates, Official Labour candidates, Independent Conservative candidates and so on. We need to control the image—the brand name—of the respected political parties. Electoral policy has been not to accept any organised political party. Each candidate stands as an individual, although as often as not he may have a party label attached to him. However, a problem arises in the situation which I have described. The addition of the new schedule—although I understand that it is not meant in quite the way that I interpret it, but nevertheless it fits my proposal admirably—together with my small amendment would adequately cover the problem of literature being disseminated among the electorate purporting to be from a political party, when in fact it is not that party's official literature.

I see no reason why political parties should not register as genuine, bona fide political parties, provided that it does not stop others from organising a political party and putting up candidates at an election should they so wish. At least my proposal would control the labels that we use and would avoid confusing the electorate.

I hope that earnest consideration will be given to the proposal. The problem has occured in Birmingham and will happen elsewhere, as I know from the many representations made to Birmingham from other parts of the country. The simple addition of this schedule, with my amendment, would adequately overcome what I believe to be a growing problem.

Mr. Forth: I apologise to the Committee for my brief absence a moment ago. I was necessarily speaking to a group of my constituents who have honoured us with their presence today. I hope the Committee will accept that as a legitimate reason for my brief absence.

We are discussing two principal matters. One is whether we believe that it is desirable to seek to reduce the number of candidates who stand at elections, and the other, what, if we did so decide, would be the best method to do so. Several colleagues have already mentioned specific examples of elections where a large number of candidates have stood. I want to tell the Committee of my favourite, because it illustrates the point extremely well.

At one by-election, one candidate was called Mr. Tarquin-Fintim-Linbinwhin-Binlim-Bus Ole Biscuit Barrel F. Tang. He described himself as the candidate for the Cambridge University Raving Loony Society, and obtained 223 votes. We can draw two different conclusions from that. One is that such candidates bring elections into disrepute and that we should seek to discourage them; the other is that is such a candidate can attract 223 votes, the electorate get the candidate and the politician that they deserve. That is a specific example of a candidate standing in a frivolous manner, offering himself for election with no serious intent. He was obviously well able to afford the £150 deposit.

We must consider whether we should seek to reduce the number of candidates. The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) set the matter in a different context when he referred to parties of the extreme Right offering themselves to the electorate on some sort of racist platform. He failed to condemn, or to draw attention to, the parties of the extreme Left which offer themselves to the electorate on platforms of class hatred and divisiveness, and which on many occasions preach revolution or even violence.

5.15 pm

We must consider whether it is our job or duty to seek to deny the opportunity to such small and fringe parties —to say nothing of self-described loony parties—to offer themselves to the electorate. That first question leads on to our second consideration. If we wish to make a reduction in the number of candidates, what would be the best method of doing so? Two possibilities are being considered by the Committee, one of which is financial. The Government's original proposal to introduce a £1,000 deposit was hardly extreme or outrageous. I calculate that £1,000 represents about six weeks average manual wages, or about the cost of a package holiday in the Mediterranean for a family of four. That is hardly likely seriously to discourage people from offering themselves in something as important as a parliamentary election. Therefore, I am at a loss to understand why there has been such concern about the figure of £1,000 and why a compromise figure of £500 has been suggested.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary kindly wrote to me saying:

"we have accepted all along that there is no figure which is clearly and absolutely right. The figure of £1,000 is the one that was unanimously recommended by the Select Committee on Home Affairs."

The burden of persuasion is, therefore, on those who argue for a different figure. I believe that £1,000 is a reasonable amount to ask of those who wish to offer themselves in something as important as a parliamentary election. Unless I am otherwise persuaded—and I shall listen carefully to what my hon. Friend has to say when he replies to the debate—on balance I would prefer the £1,000 figure to remain.

I am not convinced about the requirement for signatures. Those of us who receive petitions from the public know that it is all too easy, unfortunately, to gather a large number of signatures for almost anything one cares to dream up. I have often been tempted to go on to the streets, offer a blank piece of paper to people and ask them to sign it. I am convinced that I could gather a large number of signatures and then use that paper for whatever purpose I chose. I do not believe that an apparently impressive, numerically large number of signatures is necessarily the right and proper way to authenticate parliamentary candidature. I prefer the simple, but effective financial method of discouraging frivolous candidates, which would still allow those who seriously wish to offer themselves to do so. However, I shall listen to what my hon. Friend has to say before finally determining my position.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I assure the hon. Member for Mid-Worcester (Mr. Forth) that he need never apologise for his absence.

I very much welcome the Government's response to our representations, and to the discussions that we had with them. I shall deal later with the principle involved on clause stand part, but now I deal with the reduction to £500. The figure could, with advantage, have been less, but in our discussions with them the Government began by proposing a higher figure and so we arrived at £500 as a compromise that involved as high a figure as we were ready to accept and as low a figure as the Government were ready to accept. Indeed, that is the way in which compromises are reached. Thus, we reluctantly accept that figure. However, it is very much coupled with the question of the threshold. The present threshold of 12·5 per cent. would have been unacceptable in relation to a deposit that was more than three times as high as the present one. The Government took the view that that threshold could be reduced, but did not wish to reduce it as far as we thought appropriate.

Once we had decided with the Government on the level of the deposit, we had to decide between us about the level of the threshold. Although the Government originally thought that the threshold should be higher than 5 per cent., I am very glad that, in the spirit of compromise that the Home Secretary referred to last night, they ultimately agreed to our proposition that the £500 deposit should be accompanied by a 5 per cent. threshold.

The compromise was typical, in that no one is really satisfied with it. But at any rate it is tolerable, and many small parties will find contesting elections a little less onerous than they would have done if the Government's original proposal had remained or if the Government's proposal of a revised threshold had been maintained. I should make it clear once again that the Government's original proposal would not have been in any way politically disadvantageous to the Labour party. A 5 per cent. threshold would have meant that we would have retained almost all our deposits, even in an adverse electoral year. The issue involved not what was convenient to the Labour or Conservative parties, but the right of access to the ballot paper of those advocating minority, eccentric or unpopular views. Indeed, that is what an election is all about. It is because we believed that that principle should be maintained that we proposed the amendment. That being so, we are very pleased that the Government have accepted it, and look forward to its incorporation in the Bill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) for what he has said. He has not been the only hon. Member to welcome what the Government have decided to commend to the House, which is, of course, an acceptance of the amendment proposed so eloquently by my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr). None of those who have accepted the compromise have thrown their hats in the air any more than I have done. The outcome is not so unsatisfactory as to be unacceptable to all, and is not so satisfactory as to bring great pleasure to all. But, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, that is the mark of a sensible compromise.

It is interesting that the debate has revealed that, however wide the circle of agreement, there are still some who are determined to remain outside it. We heard a few such contributions this afternoon, not least from the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). He managed to find himself thinking that we had been ungenerous and had fixed the level of the deposit too high, even at £500, and that we had correspondingly been too generous and liberal in fixing the threshold at 5 per cent. If the hon. Gentleman had not been so patently sincere, I might have found his arguments a little contrived, because of his very determination to take issue with what otherwise seem essentially modest proposals. He was the first hon. Member to mention the Chesterfield by-election. It proved to be an interesting diversion for several hon. Members to speculate on the names of the candidates, their numbers and the sanity of any or all of them. However, I should not like to venture into that debate.

I do not think that it shows an excess of pomposity at the Dispatch Box if I say that I think that the House should address itself a little more seriously to the question of electing Members of Parliament who then go on to form or influence the formation of a Government. After all, we are a democracy. There are barely a few dozen true democracies out of a United Nations' membership of more than 150 countries. There are plenty of people who would like the opportunity to stand in serious elections. I wonder whether it is a sign of maturity or of decadence that we should smile indulgently on those who try to turn elections into farces.

The Government have always tried to make clear that the issue really involves recognision of the fact that being a candidate at a parliamentary election gives that person considerable advantages in terms of the free distribution of literature, restrictions on the proper coverage of the election, and so on, and that it is appropriate that the community should expect him to be a serious candidate. That does not mean "serious" in the sense that he is addressing the problems of the world seriously, or in a manner that seems to him to be serious, but that he has a serious prospect of obtaining a reasonable degree of support. Therefore, the argument must be about what a reasonable degree of support is.

We have taken a reasonable view of that in saying that one vote in 20 is not an unreasonable ambition for anyone who is remotely serious as a candidate. Indeed, £1,000 would certainly not have been an unreasonable figure to reflect the financial benefits of candidature. I agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) said. I am as attracted to the figure of £1,000 as I was the day that I first advocated it with considerable passion and vehemence, when the House first debated the issue in the summer. However, I have been driven to £500 and I console myself with the thought that at least that is an appropriate recognition of the privileges of being a candidate, even though it is in no way as sufficient as I would have liked the House to accept.

Of course, I appreciate that there are some who do not agree with that. For example, the hon. Member for Walsall, North and my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) do not agree. My hon. Friend spoke of the devastating effect on small parties. Sometimes our language is abused by using dramatic words to describe relatively undramatic situations. We are used to that in newspaper headlines, but I was not hitherto accustomed to it in my hon. Friend's speeches. His use of the word "devastating" was somewhat hyperbolic in the context of the situation that he outlined to us. He seemed to say that a small party would have aspirations to have a substantial wedge of Members of Parliament and would therefore put up a lot of candidates. He argued that it would be driven into bankruptcy by having to pay lost deposits in respect of each of them. In so far as I followed his argument, I would say that if a party was so unreal in its ambitions that it thought that it would get Members of Parliament by putting up a lot of candidates, and subsequently failed to cross the threshold, it must be concluded that its subjective view of the world was not one that it could expect the rest of us to share.

We all get sentimental about the Ecology party, but it barely polls more than a few hundred votes in any constituency. If hon. Members accept my definition of seriousness, which is that a candidate has a serious prospect of obtaining a reasonable proportion of the vote and that that is why he is given the privileges that attach to being a parliamentary candidate, we cannot take parties at their own subjective estimates. It becomes even more difficult when, as we know in the case of the National Front, a party obtains party broadcasts on the strength of putting up a certain number of candidates. If we make it easy for people to have the opportunity to address millions of our fellow citizens at prime time in a party political broadcast, we must ensure that only those who have realistic level of support in the community are entitled to that privilege.

5.30 pm

It is with some regret—though not for the reasons advanced by my hon. Friend—that I have concluded that his suggestion of using the register would not be an appropriate way forward. It would not be a proper use of the register for anyone who could be bothered to register, even the official Raving Loony party, which, after my remarks yesterday, the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has assured me is not yet part of the alliance, nor does he intend that it should be. That registration should give the right to stand, without hindrance or impediment, in any constituency would not begin to be credible.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) raised the important issue of people standing claiming to be representatives of a party of which they are not representatives. That problem concerns not only the Conservative party; it should also concern the Labour party following a recent council election in Glasgow at which two candidates claimed to be the official candidates, as a result of which the Labour party won the seat with a reduced majority.

The problem could have been resolved by having a register of parties. However, that would have led to consequences which led a number of those involved in the political parties to conclude that it would not be an acceptable price to pay. It is with some reluctance, therefore, that I have concluded that the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Northfield cannot be dealt with in this measure in the manner proposed, for different reasons, by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West.

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) that the Government would have been more than content to have taken powers in the Bill to enable a future Government to increase, by affirmative resolution, the level of the deposit. However, that proposition would not have been acceptable to others and, in the spirit of compromise that has emerged in discussing this important measure, which sets the framework under which we all contest elections, we decided not to pursue that line, although it was with some reluctance that we reached that conclusion.

My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) made an interesting speech about signatories, and we know that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed supports the idea of signatories. The fact that somebody has signed a nomination paper does not indicate support; it indicates assent to his nomination. They are very different propositions, as I discovered when, to my surprise, a Welsh National candidate decided to contest my constituency of Putney. I had not hitherto thought that Putney was on the list of promising seats for the Welsh National party.

Mr. Kaufman: On the same basis, I was surprised to find a Conservative nominated against me.

Mr. Mellor: In my case, the gentleman concerned, who bore an impressively Welsh name, got nominated in the Welsh National party's interest — thought not, I believe, formally so—and when his list of signatories was put in a number of them were found to be well known for their support for another party, some of them were members of that other party and others denied hotly that they had ever intended to cast their vote for the gentleman in question, but simply thought that it was a neighbourly thing to do to sign his nomination paper.

We must face the fact, from the wholly unnecessary court case brought by an eccentric candidate — who might not have stood had we had the higher level of deposit—that eccentric candidates are not always fun; that one drew my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) through the court.

It was suggested that Screaming Lord Sutch had managed to obtain the signatories for his nomination by spending a few minutes in a pub across the road from where he had to hand in his nomination paper.

Simply multiplying 10 by 50 does not remedy the fact that some people will sign anything. Indeed, a noted psephologist told me always to bear in mind the American experience of the researcher who sent a document through the post to a number of households saying, "Please sign this and return it to me at your earliest convenience." People did so and were astonished to find that they had signed their own death warrants.

Mr. Wigley: I shall not pursue the Minister's point about the election in Putney because that was a pure freelance operation. Will he consider—perhaps not in relation to this Bill but for future reference — the suggestion that if, say, 10 people were required, as they are now—the proposer and seconder and eight assenters —to attend in person to nominate formally in the town hall and to be identified as those 10 persons, that might give a formality to the procedure which would dissuade people from acting too glibly?

Mr. Mellor: There are endless permutations, and I accept the sincerity with which the hon. Gentleman makes that one. We must bear in mind that already, as a result of this measure, electoral registration offices are having a great deal of pressure put on them. They must find the staff to perform the various tasks that we are placing on them, for example, in relation to increased absent voting and so on. The thought of 500 people — or however many might be decided upon—queuing up outside the town hall waiting to enter to prove their identity in the limited time available to get one's tackle in order for an election makes such a proposal inappropriate.

Dr. Ian Twinn (Edmonton): Is my hon. Friend aware that some electoral returning officers have themselves put forward the idea of nominators being present to attest at the time of nomination? As those officers see some merit in that suggestion, my hon. Friend should not belittle the idea. Does he agree that it deserves more serious consideration?

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend has recently joined us in the debate and I am sorry if my words have not met with favour from him, though others in the Committee would disagree with him. It is the nature of this whole area, perhaps uniquely so, that almost everybody has a different view. We have at least succeeded in arriving at a solution, as proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough, which I hope leaves most people relatively satisfied that justice had been done, and on that basis I commend the amendment to the Committee.

Sir John Farr: I have been delighted to hear the remarks of the Minister, of the Home Secretary yesterday and of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) today. Rarely does one get united support for any amendment to any measure

The size of the election deposit is a key factor—it could be called the linchpin of the Bill — and by selecting £500 rather than £1,000 we are not placing democracy beyond the reach of aspirant candidates. I am grateful to hon. Members for their support and to the Government for accepting the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Question proposed, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Kaufman: As the Committee is anxious to reach a conclusion on this matter, I shall explain why my hon. Friends and I propose to divide on the motion.

We have just agreed to incorporate into the clause an amendment which will halve the deposit originally proposed by the Government. In our view, it is still £500 too much. We believe that a deposit should not be required at a parliamentary election and that there are other, more valid, ways of dealing with the validity of a candidature.

The response yesterday of the Home Secretary to an intervention by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) gained in firmness what it lacked in logic. As the Home Secretary put it, if a candidate places the money down and is prepared to forfeit it, that indicates that he has some reasonable expectation of obtaining the number of votes required for him not to forfeit his deposit. That view would not have met with approval from Socrates. The logic is not easily discernible. Somewhere between the first and second part of that sentence there is a large undistributed middle.

The Home Secretary has not offered any satisfactory justification. The Under-Secretary of State, in what was, in a sense, a speech on the clause stand part motion, repeated one of the errors of the Home Secretary when he talked about the financial gains that accrued to someone who used a small deposit to become a candidate—for example, free postage.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the argument of the Under-Secretary of State—that because they are small parties they should not be in a position to fight—is fallacious because many of our modern national parties grew from small parties? Therefore, small parties have the right to stand.

Mr. Kaufman: I agree totally with my hon. Friend. If we make it possible for only large established parties with access to large amounts of money to contest elections, we shall suppress the growth of new ideas and trends. It is a fact that the National Front will have access to the amounts of money that will enable its members to stand for election. National Front candidates would, therefore, be able to afford to trade £1,000 for the £8,000 to which the Home Secretary drew attention as the benefits in terms of free postage. The small parties, including the Ecology party — there are many other small parties, some of which I like and some of which I dislike—simply do not have the necessary money. [Interruption.] I do not refer to the party of the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley). I never dare take a view on his party. I am referring to small groupings with wide interests. They simply do not have the resources, money or workers to use the free facilities. Therefore, it is an error to believe that this is a worthwhile bargain. The commercial people or those who want the publicity are ready to pay £500 or £1,000 for the greater publicity they will gain.

I do not agree with the Home Secretary who said:

"The deposit is founded in principle because the essence of election to Parliament is the contest between people who have serious aspirations to represent a constituency." — [Official Report, 13 February 1985; Vol. 73, c. 423.]

The deposit was invented as a way of imposing upon all candidates in an election a share of the cost of the election. Previously candidates had been required directly to bear a share of the cost of election.

If we are to have an open democracy in which opinions which are unpopular or which have not yet found their time are allowed to be voiced before the electorate and in which people are allowed to seek votes from the electorate—however few votes they may receive—the deposit is not a proper means of validating a candidature. I hope that hon. Members who share that view will join us in the Division Lobby.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The alliance also feels that it is necessary to vote against the motion. I have never believed that money is a test of a candidate's political seriousness. I differ from the Government on that fundamental issue of how one tests a candidate's political seriousness.

In a way, I am not surprised that the Government should place money higher on their list of tests than I do. My party believes that it is the breadth of support that a candidate can demonstrate which, if a test be needed, is the best test. That is why we have argued consistently for signatures.

I welcome the fact that the Government have sought to compromise and have considerably reduced the proposed increase in the deposit. I welcome also the conversion of the Labour Front Bench to the view that there should not be a deposit at all. That conversion has occurred under the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who has exercised a beneficent influence on his party's thinking.

Above all, I welcome openness, democracy and the opportunity to demonstrate when people are wrong and are not going to win support. I welcome the fact that the Ecology party is able to stand in elections and that we can demonstrate that the Liberal party is a far more convincing proponent of concern for the environment than that party. I welcome the fact that, when the National Front stands in elections, it is shown that it commands only minimal support. I wish those who have views to advance to stand in elections. I do not wish them to suffer under a financial penalty in their attempt to do so.

5.45 pm

Mr. Parris: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State said that only a realistic level of support entitles a party to consider itself a serious contender in a general election. I do not agree. I believe that there are such things in politics as ideas as well as support at the polls. I believe that ideas as well as voting figures can be serious. Ideas may have to spend a long time in the wilderness before attracting electoral support. These changes make that wilderness a little less hospitable to ideas. To the extent that the Government have considerably compromised, I welcome the changes and I shall support the clause in the Lobby. I am still sorry that the test of a candidate's seriousness is the amount of money that he is able to put up.

Sir John Farr: I was a little surprised to hear the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) suggest that the Labour party was opposed to any deposit at all. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) rightly said that, when evidence was given to the Select Committee on Home Affairs, the Liberal pary did not say that financial considerations and deposits should not be taken into account. The Labour party is on record, however, in the White Paper, as officially advocating a deposit of £600. It is no good the right hon. Member for Gorton now saying that a deposit should not be required and that that is the official view of his party. It may be the official view of one part of his party, but it is not the unanimous view.

Clause 14 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 15

POSTPONEMENT OF POLL AT PARISH OR COMMUNITY COUNCIL ELECTIONS

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 73, in page 18, line 11, at end insert—

'(1A) Any nomination received for an election at which the poll is postponed under the preceding subsection shall, if otherwise valid and if not withdrawn, be valid as if received for an election for which the poll is to be held on the day prescribed by paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of this section.'.

I have at heart the interests of the National Association of Local Councils, of which I am a vice-president. This provision was in the special legislation — the Representation of the People Act 1979 — which postponed parish council elections when they coincided with the general election of that year. The national association believes that it is necessary to make express provision to preserve the validity of nomination papers that have already been delivered, to avoid confusion locally in the general rush and excitement of a general election and to postpone the parish elections. If that is not done, there will be conflicting advice. Because of the short time limits involved, some nominations could fail if, for example, people mistakenly withdrew them or if they were sent back and had to be resubmitted.

I understand that the Home Office takes the view that the amendment is not necessary. Even if it is not strictly legally necessary, it would be of considerable advantage to all if the matter were clear. I have in mind the difficulties that arose when parish elections were postponed in 1983. It is undoubted that people in several parts of the country thought that they were validly nominated, but matters were sufficiently confusing for their nominations to be lost.

Mr. Forth: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if somebody is a serious candidate for public office and expects to get support at the polls he should be sufficiently aware and intelligent to appraise himself of the rules governing the elections and not be confused in the way that the hon. Gentleman has just described?

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman is being pompous. A great many people who stand for parish council elections have no experience of political life and do not regard themselves as being engaged in politics. They are usually ordinary local people who have been encouraged, perhaps by a few friends, to stand in the parish council election, the smallest scale of democratic operation. Such people might have dutifully completed the nomination paper, satisfied all the restrictions and delivered it to the returning officer, only to find that they should have resubmitted it because the election had been postponed.

Genuine difficulties have arisen. The national association's view, which I am sure is supported by the vice-presidents sitting on the other side of the House, is that it would be better for the matter to be set out clearly in law in case similar circumstances arise again.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) is an expert on electoral law and I am grateful to him for raising this issue; it is worthy of consideration. We originally asked for a provision equivalent to section 2(3) of the Representation of the People Act 1979 to be included in the Bill, but parliamentary counsel's view was that it was unnecessary as he saw no reason why a nomination should become invalid simply because the day of the poll was postponed.

I adhere to the view, on advice, that the common-sense provision advocated by the hon. Member is not prejudiced by the absence of any provision equivalent to section 2(3) of the 1979 Act. In deference to the view that the hon. Gentleman has advanced, I shall make further inquiries, but I hope that he will not be discomfited if the answer remains the same and is cogently argued. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will find what I have said helpful enough to make him want to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Beith: I am grateful for the Minister's comments. If indeed a nomination may remain valid, as he has been advised, and that advice is confirmed, I hope that the Minister will make as sure as he can that that is known to returning officers and is among the information that is made available to candidates. If that is done, the problem is solved. On that understanding, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clauses 15 to 17 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 18

TIMING OF ELECTIONS

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I beg to move amendment No. 81, in page 19, line 18, leave out 'for' and insert 'after'.

The Second Deputy Chairman (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 82, in page 19, line 20, leave out from beginning to 'and' in line 21 and insert

'shall be inserted the words "where these are not Saturdays".'.

Mr. Corbett: The most important person in elections to this place is not the candidate but the election agent. Almost all of the legal responsibilities involved fall on the election agent's shoulders. If the brickbats are flying, the election agent collects them. It is rare for them to gather many bouquets, even if the candidate on whose behalf they have worked wins.

As the Minister will have divined, the amendments extend slightly the timetable for the bits of the election machine to be cranked into place. The House has made it easier for people to get postal votes and for absent voters to make arrangements to vote. That will put extra work on election agents. It is my experience that all of the pieces of paper that float around in the early days of an election campaign end up on the desk of and under the scrutiny of the election agent, as he must ensure that the applications are completed properly and run no risk of being rejected by the returning officer. The Minister may need time to think about what we are trying to achieve, but I anticipate that he will take the point seriously. I hope that he will be able to respond as we should like.

Mr. Mellor: I welcome the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) to the Front Bench, making his debut on this day of Committee. The timetable concerns everyone involved with elections. It is also a matter of concern to the public. I do not know whether the public's reaction to the contest in which I was involved at the last general election was unusual, but if I was told once I was told a hundred times each day, "Doesn't the election go on a long time?" That starts on the second day of the campaign.

We must think carefully before including provisions that provide a proper amount of time for a campaign so as not to have arbitrary rules that lengthen a campaign gratuitously. We and, I believe, the public want a fairly tight period between the dissolution of Parliament and the general election. That is why I am a little troubled by the amendments. Although we fully accept that there should be disregard of bank and public holidays, Saturdays and Sundays, we see no merit in adding some other days which are immediately before or after other holidays. The amendments would reinstate the days either side of public holiday breaks. I am not sure that that would be appropriate.

If there is some worry about Christmas and Easter, during which times special considerations apply, we could add Christmas eve and Maundy Thursday to the disregarded days, but I ask the hon. Gentleman not to press for other days. I am aware that his intention is to ensure that everyone is able to do what he wants to do in the proper time.

We have thought deeply about this and consulted widely with party professionals and electoral registration officers. We believe that we have provided a timetable that enables such people to do what they want and satisfies the public's desire for election campaigns to be no longer than is necessary. I hope, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the amendment. I shall consider whether we should add Christmas eve and Maundy Thursday in recognition of the hon. Gentleman's case.

Mr. Corbett: I am grateful to the Minister for his response. I am smiling because I know of at least one candidate at the general election who also thought that the campaign was too long from about the second day. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for agreeing to consider Christmas eve and Maundy Thursday. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 18 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 19 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 20

ORDINARY ELECTIONS OF PARISH AND COMMUNITY COUNCILLORS: INSUFFICIENT NOMINATIONS

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 74, in page 22, line 6, after 'may', insert

'after a period of 60 days (computed according to rules concerning the conduct of elections of parish or community councillors made or having effect as if made under section 36 of the principal Act) has elapsed from the day on which the returning officer published the names of the newly elected councillors.'.

[Mr. Beith]

Amendment No. 74 relates to clause 20, which was inserted in the Bill at the request of the National Association of Local Councils to save the costs of holding a further full-scale election to fill vacancies caused by insufficient nominations. The clause enables the validly nominated councillors, who are elected unopposed, to fill the remaining seats by co-option if the number of new councillors constitutes a quorum. To deal with the possibility that they may fail for some reason to co-opt, a residual power is given to the district council to fill the vacancies. The amendment seeks to ensure that the newly elected councillors are given a specified time in which to act before the district council can act in their place.

If no time is specified, councillors may accuse a district council of jumping the gun. The amendment provides for a period of 60 days, computed according to the time limits in the election rules. It would be unreasonable if parish councillors intended to co-opt and were making reasonable local inquiries, only to find that in the meantime the district council had jumped in and exercised its powers instead. I hope that the Minister will consider this suggestion, as it comes directly from the association.

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). As he rightly said, clause 20 derives from consultations with the National Association of Local Councils, and the position is precisely as he described it. The wording of clause 20 is intended to imply that a district council should not step in until it receives notification from the parish or community council to the effect that the parish or community council has tried to co-opt and failed.

The hon. Gentleman seeks to provide a period of 60 days. I have thought about that and sought advice on it. It seems that 12 weeks, which would be the effect of his proposal allowing for dies non, may be rather long. However, as the hon. Gentleman has drawn my attention to this point, I shall certainly be more than prepared to require, by means of an amendment that the Government will introduce later, that the power of co-option be exercised with... the seven-week period, during which a fresh election must at present be held under section 39(1) of the Representation of the People Act 1983. I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman that undertaking.

Mr. Beith: I am grateful to the Minister for that helpful undertaking. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Miscellaneous Amendments of the Principal Act

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 54, in page 30, line 20, leave out sub-paragraph (3).

Sub-paragraph 3 states:

"An alteration made in a register of electors after the last day on which nomination papers nominating candidates at an election may be delivered to the returning officer shall not have effect for the purposes of that election."

I raise this matter because my experience during the general election—and I am sure it was the experience of many hon. Members—was that some people found that they could get corrections made to the electoral register but could not cast a vote. The last general election would have been the first one at which the new rules for the correction of the electoral register were in operation. Prior to that, it was impossible to get any change made in the register until the following year. That was most unsatisfactory. The clause was a welcome improvement. However, the general election brought with it a series of disappointed expectations when people discovered that they were not registered, had the mistake corrected, only to find that they could not vote on polling day.

It may be argued that people should always check the draft lists when they appear in post offices before Christmas to ensure that their names are on the register, and that, during the year, if they failed to check the draft list, they should check that the register is up to date, so that a mistake can be corrected. We all know that people do not do that. Political parties do it to help their supporters, and indeed others, as much as they can. However, an ordinary member of the public tends to discover a mistake in registration only when an election is about to take place, and he wishes to take part in it. It is therefore extremely common that at the time of an election people discover that they are not properly registered.

At present when a mistake is discovered, a correction can be made; but if it is discovered beyond nomination day, the person concerned cannot cast a vote at the election. That sense of disappointed expectation vitiates the otherwise welcome features of the changes in electoral law, from which we have benefited.

The move towards a continuous register, to which names can be added, is a welcome improvement. However, if corrections to the register cannot be made to ensure that people, who discover that their names are missing at the time when most people are likely to discover that omission can vote, the provision is disappointing in practice. Will the Minister consider that problem? It is a genuine difficulty, and many people came across it at the general election.

Mr. William Powell: I strongly support the argument of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). One of the blemishes of our system of voting is the fact that it has been impossible for someone to correct the register and cast a vote. Most of those errors are discovered only when a person presents himself at a polling station to cast a vote. It is regrettable to have to turn such a person away in those circumstances. Obviously, the detail must be considered carefully. I urge my hon. Friend to consider carefully the arguments that have been advanced and to try to assist in this matter.

Mr. Mellor: I take those points, and consider them to be helpful interventions. As the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) made clear and my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) confirmed, a person who wakes up to the fact that he has been omitted from the electoral register only when an election is in the offing is usually too late to do anything about it.

Impelled by precisely the same feelings that have motivated the two interventions, we consulted on the basis that there was no genuine reason why the registration officer, aided by modern technology, should not be able to alter the register right up to polling day. It was upon that basis that we went out to consultation.

The proposals met strong opposition, not just from the political parties but from the local authority associations. The local authority associations said that in practice copies of the electoral register for use in polling stations were made ready several days before polling day and that a power to alter the register up to the last moment would wreck the whole procedure.

Some, if not all, of the political parties said that they wanted a definitive register for canvassing purposes at the start of the campaign. In other words, there was no support for the proposition that we put forward.

The Government thought that they could not leave the present position as it is; but, equally, it was difficult, in the spirit of accommodation that has informed our consideration of these matters—rightly so—to insist upon going ahead with the requirement that alterations should be accepted up to polling day. Therefore, we decided—and it is given effect to by the Bill—that corrections should be allowed up to the close of nominations, which would be a fortnight before the poll. That would be a marked improvement on the present position.

We are reviewing the procedures for the making of late claims, and before we make the regulations we shall want to consult the political parties again on this and other matters contained in the regulations.

I hope that, on the basis that the door is not slammed shut in his face, the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed will withdraw the amendment. There are real difficulties, not raised by the Government but by those whom we properly consulted, in doing entirely what the hon. Gentleman seeks. We have made some improvements, which I hope are welcome, and I trust that he understands why we can go no further at this stage.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I am in agreement with the hon. Members for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and for Corby (Mr. Powell) in welcoming the enormous improvement in relations with the electorate which rolling registration has brought about. I believe that the Under-Secretary is right to be cautious in any undertaking to continue the rolling of the registration up to polling day. There is, after all, another important person or group of persons whose interests must be taken into account, and they are the candidates.

For the sake of the candidates and their duty and desire to be available to all members of the electorate—that is to say, all who are entitled to vote—it is important that there should be finality at some stage during the campaign. It seems to me that the close of nominations, which is final for other purposes, is an appropriate point of finality for this purpose and one which gives a reasonable opportunity to all candidates to do what most of them desire to do, and that is to make their own direct approach to all who will be able to vote on polling day. Caution may be indicated in respect of the last fortnight before polling day.

Mr. Beith: The remarks of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) touch the scale of balance that we have had to address at several points during the Bill—which is more important, the right of the voter to cast his vote, or the right of the candidate to address the voter? They are both important.

The other context in which we have had to consider that matter is postal voting. In extending postal voting to those overseas we have to some extent reduced the ability of a candidate to address the totality of those listed on the electoral register, because it will necessarily be difficult to communicate within the time available with some of those registered overseas to vote.

My judgment on that matter is that the interests of the elector to be able to cast his vote outweigh the interest of the candidate to be able to address each voter. So far as we possibly can, we must give priority to ensuring that the voter can cast his vote, but having done that, we should do all in our power to enable the candidate to address him.

In making that point the right hon. Gentleman reminded me of what was the most ironic experience at the last election. Some of the people to whom I referred as having been deprived of their vote despite being added to the register, saw their names exhibited on public notice boards in their wards and villages in the course of statutory procedures during the election because the electoral registration officer exhibited the draft additions to the register which had come to him during the election so that objection could be made in the normal way.

The poor individual who found that he was not on the register and had made his complaint duly walked down to the village the next morning and there saw his name and address listed on the notice board for him, his neighbours and the candidate to see. There was no difficulty in addressing that voter at that stage of the campaign, yet he was unable to cast his vote on polling day. Having gone through the whole process of exhibiting the vote, he was precluded from casting his vote on polling day.

I feel that we should strike the balance more in favour of the voter and use every possible means to ensure that he can cast his vote. I do not believe that the objections raised on behalf of returning officers or the parties are overwhelming, even that relating to preparing the register beforehand. It is possible to have a supplementary list of names which have been added to the register and to ensure that a copy is delivered to each relevant polling station.

The objections of the parties are mainly covered by the argument about candidates addressing the voters, with which I have sought to deal. There comes a stage when we must consider ourselves as public representatives representing the voter, and not merely as people who here seek to represent the views of the parties on how the matter has been handled. We have all done a bit of both during the course of these proceedings, but this is a matter where the interests of the individual elector are paramount.

My one worry is that the Minister, in his genuine attempt to be helpful—clearly he set out from the beginning to widen what was available—may not have left himself a door which is sufficiently open, because what he can do in regulations is severely circumscribed by what the Act says. If the Act says that no name which has been added to the register after nomination day can acquire a valid vote at that election, he can do nothing in regulations to make any difference.

For that reason, I am not content to leave the matter there. I do not wish to press the matter to a Division, but I should like to record that although I know that the Minister will be as helpful as he can, the Bill will be left in such a way that some people will be disappointed. Their names will appear to be added to the register. They will words. I gain the impression that in echoing the view of the right hon. Member for South Down, I find acceptance in other parts of the Committee.

Mr. Mellor: Although I did not intend deeply to wound the hon. Gentleman, I think that he may have stated his case more emphatically than the merits deserved. That is not to say that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) is not capable of persuading me that there is a real point involved here. Having considered what has been said, if the injunction were merely, "Vote for only one candidate", or "Vote for one candidate only", and if an amendment were tabled to that effect on Report, the hon. Gentleman might think that it was worth being wounded in the interests of triumphing in the end.

Mr. Beith: Such is the lot of politicians through the ages that, on the basis that we can make such sensible amendments, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 75, in page 45, line 2, at end insert—

'(aa) in paragraph 3 after the first "candidate" there shall be inserted the words "other than any candidate at an election where the number of candidates remaining validly nominated at the date of election was equal to or less than the number of vacancies to be filled at that election."'.

The amendment is supported and encouraged by the National Association of Local Councils. Its purpose is to absolve candidates in an uncontested election for parish or community councils from having to make a return of their expenses to the returning officer. That is a burdensome requirement on those who stand at local elections in their first-ever election, and who seldom incur expenses. They do not dream that they are committing an election offence by failing to certify that they spent nothing at all. The piece of paper is, in most circumstances, of no significance to anyone. It is a simplification of procedures designed to help the ordinary councillor who is not a professional politician.

No change in the law is suggested for contested elections, where it is right that a requirement is placed on every candidate to show what expenses he incurs in contesting the election. That is when the matter becomes significant. However, if the candidate is unopposed in an election to a local council, the association believes that the requirement to file a return of election expenses should not be placed upon the candidate.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has a great interest in these matters. I welcomed his interest in and the comments that he made during our earlier discussions on parish council elections. A number of hon. Members want parish elections to be put on the same basis as other elections, to ensure that their importance is not underestimated. That is why the Government have taken the very proper step of extending postal voting facilities to those elections.

If we are invited to move towards bringing parish and community council elections into line with other elections, we should be cautious about any suggestion that we should in other ways open a divide between those elections and others. I do not want to make too much of the point, but fundamental to our election rules is the rule that candidates must comply with the regulations and give a full account of what they have done during the election period.

While it may be my turn to be pedantic—although I hope not—even if an election is uncontested, as a number of parish council elections are, I believe that candidates should still enter that election with appropriate solemnity and fill in the appropriate forms. We move away from that requirement at the peril of appearing to underestimate the fundamental significance of the rules for the proper conduct of each and every election in this country.

I do not want to overstate the case, because if I were to do so I would fall into the trap which I have, in a very lighthearted way, accused others of falling into. I do not know whether the amendment has the support of the National Association——

Mr. Beith: Yes, it does.

Mr. Mellor: I was unaware of that. Of course, one always continues to think about these matters and one does not close one's mind, but I am still not attracted by the amendment, and I hope that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed will not press it.

Mr. Beith: I recognise the consistency in what the Minister says. The amendment was suggested by the National Association of Local Councils to deal with the problem as it saw it. But as I was one of those who strongly pressed the Minister to put parish council elections on all fours with other elections, particularly in respect of postal votes, I would be the last person to want to give the impression that we should make them less than full elections in every sense of that phrase.

I suppose that it inevitably becomes one of those slight bureaucratic absurdities that people have to make a nil return. It might have been attractive to simplify that arrangement, but it is certainly my view that parish councils should be treated on all fours with other local authorities, together with their elections. The National Association of Local Councils has done a great deal of work in ensuring that that is the case. Indeed, I pay tribute to that work.

On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 3, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 24 to 26 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 27

CITATION, COMMENCEMENT AND EXTENT

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 83, in page 24, line 1, after 'Act', insert

'(except section [Amendment of other enactments] (1) and the entry in Schedule 4 relating to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984)'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government new clause 27 — Amendment of other enactments — and Government amendment No. 84.

Mr. Mellor: The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has scurried into the Chamber—oh, he has left again. I thought that he was going to look with considerable delight upon my discomfiture, because

I am obliged to propose an amendment to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. The right hon. Gentleman teased us several times about the efforts that we had to make to get one or two technical matters right.

The point is that in removing rule 36 of the parliamentary election rules in schedule 1 to the Representation of the People Act 1983, we went a little too far. I shall briefly explain why. Personation is rightly an indictable offence punishable with a maximum of two years' imprisonment and an unlimited fine. Under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, a person who in England and Wales is suspected of having committed an offence punishable with less than five years' imprisonment may usually be arrested only if what the Act calls the general arrest conditions are satisfied. I think that most members of the Committee thought that that was a step in the right direction. I see the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) nodding his head, although he may not have agreed with all the details. That was why the Act repealed rule 36.

7.45 pm

A voter who was suspected of personation at the polling station would usually be arrestable under the general arrest conditions. That is fine, but in repealing the special power under rule 36 the Act also repealed, for England and Wales, the polling agent's power to challenge the voter and the presiding officer's power to order the arrest. Those were useful safeguards, because the polling agent could challenge a voter whom he suspected of personation, and he had to undertake to substantiate the charge in a court of law. The effect of the challenge was that the presiding officer could order the voter to be arrested, although he could not be prevented from voting. We want to keep that provision. I very much regret that it was inadvertently swept away in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. I invite the Committee to put that provision back into the legislation. I apologise for the fact that it was taken out in the first place. I hope that the Committee, without too much trouble or difficulty, will agree to the amendment.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): It would be ungracious not to accept the Minister's apologies. I hope that this is the last time that the Government have to apologise for matters connected with the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. In this instance, we should accept the Minister's apology. He has eaten humble pie, and no more needs to be said.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I beg to move amendment No. 63, in page 24, line 3, leave out 'and for different purposes'.

My hon. Friends and I come before the House as earnest seekers after information, for we fail to understand how the words proposed to be left out make any difference to the sense of the subsection. I take it that the word "provision" in page 24, line 3, means a provision of a measure that is separately designated in some way, whether as a clause, a subsection or a paragraph of a subsection. If that is the correct interpretation, it is not clear how there can be "different purposes" within the same provision or how—supposing that there could be "different purposes" within the same provision—it could possibly be right to bring the provision into force for one purpose or set of purposes and not for another.

It may be that somewhere in the Bill, hidden from the eyes of the laity, there are provisions under which different purposes can be pursued. But, even if that is so, it would be highly inconvenient for the Act to come into force, not even section by section or provision by provision, but purpose by purpose, where several purposes were contained within one provision. Therefore, I hope that the Minister will explain the intention behind the words, and will also find it possible to advise the Committee that they are not really necessary and might in practice prove an inconvenience.

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) for giving us the benefit of his formidable experience of legislation and for making that point. I shall look at what he has said and, if I find that my immediate response has missed some of his points, I shall make that clear at a later stage.

It is intended that there should be the maximum flexibility, because certain points will arise about the implementation of the Bill that we will need to contemplate. That is why clause 27(2) is framed in that way. I believe that it allows the Secretary of State to bring the provisions into force by order, to bring different provisions into force on different days, and to appoint different days for different purposes. Therefore, certain free-standing provisions of the Bill can be brought into force after the minimum period of two months or so has elapsed, but other provisions cannot be brought into force until after the regulations have been made. That will obviously be a time-consuming process, because other consultations must be proceeded with. That deals with the question of different provisions.

The reference to "different purposes" is designed to ensure that the commencement orders may, for example, include a proviso that the provision being brought into force would not affect an election of which, say, notice had been published before the appointed day. Otherwise, we might find that a candidate had already paid £150 deposit, but clause 12 having come into force before polling day, he would have to deposit a further £350. The reference to "different purposes" would enable us to decree that he would not have to pay that.

I do not know whether that explanation is coherent enough for the right hon. Gentleman. I shall reflect on what he said. If he raised other points, I shall consider them. Perhaps, for the record, I should reassure him on a point that he did not raise. There is no question of that provision giving power, say, to introduce arrangements for Northern Ireland on a different day from the rest of the United Kingdom. I assure him that all the provisions will be brought into effect at the same time throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I thank the Minister both for his final remarks and for his conciliatory preamble. I am greatly excited by the news that the Bill contains free-standing provisions—the term used by the Minister. It would be fascinating to know which parts of the Bill are free-standing. That is a term of art which, despite my years, I have not hitherto encountered in legislation, and it would be interesting to discover its meaning.

I followed carefully the Minister's substantive explanation. It still seems inherently undesirable that a date should be fixed for the coming into force of "section something, subsection something", when that provision, from that day, would be enforced for only certain purposes. I hope that in the consideration that he has promised to give to this matter, the Minister will instance in the Bill where such a subdivision, for the purposes of commencement of a single provision, is necessary, and whether it will be convenient.

It seems remarkable that the Secretary of State should, by order, provide that a provision shall come into force for only certain purposes and not for others. He will then need another day for the same provision to come into force for different purposes. I hope that the Minister will have leisure to consider those issues before the next stage of the Bill.

Mr. Mellor: I shall look at the points that the right hon. Gentleman made with his usual cogency and authority. My reference to "free-standing provisions"—it may not have been the most felicitous of phrases—simply meant those provisions that did not require regulations to be made to give them the necessary effect. They could be brought into force without the need for further regulations. A great deal of the Bill relies on regulations subsequently being made to give the whole arrangement coherence.

In my final remarks, when I was giving the right hon. Gentleman reassurance about Northern Ireland, perhaps I should not have referred to "all the provisions", thereby implying that I was referring to everything in the Bill. I meant to say that any provision that was brought into force would be brought into force throughout the United Kingdom as a whole and that there would be no question of using any power in clause 27 to differentiate on any provision betweem Northern Ireland and Great Britain. I hope that that is helpful to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: This is a moment for rejoicing. We have a new technical term, "free-standing," which will be of great advantage. Many of us have an inherent and instinctive objection to provisions in a Bill which, for their operation, depend on regulations — subordinate legislation.

We now know that our desire is for more free-standing legislation—something that might almost feature in an election programme. The Conservative party is for free-standing legislation, and more of it. If this short debate has done nothing else, it has provided for a certain lifting of the heart and an enrichment of our parliamentary vocabulary.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 27, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause 27

AMENDMENT OF OTHER ENACTMENTS

'(1) Section 26 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (repeal of statutory powers of arrest) shall not apply to rule 36 in Schedule 1 to the principal Act (power of presiding officer to order constable to arrest person suspected of personation) and, accordingly, in Schedule 2 to the 1984 Act (preserved powers of arrest) there shall be inserted at the appropriate place—

"1983 c.2.	Rule 36 in Schedule 1 to the Representation of the People Act 1983".

(2) In section 3(7) of the Elections (Northern Ireland) Act 1985 (certain offences to be corrupt practices under the principal Act) for "168(2)(b)" there shall be substituted "168(1)(a)(ii)". —[Mr. Mellor.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 1

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION

'In Schedule 1 of the Principal act, for paragraph 18 ("Poll to be taken by ballot") there shall be substituted:

"(1) The votes at the poll shall be given by ballot, and the result shall be ascertained according to the principles of proportional representation, whereby the proportion of votes cast for each party approximates to the proportion of seats won;

(2) The rules by which sub-paragrapgh (1) above shall be implemented shall be specified by order made by statutory instrument by the Secretary of State; but no such order shall be made unless a draft has been laid before and approved by resolution of both Houses of Parliament; and each such order shall expire at the commencement of the parliament next after the one in which it was made.".'. —[Mr. Beith.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Beith: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The Bill is titled "Representation of the People Bill" and it seeks in a variety of ways to improve the representation of the people. However, it fails to improve their representation in the most fundamental way of all. It does not ensure that the votes cast are reflected in the seats allotted in Parliament at the end of the day.

The Bill takes a variety of actions to tidy up and improve our electoral procedures. Most of it I welcome, and some of it I disagree with. The drift of its provisions is to ensure that the voter has the full facility to vote, is able to go to a polling station and cast that vote—or, if he is abroad or on holiday, to cast his vote by post—has the facility to vote in secret, is assured that when the vote is placed in the ballot box it will not be interfered with but will be taken under careful guard, and that the votes will be counted under the strict supervision of impartial returning officers who have a reputation for the fair way in which they conduct the procedures.

In every possible way the Bill seeks to ensure that the vote is cast in a way which confers no undue advantage on individuals who stand or on the parties they represent. However, it is as if, at the end of the day, everything is tipped out of the ballot box in a heap and the votes are picked out like raffle tickets at a constituency bazaar. That is the degree of relationship that we are now getting between votes cast and seats won. As the Representation of the People Bill, it fails to meet the criteria of its title.

We need only look back to recent general elections to see how what I have described is the case. For example, at the last general election—this is but one of many examples of the situation — the Conservative party received 42 per cent. of the votes and has 61 per cent. of the seats in the House. It received fewer votes than it did in the previous election, but it has 58 more seats that it had before.

Many of my constituents find this state of affairs baffling. The question is usually expressed by them in the most simple terms: "How is it that Mrs. Thatcher has such a big majority? Why did all those people vote for her?" I do not need to explain in detail why some people voted for her. It is sufficient to explain to my constituents and others that nothing like that proportion of people voted for her.

A substantial minority of the British electorate voted for the right hon. Lady and her party at the last general election. They are fully entitled to the substantial representation that 42 per cent. of the votes accords them. It is reasonable that, as the largest party represented in Parliament, it should have first access to the reins of Government. But let nobody pretend that the Conservatives have anything like the command of the electorate that they have of the numbers in this place. It is a total distortion of the way in which people voted at the last election.

Another example is the position of the Opposition parties in this place. The Labour party and the alliance each received about a quarter of the votes. The Labour party received slightly more votes than we did, yet it finished the election with 200 seats, while the alliance won only 23 seats. [Interruption.] There is no immediate evidence in the Chamber of the vast numbers that were accorded as an additional increment to the Labour party. There are a small number of Labour Members and few Conservative Members here now.

Dr. Marek: I do not wish to make a party political point, but I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman should get away with that. During most of the debate on this Bill there has been only one alliance Member in the Chamber. For this clause, the hon. Gentleman has somehow managed to rustle up four alliance Members. If the hon. Gentleman is proud of that, he is satisfied with the position.

8 pm

Mr. Beith: I cannot remember many debates in Committee on the Bill when one twenty-third or one twenty-fourth of the membership of the parliamentary Labour party has been present. I cannot remember many occasions when one twenty-third or one twenty-fourth of the membership of the Conservative party has been here, except during a Division. A small band of entertainers of sorts from the Conservative Benches have taken part in these proceedings. Assorted dilators and the type of people who might suitably attest a passport application have given their views. One or two of them are still here. The attendance during this Committee stage on both sides of the Chamber has not been great. I acquit of that charge the Under-Secretary of State. He and I have been present during almost the whole of the proceedings.

The outcome of the last election was that the Labour party and the alliance won similar proportions of the vote, but one group won only a tenth of the seats won by the other group. That is another respect in which the voting system distorts the effect of the votes cast and fails to represent in Parliament those whom the voters sought to elect when they went to the polling stations.

The system has other curiously unrepresentative effects. The Labour party is in such a bad way in the south of England that there is not one Labour seat south of a line from London to Bristol. The whole of southern England has no Labour Member of Parliament. That is a mark of the drastic decline of the Labour party in the south of England. I must concede, however, that the Labour party's decline has not reached the point where it is totally extinct in that spread of country. Under any proportional system, there might be a handful of Labour Members of Parliament representing that vast area in which they are now totally unrepresented.

The Conservative party has no Members of Parliament in Glasgow or Liverpool, and only one Member of Parliament in the whole of Manchester.

The Conservative party's representation has fallen, especially in Liverpool—my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) is one Liverpool representative—but not to the point where it deserves to be wholly unrepresented on the basis of the votes cast during the last election. The same phenomenon is found in relation to my party in most parts of the country, where our number of parliamentary seats does not reflect the proportion of votes cast.

The authority of the Government is undermined by the way in which we place in office minorities which then behave as though they are majorities. I was interested to hear the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry re-read a comment that he made in March 1983. He said:

"What distinguishes a democracy is that there are free and fair elections and that the majority control the Government."

The majority do not control the Government. A minority has assumed the total authority of the Government and in the House of Commons has been given a degree of power that should be attracted only by a large majority of the votes. It is, therefore, no longer possible to conclude, as the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry concluded:

"That is why this Government have the right to legislate in accordance with the proposals that they put before and had endorsed by the people".—[Official Report, 8 March 1983; Vol. 38, c. 695.]

The people do not endorse the Government's programme in this grand way. The degree of support enjoyed by the Government comes from significantly less than half the electorate.

When the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) was in opposition she asked the then Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) what right he had to continue to govern. She answered her rhetorical question by saying:

"The right of a minority Government; the right of a supposed mandate based on 38 per cent. of the votes cast or 29 per cent. of the electorate? They govern by no right except the arrogant right of Socialism."—[Official Report, 23 March 1977, Vol. 928, c. 1285.]

What ringing words from the right hon. Lady, but they apply with the same force to her Government, with only a slight adjustment in the figures. By what right does the right hon. Lady continue to govern the country? She governs by the right of a supposed mandate based on 42 per cent. of the votes cast. The Conservative party governs by no right, except the arrogant right of Toryism—that is but a small change in the words which the right hon. Lady so grandly uttered from the Opposition Front Bench.

The authority of the Government is substantially undermined when we pretend that minorities are majorities. There is nothing to be ashamed of in the Conservative party being but a minority, but it is no basis upon which to found the assumption that Conservative Members, and they alone, should have the unrestricted direction of the affairs of state. Parliament exists to control Governments, and Parliament's ability to control Governments is undermined by the fact that it does not represent the votes cast by the electorate.

There are other ways in which the system makes Parliament unrepresentative. Although they are not the main thrust of my argument against the system of government which now operates, I think that they have significance and relevance. One of the features of our electoral system is that it tends to discriminate against certain groups of people. The system has had the effect of making it more difficult for women and ethnic minorities to gain entry to the House of Commons. That is a consequence of a combination of the electoral system and the processes of selection.

Compared to other countries, we are well down the league when it comes to the representation of women in Parliament. The proportion of women in this Parliament is far smaller than in most other countries. One of the merits of the single transferable vote system which we advocate is that it makes it much easier for electors to ensure, so far as they can, that a person from an ethnic minority or a woman is elected. Our system makes it easier for electors to express that preference, while still having the opportunity to express their wider party preference and ensure that their preference—for example, for a woman candidate—is not turned into an unalterable preference for the party from which that candidate comes.

Mr. Forth: Will the hon. Gentleman tell us the extent of his party's dedication to the cause of women by enumerating the number of women in the House who represent his party?

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman has walked into it. If he would be kind enough to provide us with the system that I advocate, he would see the serried ranks of women Liberal Members of Parliament among the more than 100 Liberal Members who would be sitting here as a result of the general election. I could take the hon. Gentleman around the country and show him some of the women who would now be Liberal Members of Parliament if we had had a system that ensured that the votes cast were reflected in Parliament. That is an extraordinary argument to advance against a party which has been so grotesquely unrepresented in this House. My right hon. and hon. Friends are but a fraction of those who should be here and of the numbers who received the electorate's support at the last general election.

The weaknesses of the system are not confined to their effects on central Government. They go to local government as well. The Bill seeks to draw together considerably the electoral rules applying to Parliament and those applying to local government. It is, therefore, relevant to consider, at least in passing, that the absence of a fair electoral system for local government has an even more exaggerated quality of distortion.

During the present Parliament the Government have taken away more and more of the powers of local authorities and have restricted their freedom. They are abolishing local authorities, on the ground that they do not like the people elected to run them. It would be wrong in principle under any system for central Government to abolish local authorities, or to take away their powers, because they do not like those who have been elected. However, the Government have only themselves to blame, because the power enjoyed by some of those whom they most dislike in local government was bestowed on them by the unrepresentative nature of the electoral system in local government. If local government had a fair and representative system such as the single transferable vote, there would not be minorities in local government wielding the power of majorities. There would not be single-party local authorities, or local authorities in which the Opposition consist of a handful of Members who are unrepresentative of the much larger proportion in the community of opponents of the party in power.

Weaknesses in local government are glaringly apparent. The Government could have saved themselves a great deal of trouble, and saved our constitution a great deal of damage, if, instead of taking power away from local authorities and abolishing authorities such as the GLC on the ground of party political disapproval, they had simply ensured that the votes of the electors of those places determined the shape of the council that governed them. That would be the way to ensure responsible conduct, responsible financial control and responsible behaviour in local authorities. By their attitude to local government the Government have moved in completely the wrong direction. By centralising—by garnering more power to the centre—they have permanently harmed the system.

Unless there is a proper relationship between votes cast at elections and representation, whether at local or national level, the country will continue to suffer. At national level, we have only to look back over the years since the war to realise how damaging the system has been. By, time and time again, giving a minority the power of a majority, the system has allowed party preference and the prejudices of one minority to be imposed on the country, only to be replaced shortly afterwards by the prejudices of another minority.

Over the decades there has been nationalisation and denationalisation, nationalisation and denationalisation again, as in the case of the steel industry. Prices and incomes policies have been imposed and lifted again and again. Such have been the activities of alternating Governments not one of which have had the support of the majority. If the Government had to depend in the House of Commons upon the support of a majority that was genuinely representative of the majority in the country, government would be sounder and better, and would command the confidence of the people.

Those who argue that it is a mark of strong government to have a large majority in the House of Commons are thinking purely of what can be done in this place. It is certainly true that a large majority enables a Government to ram through large amounts of legislation. Incidentally, although when in opposition the Conservatives opposed such behaviour, they have sought to add hugely to the statute book since they came to power, encouraged by the freedom provided by a large majority.

Strength in government does not repose in the ability to put large numbers of hon. Members through the Division Lobby at 10 o'clock at night. It reposes in the ability to bring into force measures which command the confidence of the people of the country, and command it so well that they will not be overturned by the next Government, who will be equally dependent upon the support of the majority and will wish to retain legislation built on such firm foundations. That was the experience of the wartime coalition. Much of the legislation produced in that period, when historic circumstances brought the parties together, lasted far longer than any of the legislation of the post-war Governments. I suspect that it will also outlast much of the legislation brought in by the present Government.

The Government's ability to use their voting majority to push through their prejudices does not represent strength of government. Strength of government rests in the ability to unite the country. Under the present electoral system, I see no sign that that can be done.

8.15 pm

Mr. Forth: In the context of the Bill, it was inevitable that there would be a re-run of the proportional representation argument. I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in that argument, because it is important that it should be heard and considered from time to time. I am confident that PR will be rejected tonight as it has been in the past.

I have always been puzzled by the obsession of the proponents of proportional representation with the need for the number of seats in the legislature slavishly and arithmetically to reflect the number of votes cast by the electorate. That idea has a certain neatness and symmetry. It has a certain aesthetically pleasing quality. However, I suggest that it means nothing at all in terms of political legitimacy, or of political sensibility in terms of running the country and legislating properly.

The proponents of PR must provide not only a coherent argument for the principle but a coherent system or approach. They rarely do so. There are almost as many different systems as there are proponents of the principle, each of which, incidentally, would provide a quite different result in terms of seats. It is well known that, if one hypothecates the results of the 32 or 33 known systems of PR, they all provide quite different party representations in the legislature.

Mr. Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): With respect, the hon. Gentleman is talking absolute nonsense. It is absurd to say that there are 32 systems of PR. Secondly, when the hon. Gentleman talks about political legitimacy, is he not affected at all by the knowledge that we are the only country in western Europe that operates our kind of system and that all the other Governments are elected by proportional systems that despite what the hon. Gentleman has said, all produce approximately the same results?

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman would say that, would he not? I do not share the hon. Gentlmen's obsession with matters European. I had the honour of serving for five years in the European Parliament, and I will shortly talk about my experience there. First, however, I draw attention to the United States of America, a great bastion of democracy that shares our Anglo-Saxon traditions and does not have a proportional system of elections. Why should we look eastwards to the continent of Europe for inspiration? We are equally entitled to look westwards to the United States for a reaffirmation of the fact that an electoral system need not be proportional to be effective and legitimate.

Recently there was a good illustration of one of the main problems that arises with a proportional system of election, and one of the great strengths of our own system. In the elections to the European Parliament last year, the National Front party emerged from France and gained strong representation in the European Parliament. It did so on the basis of a proportional system.

The proponents of proportional representation must address themselves to the problem of that system giving an opportunity for extreme parties to be represented.

Mr. Beith: Is the hon. Gentleman arguing that, in determining what electoral system we should have, we should have regard to the extent to which a system will enable us to prevent the election of parties with whose views we disagree?

Mr. Forth: I did not say that. I said that those who argue for proportional representation must accept that the legislature will include political parties which they may find unpalatable. I did not say that I prefer a system that excludes such parties.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): Does the hon. Gentleman think that the number of Marxist or neo-Marxist hon. Members would increase if we had proportional representation?

Mr. Forth: It is idle to speculate, but I shall take the hon. Gentleman's question at its face value. I suspect that there would be many small parties, many of which would express views that the hon. Gentleman would find difficult and distasteful. That might or might not be a good thing, but it would be an inevitable result of proportional representation.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): The hon. Gentleman said that there are many forms of proportional representation. I oppose the list system such as that which operates in Italy or Israel as, in Britain, it would be destabilising and would result in parties being elected on a tiny number of votes. With a single transferable vote in multi-Member seats, however, what the hon. Gentleman is suggesting would not happen as an hon. Member would have to get at least one sixth of the votes to be elected.

Mr. Forth: That is possible under one of the systems of proportional representation, but even then the size and geography of the area might alter the results. There might still be extreme representation from some areas.

In regard to the stability of Governments elected by proportional representation, we can look to continental Europe for examples. One of the great strengths of our system is that it provides a predictability and stability which many people have come to value. An inevitable result of proportional representation is a greater incidence of coalition Governments. That gives rise to many new possibilities—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—which I would find undesirable. If, under PR, neither major party got a working majority and one had to seek coalition with a third or more parties, policy would be dictated by back-room wheeling and dealing such as most people would find repugnant and unpredictable.

Alternatively, we might have the type of Government found in West Germany, where a tiny and unrepresentative party can dictate policy to parties with much greater electoral representation. The result is the exact reverse of what the now absent hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) argued for. He made great play of the unrepresentativeness of what he called minority Governments on the ground that they are supported by a minority of the electorate. In Germany, a party that represents as little as 7 per cent. of the electorate can dictate policy.

Mr. Alton: Can the hon. Gentleman give an example of the FDP dictating to the Government, whether to the Social Democrats for 13 years or now to the Christian Democrats? Does he agree that there have been good examples of parties working together in Britain in the interests of the country, especially in wartime?

see their names exhibited on the public notice board, yet when they go to the polling station there will be no ballot paper for them.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Winnick: I beg to move amendment No. 92, in page 35, line 44, at end insert—

'(iii) leave out "public meetings" and insert "meetings open to any member of the public".'.

The amendment arises from some difficulties with the words "public meetings". It was not meant, but in practice they allow organisations such as the National Front to exclude all except their own members and then to claim, in effect, that a public meeting has taken place. That is undesirable, because if we are to have election meetings — long may we continue to have such gatherings — members of the public should not be excluded. That is not the case with race hate organisations, which is why I have moved the amendment.

To the extent that meetings, in effect, are peopled only by those who are followers of the organisation, it is possible for remarks which probably break the law to be made. If not the electoral law, they probably break other laws affecting race relations. That would be less easy if people unconnected with the organisations were able to get in.

As I believe the Minister must be aware, there have been a number of difficulties over this point. The amendment substitutes the words on the Notice Paper for "public meetings". The problem would be easier to deal with if the wording were:

"meetings open to any member of the public."

There is no ambiguity there. The wording is simple and clear and it can be enforced. Although the matter is important, it will not preoccupy the Committee for long, and for the reasons I have given I hope that the amendment will be accepted.

6.30 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I applaud the sentiments behind the amendment. I suspect, however, that we will hear from the Minister that those sentiments are met by the words already in the statute. If so, we would be grateful to hear that, because it will be on the record and available to all registration officers, all parties and candidates.

The purpose of the special provisions which entitle those participating in elections to hold public meetings in buildings which are either owned by the public or funded out of public funds is to show that elections are fully public exercises, that all members of the public are entitled to participate and that for that purpose publicly owned buildings will be thrown open and will serve to achieve that end.

It may be that the amendment is a "belt and braces" operation to achieve that, but there is doubt at present. I should have thought that in every constituency there were private buildings which could be hired out for private meetings. Public buildings should not be available for that purpose, and the amendment goes some way towards making that clear.

Mr. Mellor: If I say, as I shall feel bound to do at the end, that I cannot accept the amendment, I want the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) to know from the outset that it is not because I do not have considerable sympathy with it and would be content, if some of the points that I raise could be met, to consider the matter again while the Bill is going through Parliament. I hope that I shall assist him by going through the arrangements as I understand them and setting out what I see to be the difficulty in his proposal.

What the hon. Gentleman raises is eminently proper and I share his sentiments about one or two meetings that have given rise to concern. As he knows, candidates at parliamentary, European Parliament and local government elections have in general a right to the free use of school rooms and other meeting rooms for the purpose of election meetings which are described in the statute as "public meetings in furtherance of their candidature".

The only qualifications and limitations on that right are that meetings have to be held at reasonable times and on reasonable notice, and must not interfere with the use of a school for educational purposes or with prior lettings of the meeting room. The Bill does nothing to change the substance of the law.

We know that a number of disturbances were provoked in the 1970s by election meetings called by the National Front. A particularly appalling example was the Southall disorder in April 1979 which was the result of such a meeting. These meetings tended to be held in areas of high ethnic minority population and admission was limited to National Front supporters who for the most part were not electors in the division in which the meeting was being held but were bussed in from other areas. Having heard those facts, if someone says that this is damaging to respect for electoral law, far be it for me to dissent from that. Indeed, I do not dissent from it. The question is, what can we do about it?

The 1979 public order Green Paper included a question which was posed to obtain assistance from those who bothered to reply to us—whether it was right for the ratepayer to subsidise what were in effect private meetings from which local electors were excluded, and whether as a consequence the candidates' right to use any school or meeting room should be limited to take account of public order considerations. The Select Committee which reported on public order law in 1980 recommended that to require a substantial proportion of the seats at an election meeting to be open to the public. The Select Committee recognised the difficulties that even at the best conducted public meetings which are genuinely intended to be open to the public some rowdyism is to be expected. Therefore, the Select Committee added a proviso to the effect that the candidates' stewards should retain the right to refuse entry at an election meeting to those intent on breaking it up and remove them if they gained entry.

"an appropriate legal formula should be devised"

The hon. Gentleman's proposal does not include any such equivocation and would make it difficult to keep order even at a proper meeting that did not fall under the umbrella. Indeed, it might be one of his own meetings to which National Front supporters or other people had come with the purpose of breaking it up. The hon. Gentleman must recognise that that would be the consequence.

The difficulty with these provisions is enforcement. The law explicitly allows candidates the free use of rooms only for public meetings, yet the question whether a meeting is a public meeting is a question of fact which can be determined only after the event. There are public order considerations which require that there should be a right on the part of the organisers and, indeed, on the part of the police to refuse entry to such meetings and to act to eject people so as to maintain order. But those legitimate responses to normal meetings or to meetings which only a small minority wanted to make abnormal would be precluded by the amendment.

I have tried to set out the position as squarely as I can. If someone who is provoked by what I have said can come up with a formula that would enable us to exclude those meetings that, as it were, creep in as public meetings but in reality and substance were never intended to be public, without threatening the proper carrying on of legitimate public meetings which a small minority have to be prevented from trying to break up, I shall be glad to hear it. The amendment does not achieve that. It is on that basis that it is not acceptable. I invite the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the amendment, but we could come back to it later.

Mr. Winnick: If the Minister is telling the Committee that because of all the difficulties he has outlined he cannot come back on Report with a different wording, I will not withdraw the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I beg to move amendment No. 95, in page 37, line 20, leave out '£10,000' and insert '£5,000'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 96, in page 37, line 23, leave out '£5,000' and insert '£2,500'.

No. 97, in page 37, line 27, leave out '£10,000' and insert '£5,000'.

No. 98, in page 37, line 30, leave out '£5,000' and insert '£2,500'.

Mr. Barron: Amendment No. 95 seeks to change the amount for security of costs for any action taken in court in relation to elections to bring it within the reach of the ordinary common man. The amount of £10,000 proposed for parliamentary elections is too high. The amendment seeks to bring it down to £5,000.

My hon. Friends and I also wish to reduce from £5,000 to £2,500 the security needed for local government elections. I understand the Government's wish to ensure that people do not initiate litigation for frivolous reasons at elections. In many instances elections are frivolous in themselves—as we can see when we look at some hon. Members who are in Committee. We should make sure that the amounts required as security are in the reach of ordinary people. The amounts proposed by the Government are far too high for the ordinary man or woman.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I fear that it is my view that both the Government and the Labour party have got it all wrong in relation to the amendments. A more far-reaching change in the law is required. By section 136 of the principal Act and by the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), both the Government and the Labour party appear to accept that it should remain possible for an election petition based on a corrupt or illegal practice to be brought as a civil proceeding; and for alternative proceedings to be taken by the Director of Public Prosecutions by way of a prosecution.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree that it is sometimes extremely difficult to persuade the Director of Public Prosecutions to take action in these matters?

Mr. Carlile: I shall deal with the hon. Gentleman's point in due course, if he will bear with me.

The only issue between the Government and the Labour party in relation to this group of amendments is one of quantum. How much should be deposited by way of security for costs? The Government say £10,000 for a general election and £5,000 for a local election, and the Labour party says half of those figures. Of course, if inflation had been applied since the last time the figures were adjusted, they would be £14,200 for a general election and £7,100 for a local election. Therefore, in that sense both the Government and the Labour party have got their sums wrong anyway.

The Liberal party and the Social Democratic party oppose the principle of the provision and the amendment, because we consider that it has three fundamentally offensive features. The first is that something as potentially serious as a corrupt practice, corruption, or even as serious as an illegal practice, should be open to a merely civil action. The very word "corruption" speaks of its essence eloquently without needing elaboration. If corruption occurs at an election, proceedings should be taken through the criminal courts only, as the appropriate sanctions for the conduct surely fall within the criminal law.

The second fundamentally offensive feature is that alternative jurisdictions should be available; and that it should be a lottery as to whether a person is proceeded against by way of election petition, or by prosecution with the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions. If one looks at the Richmond GLC election case and at another case from the north-east which involved an hon. Member, one sees that, although the allegations that were made in the two cases were of the same general type, one proceeded by way of election petition and resulted in a massive bill of costs being faced by a candidate who was cleared of every corrupt practice alleged; whereas the other led to proceedings in the Crown court by way of a prosecution authorised by the Director of Public Prosecutions, resulting in a proper acquittal and an order for costs which did not leave the candidate involved in anything like as disadvantageous a position.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman is straying a little wide. The amendments deal with amounts. The hon. and learned Gentleman is now going wider into the principles involved.

Mr. Carlile: I was seeking to keep in order by making the point that I regard the amounts in the amendment as being quite wrong because the concept of setting a quantum for such proceedings is in itself wrong.

The third fundamentally offensive feature about the concept behind the amounts stated in the amendment is that it is wrong—I am surprised that the Labour party should accept it as a concept—that money should be the measure of whether an allegedly corrupt or illegal practice is to be considered by the court. Even if the amendment is accepted, if the Labour party is able to lay its hands on £5,000 of union money to present by way of security for costs so that it can bring an election petition, it can bring it; but if, as is the case in most areas, the Labour party cannot raise the £5,000, then however serious the corrupt practice of which it wishes to complain, it cannot bring it. That is an odd and unacceptable state of affairs.

6.45 pm

In accordance with the broad views of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Association of District Councils and the Association of County Councils, I suggest that we should not be faced with choosing between the amounts set out alternatively by the Labour party, and the Government. Rather, we should have a single procedure whereby allegations of corrupt and illegal practice are brought to the attention of the Director of Public Prosecutions. As the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) said, it is sometimes difficult to persuade the Director of Public Prosecutions to bring prosecutions, but that restraint is only right and proper. He rightly exercises his discretion carefully and authorises proceedings only in cases when he regards it as more than 50 per cent. likely that a conviction will result. That kind of restraint is needed in relation to election disputes.

Therefore, although I do not intend to force a Division on the amendment, I ask the Under-Secretary to reconsider the principle behind the provisions and realise that we should be talking not about amounts but about the whole cumbersome procedure of election petitions and whether it is right for that cumbersome procedure to continue.

I can speak of one episode from my own experience. I was once instructed to appear in a local election petition on behalf of, as it happens, the Labour councillor who was elected against whom a petition had been presented by another candidate. I saw it as a fantastically expensive, extremely elaborate, grossly wasteful and long-delayed procedure. My view is that the whole procedure of election petitions, often unmerited, which can take so much longer than the relatively simpler course of a criminal prosecution in appropriate circumstances, leads the post-electoral process into disrepute.

Mr. Bermingham: I listened with care to what the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) said. He surprised me considerably because one would have thought that such an honourable and learned Member would know that there is a world of difference between an illegal practice leading to the presentation of an election petition and corruption. The two arms are needed. I agree that the corruption procedure is much speedier and less expensive to the party——

Mr. Carlile: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that corrupt practices should, in principle, be dealt with only by way of prosecution, and not by an election petition? That seems to be the import of what he said.

Mr. Bermingham: I agree that any corrupt practice in any election should be dealt with by way of criminal prosecution. I do not believe that any hon. Member would think otherwise. However, I know from experience that it is often the presentation of a petition and matters that arise from the examination of the petition that lead to the subsequent corruption trial or the subsequent trial for perjury.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be led astray. We are dealing with amounts.

Mr. Bermingham: I would hate you to think, Sir Paul, that my turning my back on you was in any way discourteous, but it allowed me to make my point to the hon. and learned Member. I shall now return immediately to the sums of money involved.

It is right that people should be able to present a petition against election practices. It is equally right for those who have stood for election, whether they were successful or not, to be protected from the utterly frivolous petition. The idea of security of costs is aimed at protecting against spurious and ill-founded allegations or petitions.

I concede that in this modern day and age £500 or £1,000 is no deterrent to the frivolous petition, but we need not go as far as the Government have gone in raising the limits to £5,000 and £10,000. That will eliminate a number of well-founded petitions brought by individuals, perhaps independent candidates, without any particular means. To tailor the limitation to take into account the discouragement of the frivolous and still leave it within the means of the honest and honourable petitioner would be a sensible compromise. I support my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) in his amendment to reduce the sums to £5,000 and £2,500.

Dr. Marek rose——

Mr. Mellor: Let me save the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) from feeling the need to push at an open door. I understood him to realise that it is wide open and that I am accepting the amendments. I want to put hon. Members out of their misery before the hon. Gentleman makes a speech that might persuade me that I am wrong to do so.

Dr. Marek: The amendments are about right. This is a Government Bill. If the sum is too low, frivolous applications will be encouraged. One wants to keep it above that level.

Mr. Mellor: That ringing endorsement of the amendment will be welcome to the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) and it has not persuaded me that it is wrong. Therefore, I shall accept the amendments.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) knows, as was pointed out, that the arguments that he adduced go to the basic principle and are the result of his frustration that new clause 17, which would have given him the opportunity to dilate on those matters without objection, was not selected. I shall honour the fact that it was not selected and not be led into the path of disorder.

It is eminently appropriate that someone who does something as grave as bringing an election petition should have to show that he is capable of withstanding the consequences of failing in order to recompense the candidate who is brought before the court for his costs. To put up security for costs is eminently right, particularly given the recent example of the application in respect of the Penrith by-election, which showed us just how the procedures can be abused. There is nothing wrong with the principle, but the sum of £1,000 was fixed as long ago as 1868. I am surprised that the result of inflation since 1868 is only £14,000. The hon. and learned Gentleman's mathematics may not be as good as his law. I suspect that I may be right about that.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I could have got the figures wrong. It could be £142,000.

Mr. Mellor: It was a mere guess and speculation, as one should have anticipated from that Bench. In any event, the sum has not been increased since 1868. We are now doing so and I am sure that we are pleased about that. Perhaps in our zeal to increase the amount we might have gone too high. The eloquence of the hon. Member for Rother Valley has carried the day.

Will you grant me a moment's indulgence, Sir Paul? When I replied to amendment No. 79 late last night, in an anxiety to deal with the issue quickly I said something which may not have been completely accurate. I am writing to the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) about it, but it might be appropriate to mention it now. I telescoped the argument and I should like to put the right position on the record.

The point related to the penalties for making a false declaration to become an overseas voter. I suggested that that was an offence under section 61 of the Representation of the People Act 1983 which was punishable as an illegal practice and the penalties would therefore include disqualification from voting. What I should have said was that the making of a false declaration would not be punishable under section 61, but it would need to be only if the result of the declaration was that the person got his vote and excercised it. That is the mischief. If he got his vote as a result of a false declaration and exercised it, that would be an illegal practice under section 61 and would be visited with the penalties which the hon. Gentleman wanted.

I hope that that explanation does not make the hon. Gentleman regret his withdrawal of the amendment. I am glad to have had the opportunity to put the record straight and I am grateful to you, Sir Paul, for your indulgence.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 96, in schedule 3, page 37, line 23, leave out '£5,000' and insert '£2,500'.

No. 97, in schedule 3, page 37, line 27, leave out '£10,000' and insert '£5,000'.

No. 98, in schedule 3, page 37, line 30, leave out '£5,000' and insert '£2,500'.—[Mr. Barron.]

Mr. Bermingham: I beg to move amendment No. 100, in schedule 3, page 38, line 40, after 'relief)', insert—

'(a) in subsection (1) the words "else if in respect of a payment made in contravention of section 78(1) or (2) above paragraph 1 of Schedule 4 to this Act" shall be omitted and (b)'.

The amendment may seem complicated, but it effectively alters section 167 of the Representation of the People Act 1983 by deleting in the second line of section 167(1) the words "High Court" and substituting the words "County Court". The object of the exercise is to allow the applications for relief to be brought in the county court.

Before I go further, I thank the Minister for reading into the record the matters that he did. My view has not been altered. I accept the undertaking. I realise that the casting of the vote is the matter that causes the problem, and I am satisfied on that point.

A considerable number of agents are often amateurs and things can often happen in the heat of the preparation of the papers. It is certainly the case in all major parties that people who are not professional agents can make innocent mistakes when calculating election expenses, whether for a parliamentary or a local government election.

Applications for relief under section 167 have to be made in the High Court, which is an expensive procedure. In some cases, it is incredibly expensive. The amendment seeks to allow applications in respect of errors made in good faith — it is a prerequisite to show that the omission is not a criminal act — to be made in the county court where, in my experience, the quality of the judiciary is equally as great. The county court is well capable of dealing with such applications. It has always seemed strange that such applications have to be made in the High Court. The amendment merely seeks to allow those applications in future to be made in the county court.

Mr. Mellor: The position, as the hon. Gentleman has made clear, is that for the most part the jurisdiction is exclusively that of the High Court, and only some trivial applications for relief may be made to the county court. I understand that a number of applications under section 167 of the 1983 Act are made by candidates whose election publications have failed to include the name of the printer and publisher, and so on. Therefore, I understand why some of those should not involve going to the High Court, which is an expensive procedure.

My difficulty is that it is not easy to say from the outset what will be trivial. Even in the instance that I have given of omitting a mark, that may be a legitimate mistake for which relief could be granted immediately for literature that was otherwise perfectly well within the limits. But there are circumstances where one could envisage that a candidate, desperate to secure election or re-election, might ride a coach and horses through the restrictions on the amount of money that he could spend on publicity. He could publish a great deal of expensive literature without the proper mark and then not be entitled to relief, even though he would be applying on precisely the same basis as the individual who had left a mark off one piece of literature only.

We must recognise that illegal practices are potentially serious. Indeed, an election can be declared void if a candidate is found to have committed them. The danger of giving the county court jurisdiction over applications for relief is that it might well be asked to entertain, and perhaps grant, an application for relief while at the same time an election court, which has only a limited number of High Court judges, was considering the same issue on the trial of an election petition. That might well arise if the abuse were as wholesale as I have suggested.

I am not anxious to involve people in any more difficulty than is absolutely necessary when dealing with inadvertence, but it is not easy, until one has heard the facts of the particular case, to separate out in rules what is inadvertence and what is perhaps more sinister. I believe that in order to preserve the gravity and seriousness of an illegal practice—since a bad case undermines the whole principle of free and democratic elections and is therefore treated very seriously by the courts—it is right for the High Court to retain this jurisdiction.

I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but we are strongly attached to the present arrangement.

Mr. Bermingham: I appreciate the point that the Minister is making. However, does he agree that there ought at least to be written into the rules—this could be done with no great difficulty — that the county court judge, who is a circuit judge since the new rearrangement, shall also have power to refuse to consider the matter further? These are men of great integrity. He then could refer the matter to a judge of the High Court, and the normal procedures would have to apply. In other words, the relief he could give would be yes, no, or referral, in which case it would then pass on. In a case where what appeared to be a minor infringement gave rise to a much more serious matter, as I am sure the Minister is well aware, the judge would have the power to refer it either to a full election court or to the Director of Public Prosecutions, which of course is what happens.

Mr. Mellor: But the result would still be that a judge on a lower level of the judiciary than has customarily dealt with these matters would be being invited to exercise discretion that would be conclusive of the matter and might oust the jurisdiction of the High Court in a case which a High Court judge might have wished to consider had the matter been put before him.

Because we are dealing with technical matters and because we want good and common sense to govern these rules, I am always open, as the hon. Gentleman knows, for further application to be made. If the hon. Gentleman wants to set out in writing any more detailed points, there is time in the further progress of the Bill to consider them. But at the moment, for the reasons I have given, the Government are attached to the continuation of the rule whereby, save in only a very small number of trivial instances, jurisdiction to deal with illegal practices remains firmly vested in the High Court. I am sorry that I cannot give the hon. Gentleman any more satisfaction than that.

Mr. Bermingham: I propose to ask leave to withdraw the amendment at this stage, because, if I do not, I realise that subsequently I may not be able to bring it back. I shall take the opportunity offered by the Minister and write to him in the intervening period.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 55, in schedule 3, page 40, line 45, leave out 'desirable for publicising it' and insert

'best calculated to afford information to the voter'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No 56, in page 41, line 5, leave out 'desirable for publicising it' and insert

'best calculated to afford information to the voter.'

No. 94, in page 41, line 6, at end insert

'In the case of an election to fill a casual vacancy the returning officer shall also deliver a notice to those persons entitled to receive free copies of the electoral register under regulations issued by virtue of this Act.'.

Mr. Beith: Amendment No. 55 relates to the public notices which are displayed during an election by returning officers. The wording which I have proposed simply reinstates a bit of wording which was in the parent Act which the Government are amending. The reason for suggesting that we go back in part to the original wording is that I believe it is stronger than the Government's proposed wording. I believe it to be tighter as it places a more systematic demand upon the returning officer.

The words "desirable for publicising it" are extremely loose and subjective and allow for considerable difference of interpretation by returning officers. One might say that it was desirable to place a notice outside every church, chapel and public building, as is the traditional arrangement, while another might say it was no longer desirable to go to such lengths and that only a limited number of notices were required.

My proposal,

"best calculated to afford information to the voter,"

is more capable of objective test than the wording that the Government now propose. It is for that reason that I ask the Minister to consider changing the wording.

Mr. Mellor: I welcome you, Mr. Lamond, to the Chair of this Committee.

I take the point made by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). He wants to put back what appears in section 200(1) of the 1983 Act—wording that goes back to the 19th century. We thought that it was more appropriate to recognise the changes in circumstances that have occurred since it was first thought that the form of words to which the hon. Gentleman is attached should go into legislation. We believe that the electoral registration officer, as an experienced person, will have a view on the manner in which proper publication should be made and that, therefore, we should give him the discretion to do so. In effect, it is clear that in most cases he will use local newspapers for the additional publicity and that the scope for making a different decision is limited.

I am not persuaded that the hon. Gentleman has a point of substance in preferring the antique phraseology he wants to bring back to the simpler and, I think, better formulation that we have adopted of "desirable for publicising it". I do not think that there is a major difference between us, and I hope that it will not break the bonds of amicability that have characterised our relationship over the past two days.

Mr. Beith: This is the narrowest difference that has arisen between the Minister and myself in the course of these proceedings so far. However, I am not convinced by the general proposition that his current civil servants are better in their use of English than those who served his Department in the 19th century. Generally, the reverse appears to be the case. When I see the words on the amendment paper I am even more convinced. However, I have not convinced him or, I suspect, the armies that he could bring into the Lobbies were I to press the matter to a Division, so I will not do so. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. James Lamond): Owing to a misunderstanding, amendment No. 57 has been altered so that, as well as leaving out words, it now proposes to insert the word "tenth". Members will see that that would not make sense. I shall therefore allow the amendment to be moved in its original form—that is, to leave out the words

"10 at night on the".

The same applies to amendment No. 58.

Mr. Kaufman: I beg to move amendment No. 57, in page 41, line 38, leave out the words

'10 at night on the'.

The Temporary Chairman: It will be convenient to discuss at the same time the following amendments: No. 58, in page 41, line 39, leave out the words

'9 at night on the'.

No. 59, in page 41, line 42, leave out '10 at night'.

No. 60, in page 41, line 43, leave out '9 at night'.

Mr. Kaufman: I wish, first, to thank the Clerks for the assistance that they have given my hon. Friends and myself in ensuring that these amendments are in order and suitable for outright inclusion in the Bill, which is our objective, to which I hope the Government will be able to respond in a receptive manner, thus strengthening the bonds of unity and amicability which were slightly slackened before, but which can now be tautened to the maximum.

As the Government will know, this is one of the aspects of the Bill which, in its original form, most offended us in the Labour party and on which we were most determined to secure amelioration. It seems to us that at a general election, which may be held only once every five years, it is an absurdity that, for the convenience of polling staff and returning officers, an hour should be removed from the hours of polling. After all, one hour in five years does not seem to be a very great price to pay for democracy in return for perhaps a little additional fatigue on the part of returning officers and their staff.

There is no doubt that the provision to close the poll at 10 o'clock rather than 9 o'clock is of great importance to people who would not necessarily qualify for an absentee vote or who might not know until much nearer polling day that their working hours would interfere with their opportunity to vote. Shift workers and long-distance lorry drivers wishing to vote in person might be inconvenienced by such a limitation of polling hours.

Mr. Forth: The polling stations will still be open between 7 am and 9 pm. Is the right hon. Gentleman seriously suggesting that some people cannot vote between those hours, but are able to do so between 9 pm and 10 pm?

Mr. Kaufman: Yes.

Mr. Forth: As polling stations will be open from 7 am, the right hon. Gentleman's argument loses much of its validity.

Mr. Kaufman: The hon. Gentleman clearly does not understand the social habits of certain parts of the country, as anyone who represents or lives in a north of England constituency does.

Mr. Forth: I was born in Scotland.

Mr. Kaufman: Scotland cannot be blamed for that. I am referring to the social habits of the north of England, where I was born and part of which I represent. When we go round knocking on doors on polling day, many women say that they will not vote yet. They wait for their husbands to come home, have a bath, change their clothes and have their meal before going out to vote. Voting is a family occasion and many people in the north of England treat the act of exercising the franchise with the concern and respect that it deserves. The husband is the operative person in these family arrangements. If he comes home late, the wife may not be able to vote either. They may be unable to find a baby sitter. All kinds of problems may arise.

An election should not be about limiting people's opportunity to vote. It should expand the opportunities to vote within sensible limits. The additional hour until 10 pm has been available for a number of years and it is widely used. As I said at earlier stages of the Bill and in the debate on the White Paper, Dr. David Butler's survey showed that in the 1979 election 4 per cent. of the electorate voted between 9 pm and 10 pm. That one-hour period represents only 6·66 per cent. of the polling time available, so a 4 per cent. vote is not a bad proportion. Secondly, 4 per cent. is 1,250,000 people. It may be argued that if polling stations close at 9 pm some of those people may find a way to vote earlier. Nevertheless, all those people found the hour between 9 pm and 10 pm the most convenient for them. That being so, it seems gratuitious folly to take that hour away for the sake of tidiness or the convenience of polling officials. The opportunity to exercise the parliamentary franchise comes to each person on so few occasions in his or her lifetime as an adult citizen that to curtail it for no sensible reason is, in its way, an attack on democracy.

I very much hope that the Government will accept the amendment, to which the Labour party attaches great importance. We believe that the Bill will be vastly improved by the inclusion of this amendment and the consequential amendments which will complete it.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I endorse all that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has said. When I supported the Bill as a whole on Second Reading, I found this aspect of it rather difficult to understand. When I first sought election in 1979, I stood in a constituency with a large proportion of shift workers. Shifts in the steel industry ended in the early or mid-evening, so a large number of votes were cast between 9 pm and 10 pm. People anxious to vote, come what may, might be prepared to suffer inconvenience to vote earlier, but the electoral system should not impose that necessity upon them. We should make it as convenient as possible for people to cast their votes. Some of my political opponents even suggested that the decision in the late 1960s to extend polling hours from 9 pm to 10 pm led to my winning my seat in 1979 because so many votes were cast in that last hour of polling. That is no reason to limit or to extend polling hours, but I believe that on this one day in every four or five years we should make things as convenient as possible for the electors rather than for the returning officers and their staff.

As a Member representing a constituency with the peculiar voting habits that prevail in the north of England, I endorse the view expressed by the right hon. Member for Gorton. He will no doubt agree that in his constituency, as in mine, only a small proportion of votes are cast before 6 pm or 7 pm and that the vast bulk of the votes in Manchester, and in the north-west and north-east generally, are cast from 6.30 pm onwards. It would be most helpful if my hon. Friend the Minister would accept the amendment.

Mr. Beith: I believe that we should retain the 10 pm finish, for many of the reasons given by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). Many people in my area are in precisely the position that he described. Women waiting for their husbands to come home from work cannot be certain at what time they will arrive. Drivers and building workers working away from home may leave home before 7 am and may be considerably delayed in the evening. The disadvantages to returning officers and candidates are simply not worth the discouragement and difficulty that would be placed in the way of those who wish to cast their votes later in the day. I believe that we should stick to the 10 pm finish.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: For a change, I support the Labour amendment. I see no reason to reduce polling hours. In Leicester people vote right up to 10 pm and it is important that they should continue to have that right. People working in the mines some distance away may leave home before 7 am. There are also many shift workers in the knitwear industry. I hope that the motive for the proposed change was not the wish of certain Members to get their results on television the same evening. I know that traditionally there is some competition and results from places like Torquay and Guildford are rushed to the screen as quickly as possible. That is not my aim. I entirely support the Opposition amendment which would allow everyone the right to vote at any time up to 10 pm on polling day.

Mr. Mellor: Historically speaking, the 9 o'clock end of polling time has much more tradition behind it. That was the position until 1969. The Speaker's Conference of 1965 to 1968 was very much in favour of retaining the hours then laid down, but the Government of the day insisted on an amendment to extend the hours to 10 o'clock. That has remained the situation. The Select Committee, no doubt persuaded by the evidence of Dr. Butler among others with regard to the 4 per cent. who voted in that last hour, considered that there was no party advantage either way. The Select Committee recommended that polling hours should be brought into line for parliamentary and local elections and should run from 7 am to 9 pm. Acting in good faith on the Select Committee's recommendations as representing an objective cross-party view, we decided to include this in the Bill. We were fortified in so doing by the fact that many of the people who voted in that last hour could vote between 7 am and 9 pm without great inconvenience. However, if they were to vote only in the last hour, the arrangements that we have made for absent voting could be applied to them without any difficulty.

As the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has said, he is much attached to this. In the spirit of amicability and partnership that has governed proceedings in consideration of the Bill, it would be churlish of me to refuse him this. I am therefore content to recommend that the Committee accepts the amendment.

Mr. Corbett: I apologise for the temporary absence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who has duties elsewhere in the House. I thank the Minister for what he has said. We attach great importance to this matter, and I am delighted that he has acknowledged that.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 58, in page 41, line 39, leave out the words '9 at night on the'.

No. 59, in page 41, line 42, leave out '10 at night'.

No. 60, in page 41, line 43, leave out '9 at night'.— [Mr. Corbett.]

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 61, in page 43, line 34, leave out

'YOU MAY VOTE FOR ONLY ONE CANDIDATE'

and insert

'VOTE FOR ONLY ONE CANDIDATE AND PUT NO OTHER MARK ON THE BALLOT PAPER, OTHERWISE YOUR VOTE MAY NOT BE COUNTED'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this we can discuss amendment No. 62, in page 43, line 39, leave out

'YOU MAY VOTE FOR ONLY ONE CANDIDATE'

and insert

'VOTE FOR ONLY ONE CANDIDATE, AND PUT NO OTHER MARK ON THE BALLOT PAPER, OTHERWISE YOUR VOTE MAY NOT BE COUNTED'.

Mr. Beith: The last time that the Minister and I disagreed on a form of words a couple of amendments back, it was a fine matter of judgment. However, in this instance, I think that the Government have got the wording seriously wrong to the extent that it would be misleading to leave the words on the ballot paper in the form that they now propose. As I understand it, the intention of the Government must be the quite reasonable one of explaining to voters that they have only one vote to cast and, as it says in the fuller words appearing in the guidance to voters, if they try to cast more than one vote their vote may well not be valid.

It must be the Minister's experience, as it is mine, that quite a lot of electors have the impression that they have more than one vote. Perhaps they have taken part in a local election in which there are two candidates or more and they have put two crosses on the ballot papers. Maybe they are pioneers of the single transferable vote and, as I have seen one or two people do in most elections, they have put numbers down on the ballot paper. Perhaps they have used the system in trade union elections or somewhere else. Certainly there are always some people who are confused on the point.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman presumably precludes any possibility of proportional representation in allowing people to cast only one vote for one candidate.

Mr. Beith: If the hon. Gentleman will wait until we consider a later amendment, he will find his curiosity satisfied.

It ought to be common ground in the Committee that, in whatever form the Bill finally emerges, the ballot paper must be intelligible to voters. As the Minister has said several times, the exercise of a franchise is a serious matter. People must have the opportunity to cast their votes in conditions that enable them to do so.

It is my well-founded suspicion that the Government have not the slightest intention of changing the voting system in the Bill but intend to continue with the present one. Should that be so, we should ensure that the instructions to the elector explain the matter properly to him. I ask the Minister not to treat the matter lightly because it can cause genuine confusion.

I wondered for a moment in my appraisal of the words

"You may vote for only one candidate"

whether I was taking a view based on my own experience of the English language, having been brought up in the dialect of Cheshire and living now in the rich dialect of Northumberland. I looked at the Oxford dictionary. I did not bother going to the fuller Oxford English dictionary, or even the shorter. Had I done so, I think that I would have had even greater variety. The Oxford paperback dictionary defines the word "may" in several ways: expressing possibility, "it may be true", or permission, "you may go", or wish, "long may she reign", or uncertainty, "whoever it may be". There is an enormous range of possibilities surrounding the word "may". In simpler more everyday terms, it is frequently used in a permissive sense rather than one directing that somebody should act in a particular way.

I am convinced that if the words appear on the ballot paper as now proposed, there will be more and not fewer electors who think that they have some choice in the matter and can vary what they put down. It must be for that reason, I think, that the guidance for voters is a great deal clearer and more explicit. That will contain the wording that I have sought to include in the amendment.

"You may vote for only one candidate"

It is not part of my case to say that the amendment is the only way of resolving the problem. I hope that the Minister will concede that there is a real difficulty. I do not know how he uses the word "may" when he addresses his children at home, but I shall be very surprised if it is not at times used in a permissive sense rather than in a mandatory sense as he seeks to use it here. I plead with him to look again seriously at these words because, if he does not, he will cause more confusion than he started with.

Mr. Mellor: What the hon. Gentleman said about the word "may" I cannot help feeling was an unwelcome return to the chalk face of his previous incarnation because there was a bit of pedantry about it. With the greatest respect to him, if one says to somebody

"You may vote for only one candidate",

I do not think that that can be seen as an invitation to vote for two, three or four, or that more of them will do so. This is not to say that there is not a case for issuing further guidance in appropriate places.

I was wondering what the hon. Gentleman would say as he made his opening bid for attention by suggesting that the wording was seriously defective. When it all turned on the little word "may", I thought that his argument lost some credibility. However, it may be that I am getting churlish as the hours go on. The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) is indicating agreement, which makes me even more resolved in my view that an outrageous proposition has been put before us.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) would have the ballot paper say

"You may vote for only one candidate and put no other mark on the ballot paper, otherwise your vote may not be counted".

There is limited space on the ballot paper. I think that those words, although correct in their proper place, are too many to put on the ballot paper. Having taken issue with the hon. Gentleman over his assault on the use of the word "may", I should say that on more general points the cloak of pedantry slips off and he is on better ground.

7.30 pm

We have become aware of the fact that the notice of guidance to voters displayed at every polling booth has the same appearance as it did 100 years ago. I do not know whether that makes it attractive to the hon. Gentleman, especially bearing in mind what he said in an earlier debate about antique language—however, I suspect not. No doubt he will support the new form, using simpler language, that will be displayed at future elections pursuant to some of the work that we have carried out. The words that he has suggested will be included. I hope that the newer and more attractive format will mean that the words are more heeded and noticed by people than had they been buried in the old form.

The hon. Gentleman knows that in each polling compartment appears the words

"The voter may vote for only one candidate" in addition to a similar invitation on the ballot paper. If, to meet the hon. Gentleman's point, the words that he wants on the ballot paper should be the words in each polling compartment, and if he tabled an amendment to that effect on Report, I should be happy to accept it.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: The Under-Secretary has gone part of the way towards meeting the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). It could be argued that if the words are good for the polling booth, they are good for the ballot paper.

I agree with the Minister that the suggested wording contains far too many words to print on the ballot paper and that they would not be read by the elector in that flurry of anxiety that accompanies the groping for the pencil on the end of the string. The Minister is right to insist that the additional part of the words proposed by the hon. Gentleman should be confined to the notice in the polling booth.

I do not know why the Minister is so insistent in his use of the word "may". In some voting circumstances that word is capable of a different meaning. It can mean that plumping is permitted. If we were electing a different kind of body from this, there might be a question whether or not the elector could plump. I do not know why there should be any objection to putting the words "Vote for one candidate only"—which is simple and unambiguous—at the bottom of the ballot paper. I thought that I detected a sign pass between the Minister and the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. I hope that those words will appear before the House on Report and be accepted.

Mr. Beith: I am grateful for the intervention of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). I also welcome the Minister's comments. As we are in Committee, we can have a useful exchange of views and make useful progress. I am ready to concede that the number of words in the amendment is too many. I had the precise intention of relating what appears in the Bill as likely to be on the ballot paper to what I understood to be the Government's intention—and in no way was the Government's intention expressed more clearly than in the guidance to voters. I wished to draw the attention of hon. Members to what I believed to be a potential difference between what the Government were doing and what they intended.

The Minister must not throw around charges of pedantry. We are trying to design a form of words that people will understand, so we must ensure that the words are in a form that will be understood. If it is pedantic to ensure that Government forms and documents are intelligible to the people, I should be very happy to be a pedant. The Government have failed in their duty to do that on many occasions. I know that the Government are seeking to improve matters, and I am unhappy to see them making matters worse. The Minister made a useful suggestion about the wording that should appear in each booth at polling stations. I want to meet him on that by tabling an amendment on Report, which I hope will be accepted.

The right hon. Member for South Down has hit on the ideal solution to the problem of what should appear on the ballot paper. After all, most people read only the ballot paper. If we get rid of the ambiguous word "may" and give the instruction, "Vote for only one candidate", we will greatly improve the ballot paper while satisfying the Minister's criterion that there should not be too many

Mr. Forth: I should be pleased to give an example which affected politics in Germany and the rest of Europe. It is well known that the West German Government's obsession with the common agricultural policy and their unwillingness to reform it arose directly from the fact that a tiny minority party—the Liberals—held the agriculture portfolio for many years. Because they believed that their representation depended largely on the rural and agricultural vote, the Liberals refused to countenance any reform of the CAP. That is a classic example of the disproportionate effect of a proportional system.

Mr. Hogg: If my hon. Friend wants another example, he need look no further than Israel where the extreme religious parties influence the policy of the Likud to a wholly unacceptable extent.

Mr. Forth: If hon. Members bent their minds to it, they could come up with many examples of proportional systems producing difficulties such as instability, unrepresentativeness and not being understood by the electorate.

Mr. Johnston: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that our system, under which the Conservatives obtained 750,000 fewer votes and 58 more seats, is fair?

Mr. Forth: Yes. I am saying that we must look at all of the factors and weigh them up. Proponents of proportional systems are obsessed with the arithmetical reflection of votes in seats. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is fair."] It is not necessarily fair. It is an arithmetic point and there is no point in arguing about it. Our system scores highly on the comprehensibility of government. Proportional systems are poor on that and for stability and predictability.

However, the most damning feature of proportional systems is their tendency to produce coalition Governments. The Liberal party has lived through the Lib-Lab pact and suffered from it. I should have thought that Liberal Members would understand better the difficulties of coalition as, even now, Liberal Members have to look shamefacedly at what happened during that coalition. If they are offering an electoral system that would give nothing better than what we had under the Lib-Lab pact, they are deceiving themselves, the Committee and everyone else if they believe that it will receive serious support. For that reason, I am confident in suggesting that, although the Committee will reconsider that possibility this evening, it will inevitably come to the conclusion that a proportional system has no support in the country, and will not benefit the country, and for those reasons the Committee will reject it.

Mr. Winnick: This subject is one of the Liberals' hobby horses. Indeed, it may be the main one. There are others, such as site value rating, but certainly new clause 1 has brought Liberal Members into the Chamber. We have not seen them in such large numbers in Committee. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where were you this evening?"] I certainly know where I was. I was speaking and listening to debates on many clauses. The Liberal Chief Whip knows the position well.

8.30 pm

The present electoral system has its faults. I shall not argue that it is accurate and faultless. However, it is tried and tested, and far superior to the system with which the Liberals seek to replace it. One of its strengths is the way in which a Member of Parliament is linked to his constituency. No matter what system of proportional representation were adopted, that linkage would not remain the same. The link between an hon. Member and his constituents is important for both the Member of Parliament and those he represents here. Hon. Members hold constituency surgeries, and constituents know who their Member of Parliament is. If the hon. Member holding the surgery is not a person's Member of Parliament, he will pass the case on to the appropriate colleague.

Mr. Alton: Like the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth), the hon. Gentleman is advancing arguments and then tilting at them and telling the Committee that those arguments are the reason why proportional representation will not work. The system of proportional representation that we advocate is based on multi-Member seats and single tranferable votes — we have made that case again and again to the electorate and during the debate this evening — and the linkage between the elector and the member of Parliament that the hon. Gentleman rightly said should be retained would be retained.

Mr. Winnick: The Committee is not likely to come to the conclusion that the present linkage between an hon. Member and his constituency will be maintained in quite the fashion that the hon. Gentleman suggested under a multi-Member constituency system. At present we have one hon. Member per constituency, about which the hon. Gentleman knows, although he does not believe in its retention.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): May I illustrate the breakage of that vital link between an electorate and its hon. Member by illustrating what happens in my old constituency of Antrim, South, which I and nine others represent in the Northern Ireland Assembly? When I hold my surgery and a constituent is departing, if he is truthful—many are not—he will say, "By the way, I have been to nine other surgeries." The Minister responsible will then reply to nine Members who have fed different aspects of the information to him. It is a complete muddle.

Mr. Winnick: I much appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's comments, which I certainly believe to be valid. There is no doubt that if the same system operated on the mainland, we would have a similar experience.

Mr. Beith: Does the hon. Gentleman think that the system should be abandoned in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Winnick: Northern Ireland is undoubtedly a unique case—[Interruption.] It would have been quite simple for me to bolster my argument by saying that I did not agree. Then Liberal Members would not have been able to ooh and aah. The nature and unique position of Northern Ireland, which fortunately does not apply to the mainland—and, I hope, never will—demands something different. I do not know why Liberal Members ooh and aah as though they are pleased at the position in Northern Ireland — [SEVERAL HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] Whatever line we take on Northern Ireland, that position causes all hon. Members anxiety, as it must do, including Liberal Members, I assume.

As the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire said, proportional representation would make it virtually impossible for any one party to form an Administration, and coalition government would be permanent. When he said that, Liberal Members seemed extremely enthusiastic. Let there be no doubt that, in effect, they are saying that there should be permanent coalition government. Whatever the system of proportional representation, the Committee can reasonably conclude that after an election it would be virtually impossible, except in the most unique circumstances, for any one party to form a Government, and we all know what would then happen.

Mr. Johnston: The hon. Gentleman is perfectly right. The only country that operates proportional representation and where a majority Government have operated since the war is Sweden. Coalition Governments have operated in every other country in Western Europe that has a proportional representation system. In the hon. Gentleman's opinion, has that resulted in poor economic performance or bad administration?

Mr. Winnick: I am not in favour of coalition Governments, and I shall explain why. After an election in which no party has a majority, all the back-room intrigues would have to take place behind the electorate, and some sort of agreement would have to be reached to cobble together a Government. Sometimes it takes weeks before sufficient agreement can be reached to form a coalition Government. That happens in virtually every country that operates proportional representation, and it is the almost inevitable result of it.

Mr. Barron: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. Does he agree that we have glaring examples of that in the so-called alliance party? The differences between Liberal Members and Social Democratic Members on many major issues of British policy are all too glaringly obvious. When the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) read a list of hon. Members who supported his ten-minute rule Bill, it included only Liberal Members, and not one Social Democrat.

Mr. Winnick: I do not know one Social Democratic Member who defected from the Labour party who urged on the Floor of the House a change to proportional representation. As in other matters, such as industrial relations, their present line is very different publicly from that which they took when they were Labour Members. After they defected they became, like Liberal Members, the most enthusiastic supporters of this proposed change in the electoral system.

I am not in favour of what I can only describe as the shabby and cynical deals and arrangements that inevitably occur when no party can form a Government after an election under the PR system. I was asked whether I approved of coalition Governments in Europe. It is interesting to recall the recent uproar, and rightly so, in Austria about the Defence Minister. All the details are not relevant at this moment, so I shall not go into them. However, after he did what he did in such a shameful manner—it is most unfortunate that he can retain his office—it was made clear, when calls were made for his resignation, that if he resigned, his party, which is included in the coalition, would walk out. Therefore, PR introduces that element of blackmail.

It is not just Austria. Let us take Israel. Apart from all the other matters, recently we have had the shameful experience of a person who is clearly a Nazi—I cannot see any distinction between other kinds of Nazis and the one who has been elected to the Israeli Parliament—winning a seat. Of course, Liberal Members say that that is a different form of proportional representation from the one that they want. However, it is a form of proportional representation. It is a system that allows a hate merchant to put across his point of view in the Israeli Parliament. The same is true in other countries, but fortunately to a more limited extent these days.

Israel's proportional representation system also permits blackmail by religious parties. Other parties have had to give way time and again to such behaviour, because it is impossible for any party in that country to form a majority Government on its own.

France has been given as an example. Fascists have been elected to the European Assembly. When the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire gave what happened in France as an illustration of the defects of proportional representation, Liberal Members said, "What is wrong with that? They were elected." No one denies that they were elected, but unfortunately France has an electoral system which allows hate merchants to be elected in such numbers.

Why change a well-tested electoral system for one which, apart from the other reasons that I have given, gives greater opportunities to the hate merchants who have been elected in France, Israel and in other countries? If Liberal Members are genuine, as I hope they are, whatever disagreements we may have, in our common detestation of Fascism, it is not a serious argument to say, "So what if the system is changed and some Fascists are elected? If they are elected, so be it." Is that all that we have learnt from our experience of the 20th century in Europe?

Mr. Alton: The hon. Gentleman is putting up arguments which are self-defeating. The Liberals have already made it clear that they do not favour such a system. Does he accept that people can be elected under the first-past-the-post system whom he might describe as hate merchants? What about people like Mosley and some of the Members of the present House of Commons?

Mr. Winnick: I do not believe I am defeating my argument, but the hon. Gentleman has clearly defeated his. His interesting intervention is self-defeating. He said, "What about Mosley?" We should appreciate the common sense of the British people. Once Mosley left the party to which he unfortunately happened to belong at the time——

Mr. Forth: He belonged to the hon. Gentleman's party.

Mr. Winnick: Yes, unfortunately he did belong to my party. I cannot deny the obvious. Before he belonged to my party he was however, in the Tory party — [Interruption.] Hon. Gentlemen on the Liberal Benches should listen.

Mr. Alton: I am listening.

Mr. Winnick: Mosley was never in the House except as a Conservative or Labour Member. When he tried to form his own kind of Nazi movement——

Mr. Alton: Mosley was here.

Mr. Winnick: Mosley was not here after 1931. The strength of our electoral system is the very point about which the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) is misleading the Committee. Whatever the faults of our electoral system, it did not permit Mosley to come here after 1931. Is it not far more likely that if we had had the PR system in the 1930s Mosley would have stood a greater chance of being here? Presumably Liberal Members would have said, "If he were elected, so be it."

[Mr. Winnick]

Mr. Alton: Under the system that my right hon. and hon. Friends are advocating, it is highly unlikely that Mosley would have been here if he had run under the type of colours ascribed to him by the hon. Member later in his political life. Under the present system people like him can be elected to the House. Is he saying that he does not regard any of the present hon. Members as being from the extremes of politics?

8.45 pm

Mr. Winnick: I was saying—the hon. Gentleman has not contradicted me—that Mosley was never elected to the House after he ceased to belong to one of the two main parties. Neither he nor his cohorts ever succeeded in having any of the blackshirts elected to Parliament. The National Front has not been able to secure Members, unlike the examples that I have given of France in the Euro-elections, Israel or one or two other countries.

Of course, it is possible under our present system for extreme racist organisations to win seats, but that is part of the argument that I was advancing in earlier debates about thresholds and other matters, to try and ensure that that does not happen.

I do not believe that any case has been made out for a change to a different type of electoral system. I can assure Liberal Members—if they are in any doubt—that no party is more keen than mine to relieve the country of the curse of this Government. We want to get the Government out, but we do not want to be bad losers and change the electoral rules because we happened to have lost two elections. We have sufficient confidence in ourselves and the country to be sure that we will have a different Government. When we can secure a majority we will be able to form an Administration on our own. The Conservative party succeeded in the last two elections and formed the Government. The answer is to ensure that we do not have a Tory Government elected next time.

This proposal would mean a change to a system that has all the defects that I have outlined. It would make it easier for the parties promoting race hatred to be elected and it would undoubtedly weaken the link between a Member of Parliament and his constituency. For all those reasons, I hope that the new clause will be voted down by a large majority.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Thank you for calling me, Mr. Lamond, in this cheap party political debate on new clause 1. It is clear that the new clause is a phoney way to try to promote the Liberals. I have listened, as I am sure you have, Mr. Lamond, to what the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has said. I had been expecting massive Liberal party propaganda, but I have not heard it. All I have heard is, "We was robbed." That is the point that comes through clearly.

I must pick up the point made by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). Unlike him, I am fully confident that the Conservatives will be returned with an even greater majority at the next election.

The arguments put forward by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed were phoney. I have agreed in the past with some of the points that he has made. I am disappointed that the consensus in the Committee this evening has been thrown suddenly into a panic by Liberal Members appearing in their droves. They have not been in the Chamber for much of the debate. There are many more present now compared with earlier.

After considering the new clause carefully, as we all have, I see no description of the rules that the Liberal party wants to see played. It has not recommended an electoral system. If it is to be the single transferable vote, everyone's second choice will be the result. Such a system brings about an indecisive Government. What kind of an electoral system is that? Conservatives will vote first for a Conservative, second for a Liberal and third for Labour. A Labour supporter will vote Labour first, Liberal second and Conservative third. A Liberal would obviously vote Liberal first. The Liberals would come out as everyone's second choice because the other two parties are not too bad. That does not seem the right way to control or help a Government. It does not bring about a clear result.

Who would be the real Member of Parliament after such an election? Will there be a regional list with no direct connection between the newly elected Member and his constituents in the region?

In Israel they do not have constituencies. When the Likud Government was in power the Members did not feel that it was necessary to vote when there were divisions in the Knesset because they were not answerable to anyone. The National Front and the British National party together in the 1983 election got about 41,500 votes. Under PR that would have given them a number of seats in the House. I do not want extremists here under any circumstances. The Liberal party is trying to create a dangerous precident, but it is not on.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does not the hon. Gentleman understand that under the single transferable vote system, which was advocated by my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), the National Front and the British National party would not have won even one seat? I think that the hon. Gentleman was present when my hon. Friend was speaking. Did he not hear my hon. Friend say that he was advocating an STV system? Does he not understand the difference between STV and a regional list?

Mr. Bruinvels: I have been in the Chamber throughout the debate, which is more than the Liberal Members have been; most of them have not been here at all. I understand the system. This new clause does not explain the procedure that the Liberal party wants. It is a disgraceful clause.

In regard to the danger of coalition Governments, which could be the result, I can quote Israel, Italy, West Germany and France. All those four countries have suffered greatly the abuse of the little parties trying to tell the big parties what to do; to a great extent, they control the big parties. We do not want to see any party in government dictated to by other parties.

Mr. William Powell: Particularly small ones.

Mr. Bruinvels: Particularly small ones, as my hon. Friend says.

The Committee should look to the European Assembly and take warning that proportional representation could be not too far off. That worries me greatly; I am sure that it worries many hon. Members on both sides of the Committee. One of the daft ideas of the European Assembly is that there should be a common system of voting. As most of the other member states of Europe have a PR system, there is a risk that it could come into force here. I will oppose it with all the force I can, as I am sure most hon. Members will. In this country we have our own system and our own ways of working and we will not be told by Europe what to do.

We have the example of the proportional representation system in Northern Ireland in the recent Euro election. The Members with a dual mandate are not even here. The system has not worked and it is not a good one, as the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) confirmed earlier.

When the Liberals and the SDP get together they can be effective, even with their number of 23 which they very occasionally muster in full. When they have had those 23, plus the hon. Member who got in at the Portsmouth, South by-election, they have delayed the proceedings of the House, as they are trying to do now. They have spoken from the Dispatch Box, they have submitted many amendments to Bills and they have a large say in the running of the House. I have never heard them complaining about that. I have seen them taking the greatest possible advantage of our system.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed referred to the lack of women Members in the Liberal representation in the House. I made a quick check to see how many women were put up as candidates by the Liberal party at the last election. It put up 32, the Conservative party put up 40 and the Labour party put up 78. The Liberals have one or two safe seats, particularly Truro. If they want to hand it over to the wife of the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon), that might be a solution.

Let us consider how the votes were cast at the last election. The Conservatives got 13,012,316; the Labour party got 8,456,934; and the Liberal-SDP alliance got 7,780,949. The Liberals were prepared to fight that election. They have contested elections for many years and have never complained about the system. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]. I should have thought that they would have preferred to say that they would not fight elections because they did not think the system was fair.

Let us consider the policies that the parties put forward. The Conservative party looks for a property-owning society, proper defence and law and order. The Labour party looks for more nationalisation, more public expenditure and no nuclear deterrent. We do not know what policy the Liberals and the SDP have because they do not always agree. That is why they are not getting more seats and more votes. That is where they have gone wrong.

It is interesting to note that the new clause has been tabled first in the name of the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) and that the second name is that of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen). Now we know who is running the alliance.

At the turn of the century the Liberals did extremely well at all elections. They kept winning and had mammoth majorities. They did not complain about the system then. I am told that Lloyd George was a good Prime Minister. At that time they did not want women to stand for Parliament.

If we move forward to February 1974 when the Conservative party lost the general election, we had 297 seats, the Labour party had 301 and the Liberals had 14. They could have controlled the Government of the day. They were offered the chance of power. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and Jeremy Thorpe met to discuss the matter and Jeremy Thorpe ducked out of the deal. The Liberals shied away from taking the power that they are now calling for. Then they had the opportunity of gaining experience of ministerial responsibility. If they had taken the opportunity then, they might have had more seats today because they could have said that they had had control and knew how to run the Government.

The then Liberal party joined with the Labour party and propped up the Government of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) for years on policies of extreme Socialism, with no disrespect to some Labour Members. The Liberal voters had not voted for those policies. Presumably those out in the sticks had voted for a Liberal Government, but the policies on which Liberal Members supported the Labour party were nothing like what Liberal voters had wanted. They let their voters down.

Where are the chances for the Liberal party? It had its opportunity and did not take it. When it has real policies, it will deserve the power for which it is calling today. Real power will come only with real policies. As it stands, the new clause would mean that power would be given to people with no real policies. That would defeat the electoral system. The new clause is a farce and should not be accepted.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I should like to speak in support of the powerful case made by my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), for two reasons. First, despite what the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) has just said, and despite what others have said in the debate, a fundamental principle is involved. It is simply that the number of representatives in the House and in any other elected chamber should broadly reflect the proportion of votes cast for their parties at the election. Under the present voting system that fundamental principle is not being upheld.

When the broad majority of the electorate supported the Conservative party and the Labour party in the 1950s and early 1960s, the House was broadly representative of the proportion of votes cast for those parties. That is no longer the case. It is wrong that not only in the elections to this Chamber but in elections to other chambers around the country that fundamental principle is being breached.

9 pm

That leads to the other important argument in favour of a system of proportional representation, which is that if we have that system, we then have minority Governments and minority councils in proportion to the votes cast by the electorate. This is a minority Government. It is not supported by well over 50 per cent, of the electorate. The previous Government before 1979 were not supported by an even more substantial proportion of the electorate. That inevitably leads to bad government by parties which do not reflect the views of the majority of the electorate. Those who have spoken against coalitions might dwell for a moment on that point.

[Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth]

Surely it is fairer and better for the country that we have Governments who represent the views of a majority of the people. The compromises that are necessary in a coalition Government lead to the Government pursuing policies which represent the views of the majority of the electorate. Although we would not advocate the system that is now in operation in Israel, one could clearly claim that the present Government in Israel, who represent a substantial majority of the people of Israel, are working effectively for that country and pulling it out of the difficulties in which it found itself before that Government took office.

There are other practical points that hon. Members should consider. Some conservative, dyed-in-the-wool remarks are being made by both Labour and Conservative Members, which demonstrate that they have not thought through the system proposed in the new clause. For example, there is the matter of the ties between the Member and his constituency. Of course, the links between a Member and the constituency are a bit of a farce anyway. For instance, I represent half of Stockton-on-Tees. The boundary of the constituency runs right through the middle of the high street, so that one side of the street is represented by one Member of Parliament, and the other by the second Member of Parliament. The boundary runs through the middle of the runway of Teesside airport. Half the airport is represented by one Member of Parliament and half by myself.

What is the community of interest if I can say that half a street is in my constituency? When there is a closure of a factory in the Teesside area, my constituents are affected, as well as others in Stockton, North and Middlesbrough, which is in part of my constituency. No community of interest is represented by the artificial boundaries that happen to be drawn up. I have experienced three sets of boundaries over 12 years in my area, which I have sought to represent. It makes no sense to say that a constituency has a mythological link with the Member of Parliament.

My constituents work in Imperial Chemical Industries and British Steel, miles away from my constituency. Their interests are determined by what is happening to those industries in other people's constituencies. When there is a closure of a plant in which thousands of my electorate work in another constituency, of course I take it up with the firm, even though the plant is not situated in my constituency. It would make much more sense if we had one constituency—as, indeed, our proposals suggest—for the community in each area and a number of Members of Parliament representing that constituency, so that the true interests of that constituency could be represented by those Members.

In addition, that would provide constituents with the possibility of voting for Members of Parliament from different parties, or, indeed, from different shades of different parties. There is a tremendous difference between the views of the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) on the far Left of the Labour party, and the views of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) who is on the so-called Right wing of the Labour party. There is as much difference between those two views as there is between the views of Conservative and Labour Members.

It would be much better if the electorate in the Teesside area were able to vote for the different shades of opinion of Members in the Labour, Liberal, Social Democratic and Conservative parties and exercise their preference in that way. They could go to whichever Member they preferred if they had a problem or issue to raise, as they do in the wards which are represented by more than one member on councils in multi-member wards all over the country.

Mr. Bermingham: I have listened most carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said. How would the communities in new clause 1 be drawn and by what method would the new clause be put into effect, particularly bearing in mind the considerable power that seems to be put into the hands of the Secretary of State? By tradition, boundary commissions, whether we like them or not—the hon. Gentleman and I may well have the same views about how boundary commissions work—have at least had some semblance of independence.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: We made clear and specific proposals in the joint commission report which the Social Democratic and Liberal parties published before the election and in the election manifesto. If hon. Members are interested, we shall be only too pleased to sell them copies of both so that they can read the proposals in detail.

Let me briefly tell the hon. Gentleman that we proposed communities which are multi-Member constituencies which represent real communities, without artificial boundaries. Considerable detail was given. Obviously those boundaries would have to be drawn up in the same way as the present boundaries are drawn up by an independent body. Clearly, such a system would not be introduced without consultation, a Speaker's Conference and the normal procedure that is gone through.

That system of STV, with multi-Member constituencies around communities, would provide the accurate representation of the parties in this place which we think necessary. It would also retain the links between the community and hon. Members and provide a compromise, with a total national list system which would give an accurate representation of the number of votes cast for each party. There are other ways of achieving that, as in Germany——

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East) rose——

Mr. Wrigglesworth: No, I must not give way because many other hon. Members want to speak. The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to explain his case in a moment.

I simply want to add my voice in support of the clause. It would give a fairer system of representation in the House and better government in Britain. A tremendous number of myths are paraded around—we have heard quite a number of them in this debate—about the operation of systems in other countries. If we had had the same success as most of our partners in the EC——

Mr. Barron: And in Italy.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Yes, and in Italy. If our economy had been as successful as Italy's in the past few years, the hon. Gentleman would have something to crow about.

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Wrigglesworth: The hon. Gentleman can make his own speech in his own time.

We must ignore the myths about the operation of proportional representation in other countries, and we must also ignore the myths which are then erected for the variety of systems which other people suggest, which are not the systems which we have suggested for this country. We hear all those cockshies about extremists being elected, when in fact extremists in both the Labour and Conservative parties are sitting in this place at present, masquerading under the labels of those parties, whose views are as extreme, if not more so in some cases than those of organisations which most civilised people in Britain would have nothing to do with.

Let us have nothing to do with these myths that are erected. Let us look at the facts and support the amendment, which would give us much better government in this country and also much fairer representation for the electorate in the House of Commons.

Mr. William Powell: The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) has tried to make the best of what, alas, is a very bad case indeed. I understand that his occupation before he came to the House was that of research officer. It is perfectly apparent that he has not researched history. If he had done so, he would have a deeper understanding of what the function of the House and of Parliament is and realise that the proposal which has been put forward is designed to undermine the entire history and development of our Parliament.

An argument can be made, but let us be perfectly plain that this is what is intended, and before we go down that path we must be very careful and think long and hard about its implications. If the hon. Gentleman had his way it would be necessary for this Chamber to be stripped and redesigned so that it looked like a European Assembly chamber, in a horseshoe shape, because it would simply not be possible to accommodate within the design and structure of this House the representatives of the different parties which would emerge.

We are the trustees of our past which we must hand on for the future. The hon. Gentleman says that it is a fundamental principle that membership of the House should reflect the proportion of votes cast for individual parties at the preceding election. I could not agree with him less. He is wrong about that. He asserts that as a principle but it is utterly unhistorical. I hope that in 500 years, when our successors look back upon these days, they will still recognise it to be unhistorical. Certainly to try to make the change which is proposed on that basis, which really has nothing to do with the constitutional history of our country, is a travesty, and I hope that the House will quite unhesitatingly reject it.

The hon. Gentleman and members of his joint parties try to ascribe the difficulties this country has had to face in the last generation to the absence of proportional representation in the conduct of our elections. That is the most preposterous argument I have heard in a long time. If it is to be asserted that, if we change the electoral system, with a wave of the wand all our troubles will disappear, he must not expect anybody to take him seriously or believe for a moment that we think that even he is convinced by that kind of argument. It could not be more false. The fact is that we have to grapple with our problems in the context in which we are operating. If we try to change the context, we shall still be left with the problems and no progress will be made.

What is proposed in this new clause is a new method of fudging our problems. It is fundamental to the hon. Gentleman's party's policy in most areas that a fudge is the best solution. Its members can argue that course. Let them go openly to the electors and say, "We want a fudge. Vote for us and we will fudge." The electorate can then decide on that proposition.

If that is the way that the hon. Gentleman wishes matters to be conducted in the future, I must say that it is not a sensible way to proceed. Our elections in this country are and always have been designed—certainly since the abolition of dual-Member constituencies, but allowing for that exception going right back into our history—for the election of an individual Member to represent all his constituents. I assert as loud and long as I can that I represent all the electors in my constituency and I hope that I shall continue to do so without fear or favour. I could not care less whether they support the Conservative party, the Labour party, the Liberal party or the Ecology party. They are entitled to individual treatment and representation. That is the historical principle on which the House is elected and, I hope, always will be elected.

9.15 pm

Mr. James Nicholson (Newry and Armagh): Does the hon. Gentleman extend that principle to all elections in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Powell: I do indeed. When delegated legislation was introduced to apply proportional representation to European Assembly elections in Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and I had the rare privilege of joining Northern Ireland Members to vote against that proposal. I see no reason why Northern Ireland Members should not be elected on the same indivisible basis as Members from the rest of the country. I am confident that every Northern Ireland Member has the same uncompromising attitude to all his constituents as have Members from the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Johnston: The hon. Gentleman is confusing two important matters. He is quite right in saying that a Member seeks to represent and deal with the problems of all his constituents irrespective of party, but his constituents also have an interest in the policy pursued by the Government and if a large proportion of them are denied any influence on that it reflects badly on democracy.

Mr. Powell: I cannot accept that contention. Constituents of mine who do not agree with proposals that I support may lobby me and write to me and I make representations to Government Departments on their behalf. I am happy to represent their views in every way that I can. At the end of the day, I have to answer to my constituents. If they do not like the way in which I have done my job, they are entitled to vote against me at the next election. They can judge me on my performance. That is how it has always been.

I see no reason to change a fundamental principle on which our parliamentary system is based because the Liberals and Social Democrats did rather better in the last election than they did on previous occasions. There is no reason why we should change our electoral system just to suit them. I may be wrong, but I believe that our political system is going through a period of transition. There have been other periods of transition in the past. The conjunction of the Liberals and Social Democrats—the alliance, as it has hitherto been called — may well become the second or even the first party in the state. If that is what the electorate wishes, I do not see why we should compromise that possibility by bringing in a new electoral system which would create a permanent veto on prospective changes in policy for a party rapidly being reduced to third place in the nation — the official Opposition, as it is now described. If such a system of change is taking place, it does not justify the change in our electoral system. Our system has worked well down the centuries.

Once upon a time the official Opposition were the third party. In those days they favoured proportional representation. When they became the second party and then the first party, they realised that there was good sense and firm historical basis for the system which was then in operation, the system which we still have. I know that Members who represent the Liberals and the SDP up and down the country extol the virtues of a proportional system of representation. But, in my judgment—and people can make of this what they will—if in due course they become the first party and then the second party in the state, they will not still be proposing proportional representation.

The argument for proportional representation is historical nonsense and a sham, and it deserves to be exposed for the nonsense that it is.

Mr. William Ross: I have not been present in all the debates, but I attended a considerable number yesterday and some today. One of the points that pleased me and hon. Members on this Bench in those debates was the evident willingness of the Government and Opposition Benches to extend parity throughout the United Kingdom. That of course includes Northern Ireland. One is grateful that both Front Benches and, indeed, both major parties in Parliament, should come to the conclusion that the electoral system should be the same throughout the United Kingdom.

Listening to the debate and hearing the exposure of the absurdity embodied in the proposed new clause, one discerns the slow learning process in regard to proportional representation coming to full flower, except on the Benches of those hon. Members who support the proposed new clause.

If there is a party in Parliament that understands proportional representation and its shortcomings, it is the party of hon. Members who sit on this Bench. We are the only Members present in the Committee who have fought elections under proportional representation, who have won elections under proportional representation and who have represented people under that system. Therefore, the only real experts present in the Committee, made so by experience, are the hon. Members who sit on this Bench.

The Liberal spokesmen have talked about the STV system, but the new clause mentions that not at all. It has merely emerged in debate that that is the system that they desire. However, they have made it clear in discussing proportional representation that it is the single transferrable vote system that they wish to come into operation. It is also clear from the proposed new clause that they would seek the periodic expiry of the order bringing that system into operation. The truth is that, unless there was a party with an overall majority in Parliament that was against proportional representation, we would be going through a one-way choke point: once one has it, one will never get rid of it, and one will be stuck with it for ever. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Hon. Gentlemen say, "Hear, hear." However, if they are as willing to learn as many other hon. Members, by the time that I have finished and exposed to them the weakness and foolishness of their case, they may not be so ready to say, "Hear, hear," but will hang their heads in shame for having been so grossly misled for such a long time.

I listened with care to the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), who was so unwilling to give way. If he had given way, I would have asked him to tell us how many seats—[HON. MEMBERS: "He has gone."] I know that the hon. Gentleman has departed, having made his speech, but his hon. Friends are present and no doubt if they catch your eye, Mr. Armstrong, they will be able to answer the question that I put to the hon. Gentleman and to the party of which he is a member. The question that the Liberal party must answer tonight is, how many seats does it see in each multi-Member constituency. It has not revealed that critical point. Having thought about this matter for so many years, it must now be able to answer that point. It will then show how small a minority it wants to make a fulcrum of power in the Chamber.

I have been elected to a local council under the PR system. It is a system that I detest; I have never seen any good in it. It is a divisive and dangerous system. It is foolish to believe that it has anything to offer to good government in this country.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Will my hon. Friend deal with the line adopted by the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), who spoke about mythological boundaries and how the larger constituency provided under PR would make a community of interests? I represent a constituency in another place under the PR system, and I believe that it is a false division that would be parlous for the nation.

Mr. Ross: I shall come later to my hon. Friend's point. When I began to compose this speech, I tried to make it as simple and as short as possible. As the debate has proceeded and as many foolish views have been put forward, I have added to it. I cannot allow the foolishness to pass simply because others do not have the experience to deal with it.

Mr. Johnston: I do not understand how the hon. Gentleman can stand there and say openly and brashly that all of western Europe is mad and foolish for having PR and that only Britain is wise.

Mr. Ross: I will not deal with western Europe as a whole, but only with the one country with which we should all be familiar and which has PR, the single transferable vote system. I refer to the Irish Republic, which time and again has tried to get rid of that system and failed. The people who have lived with that system have recognised its shortcomings.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is dangerous to look at precedents in western Europe because the major nation on the Continent prohibits parties with less than 5 per cent. of the poll from having any members elected? That is certainly a threat to the Liberal party.

Mr. Ross: That is an interesting point, and I have no doubt that the Liberal party will reflect on it. Perhaps it should also reflect on the fact that, when talking about minorities and extremists being elected, it forgets a very simple matter—once we have the PR system, we are not in the same political world. We will have passed into a wholly different set of circumstances and rules. The number of electors giving their votes for different parties will not be the same. The extremists will increase in number. That is the inevitable result of PR. Every country that we study closely knows that fact, unless it is so minded in its own attitude and so isolated from the mainstream of politics that the normal pressures of international politics do not impinge upon it. When there is PR, it is the extremists who always increase their vote.

9.30 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ross: I have already given way quite a lot, but I shall give way again.

Mr. Hughes: Does not the hon. Gentleman agree that it is often better that extremists should appear under their own colours and stand for parties that properly represent their views than that they should hide under the colours of another party so that they conceal what they really stand for? That is what happens when there are fewer parties and when there is no proportional representation. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman was as much aware in Northern Ireland of that serious consideration as I am in England.

Mr. Ross: Whenever extremists stand under the colours of a major party and so conceal their true natures, we find that their opportunities for wickedness are diminished, because they are subject to party discipline. All major parties, especially those in this House, know that that discipline is much stronger than the Liberals seem to realise.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said that he wanted the National Front to stand in order to show how small support for it was. Yesterday, the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) pointed out that 15 candidates lost their deposits at the Chesterfield by-election. Thus, 15 parties had only a few votes cast for them. However, I have not found out exactly how many votes were cast.

Let us consider how the system of STV works in practice. I have with me the results of the district council elections for Northern Ireland in 1981. In Coleraine, in my constituency, the chairman of the Democratic Unionist party obtained 3,203 votes, and his fellow runner obtained 69 votes. Both of them were elected. That is STV in action. It seems ridiculous, but the record is available to those right hon. and hon. Members who wish to examine it. Perhaps they should all do so in some detail.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed and his colleagues supported the introduction of proportional representation in Northern Ireland. It is used for the Assembly elections, for the European elections and for council elections. Just before Christmas the same party tripped through the Division Lobby with the Government on Northern Ireland election orders and so helped to enact a law that was designed to stop Sinn Fein from obtaining any more support. But it is clear to those of us who live in Northern Ireland that Sinn Fein would not have its launching pad, if it had not been for the introduction of proportional representation. That shoots down the speech made by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), who defended the use of the system in Northern Ireland. The plain truth is that Sinn Fein's success in Ulster is proof that that system helps the more extreme parties——

Mr. Simon Hughes: Gerry Adams.

Mr. Ross: Gerry Adams obtained a minority of the total vote. But he gained a launching pad because of the votes that he had obtained earlier in west Belfast under the PR system. He had to get a start somewhere. He would not have got anywhere against Gerry Fitt had he been starting cold. He got a launching pad, took off and succeeded.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I recall being in a television studio when, in the last election, the result for Belfast, West came through. It was clear that the much respected former Member for that constituency, who was not elected, would have won the seat under a system of proportional representation, as opposed to the present hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) who was elected on a minority of the votes.

Mr. Ross: By his intervention, the hon. Gentleman demonstrates his lack of understanding of the system. That seat would not have existed in its present form under PR.

Rev. Martin Smyth: It might refresh my hon. Friend's memory if I recall that in a subsequent by-election for the city council in that constituency, the SDLP, then the party of the former Member for Belfast, West, was eliminated. In other words, one cannot deduce that, had it been a PR election, Gerry Fitt would have won. As my hon. Friend pointed out, under PR a launching pad is given to extremists.

Mr. Ross: I am obliged to my hon. Friend for making that point, and I shall return to that aspect of the problem.

Reference has been made to the system in France. I may be wrong, but I believe that the system there is not proportional representation in any true sense of the term. It is a system of exhaustive voting under which the candidate who gets 51 per cent. of the votes is elected. That is not a good system because it creates the worst factors of the STV system. It allows everyone to stand, to bring their divisiveness and extremism before the electorate and to build on it.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the hon. Gentleman explain how, under the French system, extremism is allowed to surface if, as is the case, after the first ballot those candidates are dropped from the ballot paper?

Mr. Ross: The hon. Gentleman is forgetting human nature. It is the desire of every minority grouping to get a place in the chamber or assembly to which it is seeking election so as to be in a position to express its view to a wider public.

At election time, all the small groups have an opportunity to seek election. They can put forward their views by dividing their general grouping in society. They can thereby test the water, discover where their strength lies and build on that at a future time, perhaps in slightly different places. Under PR, a minority which gets a quota, gets a representative elected. Groups of which the Liberal party do not approve—such as the National Front—are elected.

In an eight-seat constituency one need receive only one ninth of the vote. In a seven-seat constituency, one need receive only one eighth of the votes in theory, but in fact one needs considerably fewer votes. In such a case there would be an enormous number of splinter parties. It would be Chesterfield all over again, but much worse. The votes for all those small groups would be taken into account whenever the quota was decided. Even if the votes for those groups disappeared, the quota for the seats would be much less. It is possible in a seven-seat constituency for a person who receives an eighth or ninth of the votes to get himself elected. This has happened repeatedly in Northern Ireland elections. It will always happen under a proportional representation sysem.

In certain circumstances the PR system gives a person with a small minority the power to make or break a Government. That could happen even in as large an establishment as the House of Commons. The system gives power to a minority to dictate Government policy.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed said that he would like the system to operate in local government because it would prevent the majority party from putting its policies into action. That is the only construction I can put on what he said. I believe that he said that no party could form a majority.

Mr. Beith: I have been misunderstood. On several occasions I have said that, under a reformed system, a party would not have indefinitely almost all the seats on a local authority council when it did not enjoy a commensurate level of support from the voters.

Mr. Ross: That would not mean any change in the political control of that particular council, because, if any party is so strong that it can win nearly all the seats under the first-past-the-post system, it will almost certainly form a majority under the proportional representation system. Therefore, that party will be able to put its policies into action. The use of proportional representational would have no real effect on it.

If there is no overall party majority, there will be demands for deals. Hidden deals will be done. Because no party has a majority, deals must be done. That means that there will always be a coalition. I suspect that a coalition in the House of Commons would always have to include one of the larger of the small parties. One party would always have a toe in the Government door and the two large parties would alternate in government, depending on the type of deal they were prepared to offer to the minority.

Mr. Wigley: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that one of the great needs of local government is to have an effective opposition as well as a switch between governing parties? The danger in those areas that have one-party control is that there is no effective opposition. There needs to be a change of system to get such opposition.

Mr. Ross: In my experience, when there is overwhelming one-party control, the majority party contains a large number of different strands of thought and opposition tends to rise within the party. The party's policy then changes. If it does not change, it is up to the electorate to change it. After all, the electorate are our masters. If they decided to go on with one-party rule, that is their affair, and I see no reason for complaint.

The question of the number of representatives has been raised a number of times today. If there are about seven or eight — usually about seven is the maximum — representatives for a constituency, the electorate will travel around from one person to another, as my right hon. Friend the Member from Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) has illustrated. The electorate is extremely large and because at least seven-eighths of the members of the electorate can turn to a member of the party that they personally support, the cohesion that should exist in any constituency is destroyed.

9.45 pm

The situation is divisive. Whenever a small group of people find that they have managed to get a candidate elected, they immediately start yelling their heads off at everyone else in order to get a few more people elected. That is the reason why people go into politics. They want to get control of the body in which they have representatives. It is simply a matter of using the position and the personality of the various members elected to try to gain control.

Proportional representation is a fudge. It has been disastrous in Northern Ireland. It would do the House no good. We should never accept it here, and I hope to see it ended in Northern Ireland as soon as possible.

Mr. Barron: I want briefly to take up one or two comments that have been repeated in successive speeches.

New clause 1 ducks the issue. It tries to cloud the important principle that was put by the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), who has now left the Chamber again. The alliance parties seem to be saying that, because they received a lot of votes at the general election, they should have more seats. That seems to be the only principle that they are prepared to debate. New clause 1 does not attempt to present proportional representation in any practical manner or to approach the problem of how it would affect hon. Members or, more importantly, the electorate of Great Britain. The alliance Members have done both themselves, and the proponents of proportional representation in the country, a great disservice by ducking the issue of debating specific points.

The hon. Member for Stockton, South and the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) seem to suggest that what they really wanted to debate was the findings of the joint commission. I assume that the joint commission was a commission of the Social Democratic and the Liberal parties. We would have been pleased to be told in detail about that joint commission. As many hon. Members know, joint commissions do not always see eye to eye as far as the policies of the respective parties are concerned. It may be that there is agreement in this case, but it is a great pity that the alliance lacked the political sense to present the findings in a form in which they could be debated, so that we could have considered the effect upon our electoral system. As they did not, I shall not support new clause 1.

In many ways, my heart goes out to the hon. Member for Stockton, South. He said that his constituency is divided from a neighbouring one by the Teesside airport runway, half of which is in his constituency. I should not have thought that that would pose any problems, but if it does he should have a chat to a few other hon. Members. The river Rother — a beautiful river — divides my constituency from that of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy). Half is in my constituency and half is in his, but until half of the river Rother turns up at my Saturday morning surgery to see me about the problem, I do not think that it will bother me too much. I have always thought that parliamentary representation was about representation of people, not water or tarmac.

I cannot imagine multi-Member seats going down too well. As the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) said, people in such constituencies wander around various surgeries in the hope of finding the person who represents them. Even if they do not, they have nine bites at the cherry. We are discussing no more than a theory. The theory is that everything about PR is good and that we should no longer have minority Governments. Presumably people who live in countries that have PR think that minority Governments are bad. Italy has already been mentioned. The hon. Member for Stockton, South declined to give way to me, but all I intended to ask him was whether, leaving aside Italy's economics, he thought that the electors wanted more than 19 changes of Government since the war. I suspect that they do not think that that has been beneficial.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does my hon. Friend agree that Italy is no longer run by government and has not been for the past 20 years? It is run by civil servants. Politicians are almost incidental to the system.

Mr. Barron: I can believe that. Perhaps the hon. Member for Stockton, South is suggesting that the Civil Service should run the country.

It is a pity that new clause 1 does not set out what the joint commission said so that we could have a serious discussion about PR. Some of my right hon. and hon. Friends will disagree with me, but I should be prepared to discuss PR in single-Member seats to see whether it would benefit the electorate. Unfortunately, it seems that new clause 1 is intended solely to provide a system that will enable the alliance to gain the seats that it feels that it should have won on the 1983 poll.

Mr. Alton: We have heard much about coalition today. There has been an extraordinary coalition between the Labour and Conservative parties, both of which want to maintain the present system. That is not surprising, and I do not suppose that any of my right hon. and hon. Friends expected otherwise. The Labour and Conservative parties have a vested interest in keeping things as they are.

I was pleased when the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) said that his mind was not totally closed on the matter. I would be happy to make available to him a copy of the commission's report so that he can read the details about the single transferable vote system. I am sure that it will give him many happy nights of reading.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) almost answered his own argument when he said that he would like to turn the clock back and have the first-past-the-post system at all elections — Assembly and European elections, as well as Westminster elections. In his constituency there are 59,000 electors. About 49,000 people did not vote for him at the general election. That demonstrates the point that many hon. Members would wish to make, especially in relation to Northern Ireland, which is that inevitably if we return to the first-past-the-post system at Assembly elections, the Catholic minority in Northern Ireland would be grossly under-represented. The implications of that are obvious to all hon. Members.

The hon. Gentleman was fundamentally wrong when he said that the emergence of Sinn Fein was due to proportional representation. The reason for its emergence was intransigence and a failure to accommodate the democrats in the Social Democratic and Labour party, and the democrats in the Fine Gael and Irish Republican parties. The failure to accommodate those people led to the emergence of Sinn Fein.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I am at a loss to see how representatives of a foreign nation could be incorporated within a political party, even under proportional representation, in the United Kingdom. That is one of my difficulties. The hon. Gentleman referred to Fine Gael and Fianna Fail, and they are part of a foreign nation. Does he recognise that the Alliance candidate at the local government election in Coleraine who had 500 votes did not get elected, whereas the second Democratic Unionist party candidate with 69 votes did? Does he recognise that, contrary to his statement, the Roman Catholic people in Northern Ireland under the other percentage voting system in Stormont elections were better represented than they are now under proportional representation?

Mr. Alton: The hon. Gentleman will accept that that was a speech rather than an intervention. However, I shall try to deal with the points that he raised. He talked about the influence within Northern Ireland of Irish parties in the Republic of Ireland. As I said, the failure of Northern Ireland politicians to respond to the democratically elected Government in Dublin was a reason for the lack of moderation in Ireland today and for the emergence of extreme groups.

The hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) said that we would have to redesign the Chamber if the electoral system was reformed. I am in favour of seeing the parties in the House coming closer together. If we have to bring in the carpenters to achieve that, I shall not be opposed to it. However, historically he is wrong. After the first world war Liberals and Conservatives sat together in the Government. There are many examples throughout our history of parties sitting and working together.

The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) and others tried to attribute to us forms of proportionality for which we have not argued. Hon. Members have said that we would have a regional system, the Italian system or, even worse, the Israeli system, and that they would lead to dire consequences. We have not proposed those arguments. None of us has advocated that the party should be given greater power. We have argued for community-based proportional representation based on the single transferable vote and multi-Member seats. That would both link an hon. Member with a community and provide proportionality.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), on an interrelated point, talked about the valued link between an hon. Member and his constituency. I also value that link, and regard myself as a community politician.

I have spent 13 years representing people at one level or another. The system that the Liberals advocate would mean that in a city such as mine, which has six Westminster seats at the moment, there would be six seats but each Member would represent one city. That could have many desirable consequences for the electors.

At present there is no Conservative Member in the cities of Liverpool or Glasgow. All those electors are disfranchised in terms of their own party. Many of them do not like the idea of having to go to members of the Militant Tendancy, or even the Liberals for that matter, to have their cases or complaints taken up. They are deprived of good constituency representation.

Mr. Bermingham: The hon. Gentleman raised the point that I sought to put to the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth). He offered to sell me copies of a report that I have already read. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) might tell the Committee—I speak with some experience of boundary commissions, their hearings and machinations, as he is well aware—how big will the communities be? The city of Leicester has three parliamentary seats——

It being Ten o'clock, THE CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee report Progress.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Representation of the People Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour— [Mr. Durant.]

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL

Again considered in Committee.

Question again proposed, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Bermingham rose——

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I hope that this is an intervention and not a speech.

Mr. Bermingham: I always rely upon your ability, Mr. Armstrong, to see the difference between the two. How will the hon. Member for Mossley Hill define a community in rural and semi-rural areas? How many seats does he allot in such cases?

Mr. Alton: I should have thought that that point was obvious, given the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of boundaries and the many hours that he must have spent trying unsuccessfully to fight the last boundary proposals. Social communities in counties and geographical areas often have far more in common than Westminster seats. My constituency stretches from the inner city of Liverpool to the suburbs, through nine different postal districts. Anyone who pretends that there is anything in common, apart from the fact that they live in the same city, between people living in tenemant blocks in inner city Liverpool and those living in the leafy suburbs of the city is mistaken.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that in counties such as Cumbria what he is proposing would be an impossibility? Does he realise that to drive from one end of the constituency that the Liberals wish to set up in Cumbria to the other would take nearly two and a half hours? Whilst that may be acceptable in parts of Scotland where the population is small, in the county of Cumbria, where we have historically relied upon intense representation, it would be impossible to represent 500,000 people in that way. What he suggests is nonsensical.

Mr. Alton: My hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston) will tell the hon. Gentleman that my hon. Friend would enjoy the opportunity of being able to drive from one end of his constituency to the other in two and a half hours. That also applies to a number of my other hon. Friends.

The subject of a coalition has been mentioned. The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) talked derisively about the idea of parties working with one another. In the House in 1977 there was an alliance between the Liberal and Labour parties. Everyone derides that.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Look what happened.

Mr. Alton: The hon. Lady says, "Look what happened." Inflation fell from 19 to 8 per cent. and interest rates fell to 7·5 per cent. They are 14 per cent. today. Mortgage rates fell to 8 per cent. They stand at 12 per cent. today. Unemployment was half of what it is today. If that is weak government, let us have more of it.

It has been said today that we could not possibly move to the single transferable vote system and that the system we have is strong. Not only is the system weak; it is unfair. We do not get value for votes. It cannot be right that it takes 350,000 votes on average to elect a Liberal or Social Democrat compared with 30,000 or 40,000 to elect a Conservative or Socialist. It cannot be right if we believe in the adage that there should be no taxation without representation. In the tax cuts on 19 March the proper place to start might be to do something for the Liberal and Social Democratic voters who are grossly under-represented.

It cannot be right that the Labour party, with just 26 per cent. of the votes at the last election, got 209 seats whereas the alliance parties, with 25 per cent., only 1 per cent. less, got 23 seats. It is even worse that the Conservative party should get 397 seats with only 44 per cent. of the votes, having seen a decrease in its vote of some 700,000.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I want to give a brief illustration of the point. My hon. Friend knows that in Greater London, with 7 million people, the 500,000 people who voted Liberal have got but me to represent them. I am sure that they would like more Members.

Mr. Alton: I am sure that they get very good value in my hon. Friend, but it cannot be right that they should be so grossly under-represented.

The opinion poll published today in the Daily Telegraph shows that the Conservative party would now get 35 per cent. of the vote, yet it is here in vast numbers commanding a majority of over 140. The Labour party would get 32 per cent. and the alliance 31·5 per cent. That is a reflection of what happened at the last general election. Given the trends even under this crazy, Russian roulette system, the amazing thing is that we could end up being the beneficiaries. If we are the beneficiaries next time on the system of first past the post, we will stand by our word and make sure that there is a fair electoral system.

Mr. Winnick: The hon. Gentleman has told us what the Liberals will do if they win under the first-past-the-post system. Even if I live a long life, I doubt that I will ever see that. If the present system has all these terrible defects, why is it, no matter how many years ago it was, that the Liberal party did not change the system when it had a majority in the House of Commons?

Mr. Alton: When we had an opportunity we set up a conference in 1916——

Mr. Mellor: I am sorry to have to teach the hon. Gentleman history. What happened was that a Speaker's Conference was set up in 1917 to recommend the introduction of single transferable votes in parliamentary elections in borough constituencies. But on a free vote on the Representation of the People Bill in 1918, with many Liberals voting against it, the proposal was thrown out. It was only in 1922, with the Liberal party's unerring instinct for jumping on the bandwagon when it has left the station and is on its way well out into the countryside, that it became official Liberal party policy to have proportional representation long after it had become a practical proposition for it to do anything about it.

Mr. Alton: Just as a matter of accuracy, the conference was set up in August 1916, not 1917.

The present system is not only unfair but very divisive. My hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said that if a line is drawn between Bristol and London there are no Labour Members of Parliament below that line. In Liverpool and Glasgow there are no Conservative Members. That means that ugly divisions are opening up. Because of our electoral system, there is a divide between urban and rural areas and a massive divide between north and south.

I shall give the figures for Liverpool. The Conservatives hold 30 per cent. of the vote, only one in three, and did not get a single seat. The Liberals polled 23 per cent., and we got one seat. Labour polled 47·3 per cent., and got five seats. In Glasgow, the Conservatives polled 18 per cent., but got no seats. The Labour party polled 51 per cent. and got 10 of the 11 seats. The Alliance polled 21 per cent. and got the other seat in that city. That demonstrates what can happen under this crazy, flukey electoral system of ours. Another example is Coventry, where there are four Members of Parliament. Labour polled 41 per cent. and got three seats. The Conservatives polled 46 per cent. and got one Member of Parliament. The Alliance polled 20 per cent. and got no Members of Parliament.

The system is divisive, and sets urban areas against rural areas. Let us look at how it reflects itself in the unemployment figures alone. The 100 constituencies with the highest unemployment are mainly in the north of England and industrial areas, and almost all are represented by Opposition Members. Inevitably, the 100 areas with the lowest unemployment are almost all in the prosperous south of England and represented by Conservative Members.

The new clause should commend itself to the Committee for another reason, which is that our present system is hopelessly unrepresentative. In Liverpool in the last municipal elections, 100,000 people voted against the present administration, and 90,000 voted for it. The council, made up of 99 people, comprises 58 Labour, 28 Liberal and 13 Conservative members. Those Labour councillors are not in the same part of the party represented by Labour Members in the Chamber. Most of them are members of the Militant Tendency, the very people that Labour is trying to expel. Indeed, some have already been expelled. Therefore, because of the election system, it is possible to get the extremism to which the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) referred. Militant Tendency members are on the council in the city of Liverpool today, with all the ugly consequences.

Nationally, the situation mirrors itself in a Government elected by one in three of the British electorate, 700,000 fewer than in 1979. An effect of the system is that we get the dogma that my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed talked about. Nationalisation is followed by denationalisation, with the Conservative party polling only 34 per cent. and the Labour party polling 29 per cent. when it came to office. What do we get? British industry is debilitated to the point of exhaustion. The new buzz words are: They will privatise, and the others will deprivatise. They will sell off the council houses, and the others will buy them back again. They will pump the money into assisted places at public schools, and the others will close them down. They will stop overseas aid, and the others will restart it. All that dogma is based on just one in three of the people voting for those things. It is the arrogance of the tyranny of an unelected minority. The first-past-the-post system is also archaic, anachronistic and full of many weaknesses.

Another effect is that in the House there is not a single black face. Increasingly large numbers of people in our community go without any representation. That is because the first-past-the-post system works against black people being chosen as candidates by the selection committees. How many Labour candidates were black or brown? How many Liberal, Social Democratic or Conservative candidates were black? The system works against blacks.

The system also works against women. At 51 per cent., they are the majority in the country, yet there are fewer women in the House than at any time since the second world war. That is because of the first-past-the-post voting system and our failure to have a fair electoral system through STV.

Another argument that we have heard in the debate is that we must maintain single-member constituencies under the present system because it leads to a unique bond between the Member of Parliament and the electorate. In fact it leads to a relationship that is not dissimilar to that of the British Raj with the people of India. It leads to people regarding their domains as safe seats. That is true in many cases. One person with a red rosette could be put up and one with a blue rosette and a donkey could be elected. Some might say that they often are. But the truth is that people do not care about their constituency if they believe that they are in a safe seat. The become arrogant.

We believe in proportional representation not only because it will give the people in the multi-member seats more choice but because it will also lead to more co-operation between parties in this House. One's opponents can sometimes be right. Even a broken clock is right twice a day. If we had a more co-operative system, where parties could learn to work with one another, it would be in the interests of the British people.

The system that we advocate is not only fair and representative but will unite people as well. The system that we have at the moment is like a loaded dice. It is a corrupt, fraudulent and phoney electoral system. Although we know that new clause 1 will not be accepted by the politicians in this Chamber tonight, I can assure hon. Members that there will come a time when we will win by the first-past-the-post system and we shall change it and introduce a fair electoral system. The Conservative party will be sorry that it did not do it when it had the chance.

and often its poll is nearer 5 per cent. That is the party which most West Germans do not want to vote for, but it is the one which is in government for most of the time. If a party is to form a Government in West Germany, it is necessary for it to do a little deal with the equivalent of the Liberal party. Liberal Members are thinking that it would be a lovely thing if that could happen over here. After all, it is so dull having to be an Opposition party.

The Liberal party wishes to cobble together an agreement with whichever party takes its fancy at the time so that it can remain in power. That is the final lie to the Liberal party's case of proportional representation. The Liberal party's argument is advanced as an enhancement of democracy, but in truth it is a negation of democracy. That is because the system which the Liberal party advocates takes the power to elect a Government out of the hands of the people and into the hands of politicians. It would be the decision of the politicians as to the way in which they would be prepared to coalesce within a multi-party House of Commons which would determine the Government, not the straightforward vote of the British people.

We have had a pretty sham debate this evening, which has not convinced anybody of the merits of the case. I urge my hon. Friends and the Opposition to reject the new clause.

Mr. Johnston: The Minister made the arresting and highly original argument that we are somehow now governed by the representatives of the people rather than the representatives or the politicians, and that this Government are genuinely representative of the people. That is not the view widely held now.

The Minister began with a cheap argument that there are seldom Liberal and SDP Members in the Chamber. My hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), the Liberal Chief Whip, pointed out that when he opened this debate there were only two Conservative Members in the Chamber out of a total of 397. Considering the number of Liberal and SDP Members, we do very well indeed—especially considering what we have to try to do in representing both our constituents and the many millions of others who would wish to be represented by Liberal and SDP Members.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham) rose——

Mr. Johnston: I shall give way in a minute — it would be only fair to allow the hon. Gentleman to acclimatise himself to the debate.

Mr. Jessel rose——

Mr. Johnston: The hon. Gentleman must not be so impetuous.

I wish to make some simple points. I do not want to delay the House, but, as hon. Members know, we feel strongly about this matter. Listening to some of the speeches tonight, I felt that I was at a mad hatter's tea party. I had seldom heard a more poorly argued case than that advanced by the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth), until I heard the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels). Heaven knows, few could have improved upon his contribution.

The essential argument of both hon. Gentlemen—and it was touched upon by the Minister, when he paid any attention to the argument—was that coalitions are quite dreadful things.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Gentleman and his friends cannot agree on joint selection.

Mr. Johnston: The hon. Gentleman has woken up.

Coalitions have clearly not been the downfall of Sweden, Finland, or—[Laughter.] What is so amusing about Finland? Do hon. Members find the Netherlands, Belgium or Germany amusing? Why did the new countries to emerge from dictatorship, Spain and Portugal, choose without any hesitation to have a system of PR? Surely that has some relevance and must be seen as having some importance by Conservative Members.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and the Minister argued that absolute majorities were vital. Mr. Stalin was very good at them. But clearly absolute majorities were much more important to those hon. Members than the representation of "dangerous minorities". The "dangerous minorities" that the hon. Member for Walsall, North foresaw——

Mr. Kaufman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Johnston: I will give way to the right hon. Gentleman if he allows me to finish my sentence. The hon. Member for Walsall, North suggested that the great danger of PR was that Right-Wing/Fascist parties might obtain representation and that that would be very bad. The——

Mr. Kaufman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Johnston: The right hon. Gentleman must wait until I have finished my paragraph.

The Minister did not say that he was afraid of Communists becoming Members of Parliament, but there was a feeling that that was what he was implying. What is wrong with Fascists or Communists openly standing under their own colours in the House, instead of standing concealed inside larger parties?

Mr. Kaufman: I simply wanted to make the following point to the hon. Gentleman. He spoke of the dangers of Stalinism, but surely the Soviet Union is a perfect example of PR—100 per cent. of the votes get 100 per cent. of the seats.

Mr. Johnston: That intervention was very much up to the mark for a former scriptwriter of "That Was The Week That Was". It was not an intervention of any substance, but it was entertaining.

I have three final short points to make — [HON. MEMBERS: "Hurrah!"] First, no one on the other side of the argument, which of course spans the Chamber, has answered the simple point that I put in an intervention. Is it fair or reasonable that a party should obtain 750,000 fewer votes and as a result obtain 58 more seats? I cannot see any justification for that. It is not democratic and it cannot be defended. The system should be changed.

My second point touches on something that should concern those hon. Members who think about these things. We know that in recent elections the turnout has fallen steadily. That is not happening where there is a system of PR, almost irrespective of what type of PR exists. That too, must contain some lessons.

10.45 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) developed well the argument about the capricious lack of representation of Labour and Liberal in the south and Conservative in the north and the dangerous effects that such a division is having on the country as a whole.

Local government was discussed briefly. The most appalling example of which I knew was the regional election before last in Scotland when, in the Lothian region, 17 per cent. of the electorate voted in the ruling Labour party, which was elected by one seat and then proceeded to pack every committee and run it on a very ideological basis.

That is the danger of the sort of system that Conservative Members are supporting. The new clause seeks to introduce into this country a better and fairer system of election and, as such, it deserves—even if it will not get it tonight—support.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Representation of the People Bill

New Clause 2

ABOLITION OF MULTIPLE REGISTRATION OF PARLIAMENTARY ELECTORS

'(1) A person shall not be entitled to be registered as a parliamentary elector for more than one constituency in any one year.

(2) In the case of a person who, but for subsection (1) above, would by virtue of his having more than one qualifying address be entitled to be included in the register of parliamentary electors for more than one constituency in any one year, the register in which he shall be entitled to be included shall be the register for the constituency or part of the constituency in which is situated the place at which he has his main qualifying address on the qualifying date.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (2) above, a person's main qualifying address is that one of the addresses referred to in that subsection where he has been personally present for the most time in aggregate during the period of twelve months immediately preceding the qualifying date.'.—[Mr. Beith.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Beith: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take the following—new clause 20—Multiple registration to be an offence—

'(1) It shall be an offence to apply to register as a parliamentary elector for more than one constituency in any one year.

(2) A person guilty of an offence under this section shall be liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale (as defined in section 75 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982) or to both.'.

New clause 21—Voting by persons registered at a place of higher or further education—

'A person registered at a place of higher or further education shall be eligible to vote only in the division which includes the qualifying address from which he qualifies for a local authority grant; and for that purpose shall be eligible to vote by post or by proxy; and section 19 of the principal Act (voting at Parliamentary elections) shall be amended by the addition at the end of subsection (1) of the following—

"(i) those registered at place of higher or further education other than in the constituency of their qualifying place of residence".'.

Mr. Beith: The issue of multiple registration arose incidentally at an earlier stage of our proceedings when the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir. J. Farr) somewhat oddly suggested that, in raising the issue at all, I was breaking some happy consensus that had developed over the Bill. The hon. Gentleman had not read the background properly. It was he, and indeed the Government, who broke the consensus which, strangely, had broken out on the subject of multiple registration. When the Select Committee on Home Affairs considered the matter, it received evidence from my party, the Labour party and the Conservative party and—wonder of wonders—all the parties agreed that, for parliamentary elections, the practice of multiple registration should not be continued. Persuaded by the overwhelming weight of evidence, the Select Committee advised that multiple registration should not be continued.

In arguing that multiple registration is wrong in respect of parliamentary elections, I base my case—as, no doubt, the Conservative and Labour parties did, too—on the view that the vote should be of equal value wherever in the country it is found. A voter who has the opportunity to choose at will between several different places in which to cast his vote has an advantage not conferred on other electors. That advantage tends to relate to circumstances, particularly in the case of people who own, or are tenants of, property in several places.

It is feasible to have a system under which multiple registration occurs so that people can register their reasonable claim—[Interruption.]—to take part in local government in various parts of the country. Does the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) wish to intervene?

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: I am trying to urge your leader to stop talking to his colleagues and listen to you.

Mr. Beith: The occupant of the Chair has no leader while occupying the Chair. The hon. Lady must remember her parliamentary procedures. It is reasonable that someone should be registered in more than one place for local government purposes, if we accept the argument that to own property confers the right to participate in local affairs and the responsibility to pay rates. The issue at stake is whether people should be able to transfer votes at will between constituencies.

The law has changed by way of drift. There was a time when residence was more clearly understood to involve nominating one place as a principal residence. The opportunity to be registered in several places has grown as the interpretation of residence has widened. The Minister has several times quoted as a definition of residence a degree of permanence. It is therefore clearly open to people to claim residence in several places. The Minister's definition seems to be somewhat slanted against students because it is much harder to suggest permanence in regard to a university hall of residence in which most students are able to stay only one or two years.

The elector is under no obligation to choose a principal residence, and new clause 2 ensures that there is some test of the elector's principal residence. That is not the only means of solving the problem. I am not averse to the elector being given the opportunity to choose, when he registers, which he regards as his principal residence. However, for the elector to be registered in several places and then to be able to say, even during an election campaign, "I think that I shall vote in this constituency rather than that one, considering how things are going" is quite wrong.

If there are by-elections in two constituencies and an elector has residences in both, he can vote in both. That is not reasonable or sensible. At one level, the problem might seem to be one of broad principle concerning a matter that seems undesirable but does not have much practical effect. That is not the case, as multiple registration tends to be concentrated in areas where there are many second homes or halls of residence. There is often annoyance and anxiety in such communities that the number of registered electors who live there for only a small part of the year greatly outnumber the normal resident population. In my part of the world, the Lake District and north Wales, it is easy to find communities in which, because of changes that I find unattractive, as they have been rather damaging to some villages, there are more people with second homes than permanent residents.

Tensions are exacerbated when local people think that they are outnumbered on the voting register as well. It is not a proper part of our electoral system to give one class of voters a choice of where they can make their vote most effective. The parties are well aware of that effect of multiple registration, so woo the second home voters deliberately. The Bill makes it easier for non-residents to cast votes and, by widening the postal vote arrangements, we have made it a great deal easier for people with a holiday home which they use for only a couple of weeks a year to vote there, although they are normally resident hundreds of miles away. We should address ourselves to the basic problem of why we should give this right to choose to one class of voters. The present arrangements are wrong and should be changed.

Mr. Gregory: I am grateful at this comparatively early hour to speak to new clauses 20 and 21, and to support the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). My two new clauses 20 and 21 go further than new clause 2 and deal specifically with the problems encountered by a student in further or higher education.

The hon. Gentleman rightly said that students may be in residence at the time of a general election, possibly once during their studies, and in many cases not at all. Students are present in college for at most 30 weeks a year—I am not talking about postgraduates but undergraduates and those in further education. It is important that they do not distort the parliamentary election process and the European elections for the regular electors. The simple solution appears to be to establish the basis on which they can legally vote, that is, in person, by proxy or by post at their main place of residence. That is the place where they may be registered for income tax purposes. I would have preferred new clause 2 to have stated that, as it seems to be the right place to track students down. Furthermore, it is the place to which they apply for their education grant. On that basis I have set out new clauses 20 and 21.

About 241 constituencies are probably affected. That is a considerable number. To start in alphabetical order they include Bath, Birmingham, Erdington, Birmingham, Hodge hill and so on. A considerable number are directly affected by students who live in them for a short time. Students at present can choose to vote in either parliamentary constituency. In 1983 a number of students broke the electoral law and double voted. It is extremely difficult, if not impossible, for an electoral registration officer to prove that a student has voted twice, unless he opens the ballot boxes.

It is comparatively easy for an electoral registration officer to stop that if we enact these clauses because then he will not accept on the register young men and women who are living temporarily in halls of residence or in flats provided by university authorities. It would be comparatively easy to isolate them on the register.

In the unlikely event of a student getting on the register, there is a simple solution. Questions are asked on the forms issued to householders, such as whether an elector is a merchant seaman or liable for jury service. In the same way, it should be asked whether the elector has already registered or intends to register elsewhere for a parliamentary election, and whether the elector is a bona fide registered student. If those questions were asked and a student contravened the law, we could under the new clause take appropriate proceedings against that person.

At present the system is open to abuse. A considerable number of students are unaware that they are breaking the law. This measure gives us the opportunity to take on board those proposals. For those reasons, I hope that my hon. Friend will accept the spirit in which I move the new clauses, and accept the new clauses.

Mr. Wigley: I support new clause 2 with all the passion at my command, because I think that it remedies one weakness to which the Government have failed to address themselves in a Bill in which they have made considerable concessions to achieve all-party consensus.

The Government are aware of the feelings in Wales on this matter. They are not limited to Wales. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) mentioned the problem that arises in his area. We know that it arises in the Lake District, parts of Scotland, south-west England and many other areas where there are a great many second homes.

In Gwynedd, on the latest estimates, there are some 15,000 second homes. There are four parliamentary constituencies. If there is an average of 2·2 people to each household — there is a tendency to be a higher than average figure in holiday homes — and they all registered, there could be 33,000 voters from those holiday homes. That is an average of 8,000 to each constituency.

A controversy arose in the constituency of Ynys Mon, Anglesey, during the last election. A large body of opinion believed that even in the circumstances that then obtained the election was influenced by people from second homes. The majority was some 1,600, if I remember rightly. That is a majority of 1,600 in a constituency which may have had some 8,000 second home voters. The Minister will realise the strong feelings that may arise at the idea that the outcome of an election was determined by second-home owners.

Some of those people may have voted more than once. It is next to impossible to discover whether people have voted in two constituencies. I accept that they would be breaking the law if they did so, but it is almost impossible to enforce that law. The argument has been advanced that it is difficult to restrict registration to one household only. That is no more difficult to enforce than enforcing voting in one constituency only. On balance, to ensure the well-being of the electoral system, the pressure should be to ensure that people can register in one location only.

The problem was bad enough in the last election. I and my party have deliberately not played on the point that those voters swayed the outcome of the election. It can give rise to feeling that we have seen going over the top into extremism. The House is well aware of the problem that has arisen in Wales over second homes.

If we extend postal voting and allow people to vote by post at will, strong feelings will be aroused at the next election. It will be possible to see the number of voters who have voted from addresses outside their constituencies. Those addresses will in all probability identify people as being second-home owners. In numerous constituencies, that may make a difference to the outcome of the election. That will give rise to strong feelings.

With the passage of the Bill in Committee and in another place, the time is right to take steps to avoid that problem. The problem will arise because of the change in the postal voting system that we are introducing in the Bill. Side by side with that change we should take steps to avoid the type of abuse that could arise. That is not an academic point. It is a matter of great anxiety in many areas, and to Members of all parties in the House. That can be seen by the new clauses that have been tabled, possibly for different reasons in different areas.

Accepting all that, and given the feelings that the Minister has expressed—we all welcome the way that he has responded to representations—and the feelings that have been expressed to the Select Committee, I urge the Minister to consider whether it is possible, in another place if not tonight, to table an amendment that will take on board the points that have been made and avoid a problem that will become serious if it is allowed to continue.

11.15 pm

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The patronage secretary of the Liberal party—if I may be permitted to use that term—has moved an important new clause. I wish to comment briefly on its implications for the county of Cumbria and in particular the Lake District.

Within the Lake District there is a major problem of people buying second homes. By careful use of the tax system and mortgage relief they are able to raise money to purchase second homes simply by increasing the mortgage on their first homes, thereby claiming greater tax relief. Therefore, their second home purchases are being funded to some extent by an Exchequer subsidy.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): What the hon. Member is describing is strictly illegal under income tax law. While I bow to his knowledge as to the fact that it goes on, I hope that he will not give the Committee the impression that he is encouraging an illegal practice.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: As a participant in the Finance Bill debates when his patronage secretary gives him permission to intervene, the hon. Gentleman will know that I would not in any way wish to promote that principle. Equally, he will know that the practice goes on. People are purchasing second homes within the Lake District and the national park by playing with the tax system, through mortgage relief.

In acquiring those second homes the people equally acquire the right to multiple registration. Surely that is wrong. Under the new clause that right would be removed or people would be required to declare their second homes as their principal residence and then comply with the criterion laid down in subsection (3) of the new clause.

Within the county of Cumbria this is of significant importance, because there are several marginal constituencies. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said that political parties were endeavouring to woo these voters. The Liberal and Conservative parties may be trying to woo them, but the Labour party is not. The Liberal and Conservative parties have a particular interest because there is a crucial constituency in the county of Cumbria. That constituency, Penrith and The Border, which is highly marginal, is held today by the Conservatives with a majority of only 700, with the Liberals in second place. That constituency has one of the highest percentages of second homes in the whole of the United Kingdom. In parts of that constituency and of my constituency of Workington, which takes in five lakes in the Lake District, there are villages and hamlets where the number of second homes is as high as 30 per cent. The existence of that number of second homes will have a marked effect on electoral results.

I must point the Committee back to a famous by-election in 1976, when Labour lost the Workington constituency. I am not saying that that result was wholly dependent on the existence of second home multiple registration occupiers, but to some extent they will have had an influence on the result. It is known that people choose to exercise their vote in the most marginal seat where they are registered.

Mr. Beith: Is it not also the case that by exercising their vote in a crucial by-election they do not even lose the opportunity to vote in any subsequent election in the constituency where their main home is?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: That only compounds the injustice for those who feel that they have lost because of the existence of the multi-registration right.

I hope that in winding up the debate the Government will take note of the considerable feeling particularly in marginal constituencies and marginal electoral wards, where people have that right and where others believe that in having that right they are grossly and unfairly interfering with an electoral system which should at the least produce a reasonable result.

Mr. Penhaligon: I believe that most fair-minded Members of the House, if they consider this matter in isolation and ignore any political opinions which they have for or against the new clause, will recognise that there is potential for enormous abuse. Many people can use a vote in a constituency which is not their main home, and where they spend little of their time. Just because they happen to own that property, and just because they believe that that vote can be more effective in that constituency than another, they use that vote. That is not the basis of our whole electoral process.

That is an issue in my county. In parishes in Cornwall, way over one third of the properties are second homes or summer lets, and the problem arises with both of them. I recall from my personal experience of running for Parliament in Cornwall that I surprised a few by getting elected in October 1974 with a majority of just 464. It is extremely lucky for me that the Conservatives never realised how near I was to removing them, because I am sure that had they realised it they would have organised the holiday vote in my constituency, which was worth more than 464. Come the next election, the vote was certainly organised. In some of the villages a house has not been built this century. Between 1974 and 1979 the electorate suddenly increased by 50 per cent. What is more amazing is that, now my majority has increased to several thousands, those people have all gone again.

That is an abuse. I suspect that the Minister, who, I recognise, has been a fair man, knows that it is an abuse. The system is within the law. I do not complain about that. The system is the system, and one fights elections on the system. However, going beyond that, I am sure the Minister will recognise that there is an abuse and that the system is unfair. Fairness is important in any electoral system. It must at least be seen to be fair. I am sure the Minister recognises that we do not have the correct procedure.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) raised an interesting problem. I welcome the extension of postal votes to those on holiday. In my part of the world, if an election falls when the holiday industry is on holiday, that seriously affects many who rightly want to exercise their franchise. I do not criticise that. However, there is a real prospect of the situation in marginal seats being abused, especially in Cornwall. It may have happened once already in Cornwall. The abuse might even affect an election result. I do not believe that that is what the Government or the Minister want. The new clause would solve the problem. However, if the Minister would like a slight variation on it, there are other processes.

People feel very angry about the abuse. The anger is not felt, known or read by London. It is a long way away. Such anger is often difficult to register, as people do not understand, do not want to listen and do not want to know. If the people of north Wales, Cornwall and Berwickshire can have their parliamentary representation changed just because some slick organisers use the abuse and the postal vote change to their advantage, that is appalling. Much outrage will be caused among those who live in the area.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): I do not defend the present situation in any way, but is the hon. Gentleman saying that the Liberal organisation in Cornwall has not marshalled the holiday vote in any constituency in that county?

Mr. Penhaligon: I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows that when it comes to who owns those houses, "My party don't do too good." It is true that before now we have encouraged people who have holiday lets in Cornwall, who are Liberals, to register their vote, to try to reduce the advantage that the hon. Gentleman's party has. I am not saying that anybody has broken the law. I am not criticising anyone. It is legal. In the hon. Gentleman's constituency, his party could gather 3,000 or 4,000 of those votes if it wanted to, and he could save himself on the swing about which we are now hearing. What I am saying is that there is an abuse, people are outraged, and I suspect that the hon. Gentleman knows it. We have it in our power today to stop that abuse, and the Minister has the power to give the House that assurance now.

Mr. Mellor: It is with a feeling of tremendous power and authority that I rise to respond to the debate. I appreciate that several hon. Members feel strongly about this matter and that that feeling is not confined to any one party. I understand the position of those who represent constituencies in which there are second homes who feel that people who are inimical to their interests are daring to cast a vote in those constituencies. I also understand that those who have universities in their constituencies, including some of my hon. Friends, feel troubled, and no doubt some of their constituents feel troubled, that people who are only passing through the area can sometimes have a major impact on the political complexion of that area.

However, there are problems and points that have not been made particularly clearly so far that need to be made. First, as we explained in the White Paper — the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) will know that we have had several discussions about this on the Floor of the House and elsewhere and extensive correspondence — it is difficult to make fundamental changes such as the abolition of multiple registration without changing the whole basis on which the register is compiled in Britain. That is not an easy thing, nor is it necessarily desirable.

In the end we must take the argument down to detail because we are dealing with a severely practical matter. We have had much discussion about second home owners, who seem to be a much persecuted minority group so far as one can judge from the way in which they have been spoken of, although I dare say that some of them are decent enough citizens when it comes down to it. One must look at the detail and ask how helpful are the kind of concepts embraced in the new clause—for example, that of the main qualifying address. What does that mean in the context of a man who lives four days a week in London, three days a week in the country and then spends most of his holidays at his country address? Are we to have a court of law counting up faithfully the days of the year that he spends in each of those places?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Let him choose.

Mr. Mellor: That choice may not be acceptable. Some may feel that he will choose the most disadvantageous area.

Ingenious though the new clause is, as I said yesterday when a peripheral spin-off issue of multiple registration was being debated, it is perfectly reasonable for people to hold the view, as many in the House have, and Committees have reported in favour of abolishing multiple registration, when it comes to the detail it is extremely difficult to do it.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I have availed myself of the present law twice, never because of a second home but once because my father was moving with his business when I exercised my vote in north Wales in a constituency where there was a majority of 1,000 instead of in a constituency with a majority of 20,000 and once when I went to college. There need only be a warning on the form that says that only one form a year can be completed before an offence is committed and then no one would offend. There is no practical problem. I hope that it is not a practical disadvantage.

Mr. Mellor: I am glad to hear that the hon. Gentleman is not complaining about second homes on the Bermondsey riviera. Many of the complaints that have been advanced this evening should really be directed to the electoral registration officer. It appears to be suggested that owning a second home in an area is what entitles a person to vote, but it is not. One has to be resident there and the courts have determined that to be resident one's residence has to have "a substantial degree of permanence".

So, if an electoral registration officer is prepared, on the basis of a few weeks' residence a year, to register somebody as being resident in that constituency, the ERO has got it wrong. I am glad that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who knows a great deal about these matters, and others agree with me that it is then for the parties to challenge, and there are ways in which that challenge can be mounted. But it is not the fault of the Government if EROs are putting people on the register when they should not.

11.30 pm

Mr. Gregory: My hon. Friend has raised a point about the qualifying address. I suggested earlier that this could be the Inland Revenue address. I would like him to address his mind to the clauses dealing with the educational point, because a considerable number of students in the constituency of Putney, which might interest him, and certainly in my constituency of York and elsewhere in this country, amounting to just under 300 constituencies, who are materially affected by this. My clause provides "from which he qualified for a local authority grant".

If my hon. Friend is suggesting that the onus should be on the electoral returning officer, what guidance will he give and what staffing will he give? At present, in most parliamentary constituencies there is one clerk who works throughout the year on this, ably supported at the time of a parliamentary election or European election. To put the onus on the parliamentary candidate to suggest that somebody is acting illegally is quite unreasonable. If we are to be reasonable, I should hope that the hon. Gentleman would accept the spirit of this, because the number of illegalities is clearly on the increase.

Mr. Mellor: I am all for being reasonable, but whatever way we look at it, and whatever arrangements are entered into, people will be required to make difficult judgments. We can print all the forms in the world and give people all the options we like, but if someone is determined to make an assertion that is not the case it is extremely difficult in a practical sense to change the arrangements.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: My hon. Friend may not even be aware that it is not the case. Take the example of the universities, where it is the bursar who does the registration. However many warning signs are put on the register, he cannot possibly know that the students will not register elsewhere.

Mr. Mellor: I am beset by the anti-holiday-home people on the one hand and the anti-student faction on the other.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: No, I am not anti at all; I am making a realistic point.

Mr. Mellor: I was not suggesting that my hon. Friend was not being realistic, but I was saying that, if one's motivation in advancing these points is that one objects to a particular category being on the register, it does not make it easy when drafting rules to give total satisfaction on the point that is being made. I just think that in the end we have a clear set of rules. They could not be clearer. It may be that the way in which the rules are being applied by EROs throughout the country has somewhat muddied the pond, but it is perfectly clear to say that someone is entitled to register at an address at which his or her residence has a substantial degree of permanence and to recognise that in the reality of the community as it now exists—and it is not outlandish to suggest that some people should have more than one address — it is possible to have a substantial degree of permanence at more than one address.

It is getting late and I have to say——

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Mellor: No, I shall not give way and it is no good the hon. Gentleman jeering at me that I am on weak ground. We have been over this ground a great deal. I very much regret, being in the business of giving satisfaction wherever that is humanly possible, that it is not possible for the Government to do so here. We have made it clear in the White Paper, in the debate on the White Paper, in the debate on Second Reading, in previous debates in this Committee and in correspondence that it is our considered view that, whatever the rights and wrongs of multiple registration, it is not possible to reach workable and practicable arrangements that do not make the situation more complicated than it already is.

I am sorry, but I have to advise my hon. Friends to resist the new clauses.

Mr. Dubs: I had not intended to intervene, but I think that we should press the Minister further on this. Throughout the long day, until we reached these proposals, the Minister had been on fairly good form, perhaps because he felt that right was on his side. His last speech, however, was disappointing and well below the standards that he had set himself earlier in the day. I believe that that was because his heart was not in it.

The point of principle here is that when people vote in a constituency they should do so because they have been exposed to the campaign in that constituency, because they know who the candidates are, the candidates have been able to reach them with publicity and canvassing and therefore the electors take a full part in political life there. When people take no part in political life and have no opportunity to do so, there is a weakness in the democratic process. [Interruption.] It is no use the hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) shouting at me from a sedentary position.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): You are my Member of Parliament.

Mr. Dubs: That is no thanks to anything that the hon. Gentleman has done for me.

There is a point of principle involved and it is no use trying to be jocular about it. We are dealing with the democratic process and the Minister has not addressed himself to the point. Incidentally—this may be just a quirk—I understand that if by-elections were held on the same day in Berwick-upon-Tweed and in Putney people registered in both constituencies could vote in both by-elections.

Mr. Mates: That is illegal.

Mr. Dubs: I wish the hon. Gentleman would stand up and speak or just keep quiet rather than constantly shouting from a seated position. Even if he is my constituent, there is no need for me to be nice to him if he behaves like that.

It is indeed illegal to vote in two constituencies in a general election, but lawyers tell me that it is not illegal if by-elections happen to take place on the some day in two constituencies in which an individual has a residence and a holiday residence. But that is just a quirk and the main point of principle is not attached to it.

I believe that the Minister has not been helpful on this simply because the problem is difficult to solve. Because we do not have centralised control of the electoral register for the whole country by putting all the information on a computer or whatever, the necessary legal means of enforcement will not be perfect. Because it will not be perfect and the problem is a difficult one, the Minister wants to leave things alone and not bother.

Mr. Wigley: Knowing the Minister, hon. Members may accept that his problem may be the administrative difficulty involved, but people outside will believe that the motive is party political advantage. I do not wish the reaction in my part of Gwynedd to worsen any more than it is bound to worsen as a result of postal voting. We have a reasonably good Bill, but the Minister's failure to respond on this will be a wart on the face of the legislation. I very much hope that he will think again.

Mr. Dubs: I take that point and I hope that the Minister will come back with a more convincing argument. If town hall officials dealing with registration are acting as they should, it is theoretically possible that they could eliminate some holiday voters from the electoral registers. In practice, however, that is difficult to achieve as the law stands. It is a grey area for them and they are under great pressure keeping the registers up to date at all, so unless we change the law in this way it is unlikely that electoral registration officers will take note of the hint given to them by the Minister.

Time-sharing raises another problem, especially in the Lake District and certain other areas. A number of different families could register at the same address and it would be difficult for the electoral registration officer to prevent that from happening. As the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) said, by being progressive and giving people the holiday vote we are opening the door to the possibility of abuse. That possibility exists when an individual can be at two addresses at the same time. By giving the holiday vote, we have a responsibility to ensure that it is not abused, and there is a clear danger that it might be.

I urge the Minister to think again. I ask him to re-examine the Government's proposals and to endeavour to return on Report with a provision that will satisfy the views which have been expressed on both sides of the Committee.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I accept that I have not been present for the entire debate, but the Minister's arguments have been weak. The argument does not rest with holiday homes, and the hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory) is concerned with university, polytechnic or college vote is substantial. There are many ways in which the present system can be exploited, and they could be adequately and properly dealt with, but I do not accept that the Government should act as a perfect policeman. The onus, as in many other spheres, must be on the citizen. If the individual knows that he is breaking the law, he must accept that he is at risk of being penalised. He must accept the implications of committing an offence.

If an individual of 18 or 19 years of age is a student at a college or university, it is probable that he will spend 24, 25 or 26 weeks of the year away from the home which he has left. I am speaking of the normal parental home. Having attended college or university, he might well decide that he will not return to the parental home. He might go into temporary accommodation locally in the summer or elsewhere before moving on or back to his original accommodation. If that happens, it is not an abuse if the student decides that the appropriate place of registration is York, if that is his university. He may spend the larger proportion of the year in York.

I recollect that when I was at college I was spending only two or three weeks at my parents' address each year. That was the family home. I was spending by far the largest proportion of the year at the place where I was at college and during the incidental parts of the year I was elsewhere. The obvious place of registration was my university residence. I retained registration at my parental home because that was the base to which I would presumably return after my university days. That was the only "home" to which I had a right, but it was not the place where I was principally resident.

In many instances, individuals move during the course of a year. My first opportunity to vote was in the constituency of Merioneth, and during the year in question my family moved. Registration had taken place in the October of the previous year at what was the family home. However, my father followed his job to where the company sent him and my family moved to another property, which is where we were on the 10th, 12th or 14th of the month—I confess that I forget the date. It was proper to say that that was the residence at that time. It was the family residence and it was proper for the family so to register. That meant that there was the right to choose when it came to the 1970 general election. I remember making the decision to drive with my father 150 miles from the place where we had gone to live back to the place where we were registered because the percentage relevance of my vote was considerably higher. I am afraid that it did not swing the result—but it moved it far more than it would have done in Pontypridd, which had a majority of about 20,000. There are many examples of where people, for perfectly proper reasons have a choice.

The Minister's concern is either the expressed concern that the proposal is technically difficult, or the unexpressed concern—a suspicion voiced by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs)—that it is vested interest. If the proposal is technically difficult, why should it be the responsibility of the Government to deal with it in every respect? It is a rule of our electoral system that if someone is a citizen of other than Great Britain, Northern Ireland or certain Commonwealth countries with the right to vote here, he is precluded from voting.

As the Minister will know, because people do not read forms carefully there are some who register and exercise a vote even though they are not eligible to do so. They may be Italians, Cypriots or Greeks who have been living here for a long time. The result is that there is a defect in the system, policeable only if the electoral registration officer has a suspicion. People who abuse the system can be dealt with properly. The Minister should be concerned, not with catching every offender, but with ensuring that the system puts the onus on the voter to decide, following a clearly laid out test, where he qualifies to vote, in the knowledge of the penalties that he may face if he abuses the system.

In view of the all-party support that the recommendation has received, the technical arguments are not sufficient to counterweight the arguments of substance. Even though it may be said that in places like York it is not obvious that the Conservative party will be the beneficiary—in some places it indeed has the majority of the student vote, although that always amazes me—nevertheless it must be perceived as being the beneficiary. That appears to be the case in holiday home areas, and it is presumed to be the case in student towns.

Unless the Minister can adequately respond to the arguments that have been advanced on the technical and electoral bases, this great opportunity for dealing with a major potential for abuse will have been lost, which will be a great failing in the work of this Committee and the Government on what is, in many respects—although we have our criticisms—a good Bill.

Mr. Barron: I had some sympathy with the Minister when he tried to defend the indefensible—the question of multiple registration in parliamentary elections. He defended the Government's position by falling back on such phrases as "substantial degree of permanence", when he knows that that could be used by people to register in more than one and up to six or more areas. The Minister should agree to reconsider the matter and come forward on Report with something that will provide a fairer way to approach the issue.

There are no holiday homes in the Rother Valley, although some parts of it are quite beautiful. I have no vested interest, in that I might never be in the position to own a home in Cumbria, south Wales, Devon of Cornwall. Nor does my constituency have a university. Multiple registration is wrong. No hon. Member can say that it has not been abused in the past. It is even more likely to be abused in future, because of other elements in the Bill. The Government should close the loopholes that allow some people to have a wider franchise than others.

I turn to new clause 2. I think that subsection (2) and (3) somewhat cloud the issue. New clause 20, tabled by the hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory) and some other Conservative Members, is probably nearer the mark. It says:

"It shall be an offence to apply to register as a parliamentary elector for more than one constituency in any one year."

The Government should return to the Committee at a later stage and say exactly that. It should be an offence to register in more than one parliamentary constituency in any one year. People should make their choices before they fill in the forms. To talk about substantial degrees of permanency is ridiculous when we all know that someone could pick up the form that drops through the door and never go near that place of residence—whether or not it is in his name—for another two or three months. In those circumstances, multiple registration should be stopped.

Mr. Beith: No one, even among the Minister's more enthusiastic supporters, could say that he has won the argument on this issue. Genuine concern has been expressed from hon. Members in all parts of the Committee about what is widely seen as a loophole. The law is not clear—or, if it is, it is clear in a particularly unhelpful way. If electoral registration officers were able scrupulously and effectively to enforce the test of a substantial degree of permanence with regard to all the applications—and we all know how divorced from the real world such a supposition is—it would not solve the problem that most hon. Members have described.

For example, the classic second home owner has a substantial degree of permanency in his second home. He may go there only for two weeks in the year, but he may have owned it for five or 10 years. There is another category, too, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs). I refer to time sharing. There is certainly a degree of permanence about that, because when someone becomes involved in a time-share contract to purchase occupation, use and residence at a particular property, he does so in perpetuity. He buys a week per year in a property. That is a substantial degree of permanence.

Various amendments have been tabled. Some try to assess what the principal residence is, while others place an obligation on the elector to choose. I should be satisfied if the elector had to decide, when he went on the register, what his principal residence was. That would be sufficient. It would remove the problem of electors choosing at will. There is so much dissatisfaction about this issue, and the Minister has so much misjudged the Committee, that I feel that the Committee should return to it at a later stage. The consensus that existed in the Select Committee, when all the parties agreed that something should be done about multiple registration, has been seen again tonight.

We cannot leave the matter here. In view of the Minister's technical criticisms of some of the amendments, and the movement of opinion, perhaps towards an amendment based on the elector choosing which register to be on, I think that the Committee should return to the issue on Report. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 15

RIGHT OF A VOLUNTARY PATIENT TO REGISTER

'In the Principal Act, section 7(4)(d)(iv), leave out "(other than a mental hospital)" and insert the words "or now resides" after "resided".'.—[Mr. Stern.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Stern: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The subject matter of the new clause has been raised in the House on several occasions, the most recent being when we debated the Mental Health (Amendment) Bill on Report on 18 October 1982. The wording, however, dates back to the Speaker's Conference of 1973-74, which recommended on 25 October 1973 that the Representation of the People Act 1949 be amended so that it ceased to exclude "registration in respect of residence of patients at mental hospitals . . . in that all patients in general hospitals . . . can be so registered . . . to place patients in mental hospitals on the same footing as those in general hospitals."

But the difference that I am describing goes back to 1918 and the Representation of the People Act of that year, which provided that

"those in a lunatic asylum, workhouse, poorhouse or any similar institution should not be treated as resident there for electoral purposes."

It was the view of the Home Office in 1973 that that provision was based on the concept that a recipient of charity could not be regarded as sufficiently independent to vote.

The present position dates from 1948. In the Representation of the People Act 1949, the case for excluding registration in respect of residents of mental hospitals was based on the assumption that patients in such hospitals might resent their presence in such hospitals being made public.

Those arguments seem to have gone by the board, and the principal argument adduced by the Home Office when it came to arguing against the franchise to voluntary patients at the time of the 1973 Speaker's Conference was that mental hospitals drew their patients from a wider catchment area than other hospitals and that the result of a poll could be materially affected by patients not otherwise identified with the locality.

That argument was used by the Minister in the debate in 1982 to which I referred, when he said:

"Many psychiatric hospitals are of a considerable size—a thousand beds and more. If patients were given the right to vote in the area where the hospital is situated, this could lead to a sudden large increase in the electorate in that area. This is naturally viewed with apprehension by local communities. Mental patients will inevitably be to some extent isolated from day-to-day life. We cannot expect them to take a full part in local affairs. Yet the votes of a thousand or so patients could exercise a disproportionate influence, particularly at local elections. The right to cast them could cause resentment in a field where all want to see fears broken down and not exacerbated." —[Official Report, 18 October 1982; Vol. 29, c. 178.]

That argument—which can be summed up by the word "swamping"; the fear that the votes from a mental hospital would be of undue significance in terms of a local or general election—has been proved to be unnecessary on two grounds.

It was argued by the Minister in 1982 that the registration of mental patients in the hospitals in which they lived would be inappropriate because they could not play a full part in local affairs. I shall deal with that argument later.

The Minister argued also that mental patients would swamp the electorate in the area in which the mental hospital was situated. Since the 1982 Act, the reverse has occurred. I am indebted to two officials of MIND, David Brandon and William Bingley, for research not in my area of the south-west—that has proved too difficult—but in the north-west. They have monitored the effect of the changes in the 1982 Act which were designed to make it easier for voluntary patients to register to vote. By 1984, when the Act was well known and fully effective, of a total of 4,881 voluntary patients in 11 hospitals in the north-west 251 patients had registered to vote under provisions which were designed, according to the Minister, to give voluntary patients a greatly increased opportunity to vote.

It could be argued that the low rate of registration was caused by the fact that the majority of patients in those hospitals were incapable of voting under the voting test established in the 1982 Act. On looking at the most capable patients—called the Wessex category 1 patients — who are most likely to be going out into the community under the policy of care in the community one finds that, of a total of 614 such patients in the north-west, only 170 had registered to vote.

It is clear that swamping, the ability of potential voters in a mental hospital to control the local electorate, is not happening and was never going to happen, because the number of people from a mental hospital who vote is tiny in proportion to the total population of that hospital. It is clear also that there are other obstacles to a capable person who is a voluntary patient registering to vote. Two obstacles are placed in the way of a long-term, long-stay voluntary patient before he can exercise his vote. The first is the voting test which was set up by the Mental Health (Amendment) Act 1982. I do not propose in this new clause any change in the voting test, despite the fact that the principle of a voting test is abhorrent to many people. The 1982 voting test was a new provision which has not yet been given sufficient time to ascertain how it operates.

The second obstacle is residence. The Government's intention, as set out in the debate on the 1982 legislation, was clear. It is equally clear that what the Government intended has not happened. The Government said:

"The declaration will specify the address outside the hospital at which the patient is to be registered as an elector. Normally this would be the patient's home address, the address of his family, but patients who have no home address will be able to declare an address at which they were resident before admission or, if necessary, they will be able to declare the address to which they expect to be discharged . . . We have deliberately drawn the provision widely enough to ensure that no voluntary patient will be deprived of a vote because he cannot supply an address." —[Official Report, 18 October 1982; Vol. 29, c. 179.]

With the greatest respect to the then Minister, subsequent events have proved that that provision was not drawn nearly widely enough. The figures that I have just quoted make it clear that it is the residence provision—the fiction that a hospital in which someone has lived for 30 or 40 years is not his residence—that prevents a considerable number of people from registering to vote.

Residence is a fact. In the debate on new clause 2, the Minister said—I was not asleep throughout the whole debate—that residence implies a substantial degree of permanence. Is residence in a hospital for 30 or 40 years not permanent enough for him?

In our electoral legislation, we rightly tie representation to residence. In this one area, we untie the link. One class of potential voters are not entitled to vote where they reside. We create the fiction that there is somewhere else where they should be entitled to vote, if they choose to take up the option to do so.

I recently held surgeries or advice centres in the two hospitals for the mentally handicapped in my constituency. Not surprisingly, I found that the voluntary patients were bringing to me perfectly normal problems. Their problems were such as we hear about in our surgeries every day—problems about local transport and worries about what they read in the newspapers and about local employment opportunities. But half way through the surgery, it suddenly occurred to me that I was probably breaking every parliamentary rule that exists because, if the people talking to me had registered to vote, they were undoubtedly the constituents of any hon. Member other than myself.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman is not breaking a parliamentary rule. He is breaking a parliamentary custom. There is a difference.

Mr. Stern: I am delighted to accept that correction, but some of us do not even like to break parliamentary customs.

Some of those people might only be entitled to register to vote in a constituency perhaps 300 miles away where they might have lived 30 or 40 years earlier. They could not take any of their problems to their hon. Member or to their theoretical local council.

As I have said, the then Minister said of such patients in the 1982 debate that

"We cannot expect them to take a full part in local affairs." —[Official Report, 18 October 1982; Vol. 29, c. 178.]

Perhaps that is not surprising when they have no opportunity to play their part. [Interruption.] When they wish to make known their opinions about local transport services, whether public or private, it is to the local Member of Parliament that they should be able to turn. When they want to express an opinion about social services in the hospital or to bring pressure to bear on local training centre provision, it is their local Member of Parliament on whom they will wish to rely. They will want to rely on their local Member of Parliament for these and other grievances.

There is another, specific anomaly. According to the 1973 Speaker's Conference:

"the disqualification rests on the actual residence, if they have a home address outside the hospital. If I go for a long stay into a normal hospital and I have a private address, then I can vote by virtue of having a private address. If my home has to be sold up and I am in this hospital I can then give the hospital address as my address, and this will be accepted for voting purposes. If I go into a mental hospital and I have a home address, I can still vote by virtue of having a home address. If my home is sold up I can not then give the hospital as my address for voting purposes."

As long as that remains the case, discrimination against voluntary and long-stay patients in mental hospitals will remain an issue.

This is genuine discrimination against people who are entitled to vote as anyone else but who are asked to jump over special hurdles to be able to exercise their vote. They are a small number of people who can already be forced to pass the voting test and who have often been in hospital long enough genuinely to be able to claim that it is their residence. Under existing legislation, however, they are denied the vote. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to think again and to accept new clause 15.

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend has made an interesting speech on a matter about which I know he feels strongly. I shall try to reply in the same spirit. The present arrangements by which voluntary patients at mental hospitals are permitted to register as electors and vote were introduced by the Mental Health (Amendment) Act 1982. That was a substantial step forward, which we might have hoped would settle the matter for some time.

My hon. Friend will know from his careful research —he was not an hon. Member at that time—that the Standing Committee on the Bill introduced a provision, against Government advice, allowing such patients to be included in the register for their hospital address in the usual way. When the matter came back to the House, there was substantial objection to that proposal, but the spirit of the Committee's proposal was accepted by giving voluntary mental hospital patients the right to register as electors, but only in respect of an address other than the hospital. That is how the matter was left in the Representation of the People Act 1983.

I do not know whether the reason why so few people have registered has to do with the qualifications for registration and the tests that have been set, or with the qualifying address. I am not persuaded that it has anything to do with the qualifying address, because servicemen register on the same basis. Some of them may have been away for some time from the address at which they notionally register. My hon. Friend may tell the organisations which are pressing the issue and which are in contact with him that I am doubtful whether the spirit of the Committee is with him in seeking to reopen matters that after exhaustive consideration were resolved as recently as 1982. Although he is fully entitled to put down a marker, as he has done, I am not sure that there is significant support for the proposed change. Although I understand the sincerity of his views, I am afraid that I must advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to resist the new clause.

12.15 am

Mr. Stern: I remind my right hon. Friend the Minister that the recommendation by the Speaker's Conference in 1973 of this change was unanimous. Therefore, I hope that he does not believe that the debate in 1982, which was admitted to have resulted in a compromise, has settled the issue for all time I expect that it will be raised again and again until what I see as an injustice is corrected. In view of my hon. Friend's comments and what he says about an apparent lack of support in the Committee, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 19

ADDRESSES OF PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATES NOT TO BE REQUIRED

'In Schedule 1 to the principal Act, in paragraph 6 (nomination of candidates) the words "home address in full" shall be omitted, and the form of nomination paper set out in the Appendix to the Schedule shall be amended accordingly.'.— [Mr. Gregory.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Gregory: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 19 suggests that a parliamentary candidate should not put his private address on the ballot paper. The reason behind it is security. In former days, parliamentary candidates at the hustings participated fully and people knew where candidates came from and their addresses. Nowadays, we have international espionage, international warfare, anti-vivisection lobbies and a variety of areas in which candidates are subject not simply to verbal abuse, but to physical harm. Therefore, if my hon. Friend the Minister can give a good reason why the address should be retained on the ballot paper, I shall be happy to withdraw the new clause. However, at present, I cannot see why 22c Acacia avenue, followed by the postal address, needs to be on the ballot paper.

If one wishes to show the principal conurbation where a candidate resides, it can be given on his manifesto, and if it is absolutely necessary for it to be on the ballot paper I would be happy to modify the new clause, perhaps on Report, to show the town or city. I see no good reason why genuine parliamentary candidates should be open to abuse and threats to their safety and security by giving their full private address.

Mr. Barron: What evidence can the hon. Gentleman give the Committee of acts of violence to parliamentary candidates? It was certainly not offered to me. Does he think that people in Rother Valley may have been influenced by where the three candidates lived? I have lived there for nearly 30 years, another lived in Reading and the third in London. Does the hon. Gentleman think that that might have influenced voters? In those circumstances, his clause might influence people's minds.

Mr. Gregory: The hon. Gentleman has fallen into the trap that I suggested. If he feels that it is material to show from where a candidate comes and the fact that he has been in the Rother Valley for 30 years, that can legitimately be shown in the manifesto. The candidate could put his private address in also, and some candidates do. The town, city or principal place of residence could be put on the ballot paper. A candidate's private address should not be put on the ballot paper. He is then open to the most invidious physical abuse and other difficulties such as we have seen in Northern Ireland. My hon. Friend the Minister is aware of the problems because of his keen interest in the welfare of animals.

We have international terrorism. Rother Valley may not yet have succumbed to it. I hope that the hon. Member aspires to higher office when terrorists may take a greater interest in him. I belive that the House has a duty to look after genuine parliamentary candidates.

I hope that the spirit of the new clause will be accepted by my hon. Friend and the House. It does not stop anyone from putting his full address on the manifesto or the town or city on the ballot paper.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not clear that some candidates cannot afford to distribute an election address and yet they may wish to tell the electorate that they live locally? How will their problem be resolved?

Mr. Gregory: Their problem can be easily resolved. The number of words allowed on the ballot paper as part of a supporting explanation would permit the candidate to show that he was a local resident. The hon. Gentleman has not raised a genuine difficulty.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Is not that a most undemocratic idea? My hon. Friend would be shutting off the aspiring Member from his constituency. He might as well say that all Members of Parliament should go ex-directory. He is denying constituents the chance of getting hold of their Member of Parliament when they may need him.

Mr. Gregory: I am amazed that my hon. Friend should put that above the personal safety of genuine parliamentary candidates.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: We are not cowards.

Mr. Gregory: I am not so discourteous as to suggest that my hon. Friend has had no experience of international terrorism. If she had an iota of an idea, she would not subject people to that form of abuse and blackmail. I hope that she never is. A number of hon. Members have been subject to it. If she brings her private transport into the Mother of Parliaments, she will be aware of the checks to which we are subjected. I hope that safety will not be disregarded, and that my hon. Friend the Minister will accept the new clause.

Mr. Kaufman: The hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory) raises the terrible spectre of international terrorism swooping down on the Monster Raving Loony candidate for any by-election. I have heard a great deal of piffle spoken in my life, but the hon. Gentleman's argument is as nonsensical as any that I have ever heard.

Who does the hon. Gentleman think he is that terrorists want him? He has taken his own precautions. My hon. Friends, on my behalf, have checked all available reference books — "Vacher's", "Dods" and "Who's Who"—and he has concealed his address all right. They will not get him unless they come to the House of Commons which he identifies as his address, unlike the Under-Secretary who properly lists his address where anyone — animal lib — [Interruption.] Well, he gets a free paint job on his house in that way. The Opposition are completely opposed to the new clause. Electors have the right to know the address of the candidate who is putting himself or herself before them. It is as simple as that. Candidates for the House of Commons are not separated from the people by candidature, let alone by election. We are part of the common people. We are not different or special. We ought not to expect any extra protection, safeguard or security that is not available to any other member of the population. The moment elected representatives or people seeking election regard themselves as superior, separate, part of an elite or a target then, if they do not want it, they have a good solution —do not stand for Parliament. Therefore, I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will kick this one right out.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Anyone who stands for election to the House of Commons knows that he is taking risks on his own behalf and on behalf of his family. Anyone who does not want to take the risk does not have to stand for Parliament.

The hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory) fondly imagines that those who are determined to injure him will not find him just because his address is not in the telephone book or in Who's Who. What a lot of nonsense that is. Those who are determined to perpetrate acts of terrorism, to injure or to damage on political grounds will seek out their victims. The chances are that they will find them. We take that risk voluntarily.

In the aftermath of the dreadful Brighton bombing last year we heard one of the few moments of agreement in the House when there was a fine exchange between the Prime Minister and the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). During that exchange I thought that hon. Members on all sides accepted that the process of democracy should continue unabated and unaffected by the acts perpetrated by terrorists and that we must not be cowed into any form of fear or submission because of those acts.

I understand and respect the motives behind the new clause. I do not share the views of those who suggest that it is simply a way of concealing the fact that candidates have come from far away to stand for election. That will come out in any event during the campaign if the local newspapers are reasonably responsible.

We must surely maintain the spirit of the exchange shortly after the Brighton bombing, by resisting the new clause with as great a majority as we can muster.

Mr. Mellor: I was genuinely interested to hear what the Committee thought of the new clause. I think that a message has come across to me. We need to recognise that there is a real issue involved. When the Select Committee dealt with this matter, it recommended that we should reconsider the requirement that the candidate's home address should be printed on the ballot paper.

In regard to the 1979 general election the Select Committee said in its report:

"a good deal of concern was expressed both by the police and the political parties about the security of candidates, and the Conservative Party witness told us that some candidates were most unhappy at having to disclose their private addresses. In view of the recent incidence of terrorism, we consider that the publication of a candidate's home address could lay him open to an unnecessary degree of danger, and we do not believe that its appearance on the ballot paper carries any great significance for voters".

In fact, that was one of the recommendations that we did not accept. We concluded that, because the candidate's address is also given on the nomination paper and the published statement of persons nominated, little would be achieved by removing it from the ballot paper. That probably remains the right view, although I have great respect for what my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) said. If scope had been given by the response of the Committee, I would have been prepared to take the matter further.

Mr. Alex Carlile rose——

Mr. Mellor: I do not rule out that it might be possible at some stage to examine the matter again. [HON.

10.15 pm

Mr. Bermingham: I thought that the debate was on new clause 1. Perhaps we can return to that. The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) has left the Chamber, but perhaps he will read what I say tomorrow. I intervened in his speech for one reason only. I have read the document which is the product of the joint wisdom of the Liberal and Social Democratic parties. I read it because I am interested in Boundary Commissions and their activities. [Interruption.] Again, one of our latecomers is making silly remarks.

The hon. Member for Stockton, South rightly talked about communities. That argument has been at the heart of most Boundary Commission cases. He complained that Stockton was divided in two. I looked carefully at the document to see how communities could be calculated. If we are to have multi-Member constituencies across the country, they should, presumably, be roughly of the same size. How on earth does one equate the community of interest in Leicester which has three seats with the community of interest in Sheffield which has six with the community of interest in Liverpool which has six, with the community of interest in Birmingham which, if my memory serves me correctly has 12? There is no way in which the seats can be made the same size. If the London problem is added in, the situation then becomes absurd.

When I put that matter to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), he referred to the county councils. We changed those boundaries in 1974 and created all sorts of new things. We destroyed no end of communities of interests while we were at it and we still have not got it right. Where does the community of interest lie in the Oxfordshire-Wiltshire border? What divides the interests of one village from those of a village two or three miles away?

No matter how hard one looks at the idea of creating large conglomerate areas with multi-Member representation, there is no way in which those areas can be balanced in a country with some 50-odd million people with diverse social, cultural and work patterns. Compare Cumbria with Cornwall. The needs are different. The seats need to be smaller. I was once shot down by a Boundary Commission for suggesting that we should reduce the size of all parliamentary seats to 50,000. That would give us about 1,000 hon. Members. We cannot have 650, so I do not know what we would do with 1,000. But at least that was the only figure we could calculate where you could get real communities. That is the basic problem. That is why this new clause is really a load of rubbish from top to bottom.

It is easy to say that we will have a single transferable vote as a panacea for all ills. I do not for one moment believe that the system we have at present satisfies all the criteria of representation that one should perhaps have in a parliamentary democracy. It has ills, but of all the systems in Europe, the western world or the democratic world, at least this can be said for our system: it may have its faults but it is the best one we have. So let us not seek to replace it with a system that has as many flaws as any other system in the world.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the hon. Gentleman really believe that we have such a perfect system when a party can decrease its vote, as that party did at the last election, by 3 per cent. and put up the number of its members in this House by about 100?

Mr. Bermingham: I can answer that question extremely simply. If we have a boundary commission that produces a variation in seat size of from 48,000 to 49,000 in England alone up to some 80,000-odd or, if we take the Isle of Wight, over 100,000, and which quite arbitrarily takes as the envelope size the shire county or the metropolitan county and does not allow old communities to rejoin in crossing those boundaries, of course we get electoral distortion. If the hon. Member wishes me to spend many hours lecturing to him about this, I will do so with pleasure.

If we had had a commission that allowed us to go for comparative numeracy, we would indeed have got a very different result in the electoral voting system in 1983. If we take the London area as a small example of this and compare seats in Richmond and areas such as that with the larger seats in Tottenham and places like that, and allow the voting constituencies to cross the London borough boundaries, which are in themselves quite arbitrary, I think the hon. Gentleman will agree with me that the pattern of results within the London area, even on the same votes cast, would have produced a very different parliamentary result.

So our system is not perfect, but it is indeed the best system we have; and long may it remain so.

Mr. Mellor: By an interesting chance we are debating this motion exactly 100 years after it first became the general rule in this country that we elected our Parliament on a first-past-the-post system in single-Member constituencies. This system having been an ornament of our democracy for a century, I should have thought that a compelling and cogent case would need to be advanced before we would contemplate changing it. I do not think that there can be many people who arrived here this evening anxious to believe in the case for proportional representation, but sceptical about it, who would feel that the heavy burden of proof had been discharged by the Benchers opposite during this debate.

I will say one thing in favour of what we have seen this evening. It has been a very different Liberal party from that to which we are accustomed. We are accustomed in the House to debating some of the great issues that trouble our country—and, indeed, trouble many other countries of the world, including some of those with proportional representation systems—with the second Bench either empty or with one disconsolate, rather depressed-looking individual——

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil) rose——

Mr. Mellor: No. I am not going to give way until I have finished the point. I do not know where the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) has spent the evening, but it has certainly not been in this Chamber and it behoves him to keep quiet. There has often been just one disconsolate-looking Member, frequently making a low-key and inconsequential contribution to the debate. But what do we find this evening? They are as men rejuvenated, as if bottles of Phyllosan had been consumed before the great ordeal of delighting us all came upon them.

The smell of power—the thought of getting their noses into the trough of office—has so excited them that the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) is waving his arms around like a windmill. [Interruption.] I shall not be bullied into giving way.

Alliance Members are supposed to be the advocates of the new politics, but they are as boorish as some of us exponents of the old politics when enough of them are gathered together to give them a bit of Dutch courage. We are treated to the delightful prospect of the hon. Member for Mossley Hill behaving like a spring chicken and waving his arms like a windmill, but no amount of animation gives the case the intellectual substance that it so sadly lacks.

Mr. Beith: I hope that the Minister intends to address himself to matters of intellectual substance rather than continuing to make silly jibes. As he has his back to the Conservative benches he may not have realised that when I was addressing the Committee his party was represented by two or three or at most four hon. Members.

Mr. Mellor: I was talking about all the other evenings that we spend here, although I appreciate that the occasions on which Alliance Members are present stick more readily in their memories.

We have had no coherent explanation of the system which alliance Members wish us to adopt and no coherent defence of the manifest failures and inadequacies of proportional representation in so many other countries. Without the advantage of a briefing on the Fisher committee, by which the alliance sets so much store, although I listened with as much care as I could muster to the speeches today, I should have lacked any insight into the type of system which the alliance wishes to impose on us.

No answer was given to the question of numbers and the variation in the size of constituencies, although Labour Members asked pertinent questions on the subject. I believe that I can provide the answer, although it should not be for me to do so. According to the Fisher committee, some constituencies would have eight Members, others would have five and one or two would have just one. "There's a funny thing," as the late Max Miller would say. And blow me down, the constituencies to have just one Member under the Fisher proposals are the Isle of Wight and Orkney and Shetland. Why should that be? The answer is, of course, that those are two of the few constituencies already represented by Liberals, so there is no need to mess around with the boundaries there, is there? No, indeed there is not.

It has not been shown to anyone's satisfaction how eight Members with a large constituency will be better able to represent their constituents' interests in the House or that the links between the single Member and his constituency will not be severed. It is fatuous for the hon. Member for Mossley Hill to assert that one has to be in the same party to represent a constituent's interest. That is nonsense.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: It is an insult.

Mr. Mellor: As my hon. Friend says, it is an insult. Either the link between the individual Member and his constituency would snap, or the result would be the situation that has occurred in the Republic of Ireland. The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross), who admittedly outstayed his welcome a little, was jeered when he brought the Republic of Ireland into the discussion, but the system proposed by Fisher is almost identical to that obtaining in the Republic of Ireland. Is that the paradise free from unemployment, inflation and all the other problems which the Alliance would have us believe have been brought upon this country by the first-past-the-post system? Again, Irish politics is riven by a parochialism made essential by the fact that each one of five Members is vying to persuade the same set of constituents that he alone holds the key to their interest and that he is capable of being even more parochial than the next Member.

10.30 pm

Mr. Alton: Does this mean that the Government are to bring forward proposals for a first-past-the-post system in Northern Ireland for the European Assembly elections?

Mr. Mellor: That is a flimsy red herring. The more that the hon. Gentleman laughs and thinks that he has been frightfully clever, the more convinced I am that he has raised a flimsy red herring. We have had the politics of the snake oil salesman and nothing of new politics. Do we want the panaceas for unemployment, nationalisation and incomes policy, all the vulgar policies to which we have been subjected, including bad weather and diarrhoea? It is argued that we must have something other than a first-past-the-post system and that without it everything will be so different.

I was fascinated by the intervention of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). I note that he is hiding behind his brief, as well as he might. In an intervention by the hon. and learned Gentleman in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) we were informed that something other than a first-past-the-post system would cure all national ills. Although its aim is to give representation to minority parties, we are told that it is only minorities that everyone loves. It seems that only those minorities will be represented in the House of Commons. That is what the hon. and learned Gentleman told us without the flicker of a smile on his face. This is not the National Front——

Mr. Alex Carlile: The Minister is referring to my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston).

Mr. Mellor: I am not surprised. There is no question of the National Front and the British National party being represented. Those are minorities that are unacceptable and the system would be well capable, apparently, of weeding them out.

I do not think that the issue is quite as simple as that. We have been told about the way in which the proportional system of representation has worked in other countries, but the charges which have been made against its inadequacies are hard to laugh off. The state of Israel, for example, has the most perfect system of PR, short of the Weimar republic in the 1920s. Every minority that polls over 1 per cent. of the total is represented in Israel, but that does not produce the happiest example of a parliamentary democracy. However, Liberal Members say that their form of PR would not be like that. Of course it would not.

Mr. Beith: It would not.

Mr. Mellor: I believe the hon. Gentleman when he says that. The more tantalising example—it is the one which has made Liberal Members so animated this evening—is that of West Germany. In that country there are two parties which are both capable of polling well over 40 per cent. of the vote at most elections. However, there is a party which is the equivalent of the Liberal party. That party has a 10 per cent. share of the poll even at its best,

Mr. Dubs: The hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) said that there were very few opportunities for the House to discuss this matter. In fact, he took full advantage of the many opportunities to discuss it in the debates in Committee and on the Floor of the House on the British Nationality Bill and the House rejected his arguments. The Select Committee also unanimously rejected the argument that he has put forward.

If by some mischance the hon. Gentleman's proposal became law electoral registration officers would be in a very difficult situation. They would have to go through the voting lists and get rid of several hundred thousand people of Irish origin and more than a million people of Commonwealth origin who would not longer be eligible to vote. Few things could be more damaging to the position of Irish and Commonwealth people in this country than the hon. Gentleman's proposal.

Mr. Winnick: The attitude of the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) is very much in line with the comments of the Minister of State, Department of Employment, about Bongo Bongo land. It shows the same kind of racialism, which runs pretty deep in the Conservative party.

Mr. Stanbrook: The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) referred to the difficulties of registration officers in deciding whether a person was entitled to vote as a British citizen, but there would be no more difficulty than there is now when the form states that the person concerned may be a Commonwealth citizen or a citizen of the Irish Republic. Indeed, that entitlement is so vague and so badly understood by the average Briton that it is even more difficult for the registration officer to know who is entitled to vote. The result is that the registration officer does not make inquiries and provided that the householder has signed the form apparently in good faith the names are registered. That would even apply to aliens at present. There would be no extra difficulty if the form stated that the persons registered must be British citizens.

Mr. Dubs: I cannot possibly agree with that argument. There would be a great deal of difficulty if we had to devise a method whereby people of Irish origin had to identify themselves or be identified and to distinguish between those born here and those not born here so as to discover whether they were of British or Irish citizenship. It is no use the hon. Member for Orpington shaking his head. He knows perfectly well that until the British Nationality Act came along children born here to parents of Irish origin became British. There has been no attempt to date to distinguish between those of Irish origin who are now British and those who are not. Even if we could overcome the administrative procedures that have been put before us—it is said that they are simple, but I find them rather complicated—we would be faced with the invidious task of telling those who have had rights in this country for many years that they are to be taken away from them. That task would be all the more invidious as the Conservative Government made the solemn commitment during the passage of the British Nationality Bill that the existing rights of those already here would not be tampered with following the Bill's enactment. Is it being suggested that the Government should renege on that commitment? We would be following a sorry path if the Government sought to breach a commitment which was made so solemnly in response to questions from both sides of the House of Commons.

Mr. Stanbrook: Does the hon. Gentleman know of any other country which grants the right to vote in its elections to foreigners resident within?

Mr. Dubs: There are many features of Britain which are unique and I am happy about many of them. If other countries do things differently, we should not decide to copy them automatically. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not subscribe to the argument that he has just advanced, because he takes pride in the fact that there are features of the United Kingdom which are unique. He is employing a bogus argument which is not worthy of him.

If the provision in question were to become law, those from Ireland and the Commonwealth would see it as an affront. The Irish Government are in the process of providing reciprocal arrangements so that British people living in the Republic will have the right to vote. The hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) has questioned the loyalty of Commonwealth citizens to Britain. There is a problem for many of them because they want to become British citizens but find that wish difficult to realise because of Home Office difficulties that I do not wish to dwell upon now. For the hon. Gentleman to say that Commonwealth people have no loyalty to Britain—many of them are living and settled here—is casting an unpleasant aspersion on those who in many instances have thrown in their lot with this country. Some of them served in the British forces irrespective of whether they were of Irish or Commonwealth origin. The hon. Gentleman makes an unpleasant insinuation when he suggests that they are not behaving as loyal citizens.

We would be following a dangerous path if we followed the proposal that is urged upon us. It would be damaging to community relationships and I am confident that the Committee will say that it will have none of it.

Mr. Mellor: The voting rights of Irish and Commonwealth citizens were considered by the Select Committee; and the Committee recommended unanimously that civic rights arising out of the status established by the British Nationality Act 1948 and the Ireland Act 1949 should not be disturbed. The Government agree with the Select Committee on that point and nothing that has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) has caused me to reconsider the wisdom of the Government's position. I hope that my hon. Friend will not press the new clause to a Division. If he does, I shall advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the motion.

Mr. Stanbrook: I intend to press the new clause to a Division.

New Clause 28

COMPULSORY VOTING

'(1) It shall be the duty of every elector to record his vote at each parliamentary election.

(2) It shall be the duty of each returning officer at the close of each election to prepare a list of the names and descriptions of the electors enrolled for his constituency who have not voted at the election, and to certify the list by statutory declaration under his hand.

(3) The list so certified shall in all proceedings be prima facie evidence of the contents thereof and of the fact that the electors whose name appear therein did not vote at the election.

(4) Within the prescribed period after the close of each election the returning officer shall send by post to each elector whose name appears on the list prepared in accordance with subsections (1) and (2) of this section, at the address mentioned in that list, a notice in the prescribed form, notifying the elector that he appears to have failed to vote at the election, and calling upon him to give a valid truthful and sufficient reason why he failed so to vote.

Provided that the return officer need not send a notification in any case where he is satisfied that the elector—

(a) is dead; or

(b) was absent from the United Kingdom on polling day; or

(c) is known to the returning officer to have been ineligible to vote at the election

(5) Before sending any such notice, the returning officer shall insert therein a date, not being less than twenty-one days after the date of posting of the notice, on which the form attached to the notice, duly filled up and signed by the elector, is to be in the hands of the returning officer.

(6) Every elector to whom a notice under this section has been sent shall fill up the form at the foot of the notice by stating on it the true reason why he failed so to vote, sign the form, and post it so as to reach the returning officer not later than the date inserted in the notice.

(7) If any elector is unable, by reason of absence from his place of living or physical incapacity, to fill up, sign, and post the form, within the time allowed under subsection (5) of this section, any other elector who has personal knowledge of the facts may, subject to the regulations, fill up, sign and post the form, duly witnessed, within that time, and the filling up, signing, and posting of the form may be treated as compliance by the first-mentioned elector with the provision of subsection (6) of this section.

(8) Upon receipt of a form referred to on either of the last two preceeding subsections, the returning officer shall endorse on the list prepared in accordance with subsection (2) of this section, opposite the name of the elector, his opinion whether or not the reason contained in the form is a valid and sufficient reason for the failure of the elector to vote.

(9) The returning officer shall endorse on the list, opposite the name of each elector to whom a notice under this section has been sent and from or on behalf of whom a form properly filled up, signed and witnessed has not been received by him, a note to that effect.

(10) The list prepared and endorsed by the returning officer, indicating—

(a) the names of the electors who did not vote at the election;

(b) the names of the electors from whom or on whose behalf the returning officer received, within the time allowed under subsection (5) of this section, forms properly filled up and signed; and

(c) the names of the electors who failed to reply within that time, and any extract therefrom, certified by the returning officer under his hand, shall in all proceedings be prima facie evidence of the contents of such a list or extract, and of the fact that the electors whose names appear therein did not vote at the election, and that the notice specified in subsection (4) of this section was received by those electors, and that those electors did, or did not (as the case may be), comply with the requisitions contained in the notice within the time allowed under subsection (5) of this section.

(11) Every elector who—

(a) fails to vote at an election without a valid and sufficient reason for such failure; or

(b) on receipt of a notice in accordance with subsection (4) of this section, fails to fill up, sign and post within the time allowed under subsection (5) of this section the form (duly witnessed) which is attached to the notice; or

(c) states in such form a false reason for not having voted, or, in the case of an elector filling up or purporting to fill up a form on behalf of any other elector, in pursuance of subsection (7) of this section states in such form a false reason why that other elector did not vote, shall be guilty of an offence for which the penalty shall be a fine of not less than £5 and not more than £50.

(12) Proceedings for an offence against this section shall not be instituted except by the Chief Electoral Returning Officer or an officer thereto authorised in writing by the Chief Electoral Returning Officer.—[Mr. Barron.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Barron: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I have tabled the new clause to test the feeling of the Committee on the question of compulsory voting, though in view of the empty Benches and the lateness of the hour I do not think that I would carry opinion with me if I were to press the matter to a Division. However, I feel it important that the Committee has the opportunity to debate the issue.

The small turn-out at some elections is viewed with dismay, and while my new clause deals with parliamentary elections, I should like to see the concept applied both to central and local government elections. It seems ludicrous that councillors should be elected to office on the basis of only 12 or 15 per cent. of the electorate bothering to vote.

I have no doubt that from time to time hon. Members have considered the idea of compulsory voting. In a democratic society people have the right to vote; and, being sovereign, they also have the right not to vote. Our form of parliamentary democracy is based on that concept. There could be dangers inherent in that system, however, for if people did not feel the need to vote and turned out in extremely small numbers, we could find ourselves with a Government who were totally unrepresentative of the public at large. In other words, the Government could be elected more by apathy than by the voting determination of the people.

Of course, in a democratic society the state itself is sovereign. That is all the more reason why machinery is needed to ensure that people participate in the organs of government. We must, therefore, balance the two—the need to maintain free elections but to ensure that people participate by voting at elections.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Armstrong. The Under-Secretary of State is endeavouring to prevent an hon. Member from intervening.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): A number of hon. Members are trying to tempt other hon. Members on all kinds of things. We should continue with the debate on the new clause.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): Does the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) accept that the right not to vote must be as sacrosanct as the right to vote? Is it not unusual for a sponsored Member to propose this measure when the NUM is not terribly keen on ballots?

Mr. Barron: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. Perhaps the Conservative party is not keen about electing chairmen. I thought that we were trying to discuss in detail the content of new clause 28. If hon. Members want to digress into a discussion on the mining industry or the absence of a ballot in the NUM, I would be prepared to discuss such matters with them.

People feel that compulsory voting is incompatible with free elections. I believe that it is logical to have compulsory voting while there is a free choice on how to cast one's vote. The individual must have the right to stand for election in a democracy. Some hon. Members might disagree, but I do not believe that there is anything wrong with that, given that people are casting their vote in an acceptable and democratic way and given that people are free to stand for election.

The only time it is wrong to have compulsory voting is when something prevents people from standing for election. We should approach this issue in that light rather than see it as a matter of people being forced into a ballot booth to vote. Perhaps Conservative Members will put their views on that point later.

The provisions in the new clause are based primarily on what happens in Australia where there has been compulsory voting for a long time. I do not believe that any one would say that there is great opposition in Australia to compulsory voting. We are not talking about a country which people view badly. The turnout in general elections in Australia is about 96 per cent. [Interruption.]

Mr. Winnick: On a point of order, Mr. Armstrong. It is becoming increasingly difficult to listen to my hon. Friend with meetings, sub-meetings and conversations on the Conservative Benches. My hon. Friend is making an important point.

Hon. Members: Look at the Opposition Front Bench.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I deplore the number of sedentary interventions.

Mr. Barron: The provisions are based on what happens in Australia, which is a part of the Commonwealth. All hon. Members should recognise that we can learn from what happens in different parts of the Commonwealth, even though sometimes Conservatives give the impression that we cannot. Mahatma Gandhi, the leader of the Indian Congress party, was once asked what he thought of western civilisation. He said that it would be a good idea. When I consider how the civilised part of the globe conducts its affairs, I think that he was quite right. We have much to learn from different parts of the Commonwealth and from its leaders.

We should believe in the system as it operates in Australia. Individually — I have never discussed the matter with my party — I believe that in any circumstances it is better that more people should vote than fewer. I therefore do not object to compulsory voting.

1.15 am

Mr. Stanbrook: How would the hon. Gentleman cope with those who wished to abstain on an issue? Abstaining can be a positive act. It is a perfectly honourable thing to do and is often done in this place.

Mr. Barron: The hon. Gentleman should look at new clause 28 and elsewhere. In Australia, since the introduction of compulsory voting, there have naturally been more spoilt ballot papers. Simply by the law of averages, more voting would mean more spoilt ballot papers. One could make provision for abstention to be registered on the ballot paper, but even if there were such provision, someone might decide not to vote at all as a matter of principle. One would then have to consider the penalties that might be incurred for not voting as required by the state. In Australia the penalties are very small, and I submit that the penalties in new clause 28 should be small, too. I suggest a fine of "not less than £5 and not more than £50."

Even £50 is not a great sum for some or perhaps most people in this country, given that parliamentary elections are only held once every five years. I do not believe that the right to abstain is a major issue.

Mr. Winnick: I am most interested in my hon. Friend's arguments. Many hon. Members will wish to speak on the new clause, which offers scope for much useful debating. It is rather early in the evening——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Is this an intervention or a speech? If it is an intervention, it must be brief.

Mr. Winnick: Would my hon. Friend make provision at some future stage of the progress of the Bill for those who refused to vote on religious grounds, such as Jehovah's witnesses? If it was accepted that some people cannot vote because it is against their principles to do so, there might be more sympathy for what my hon. Friend is trying to do.

Mr. Barron: That would be a difficult question. If one made provision for such people, many other people might claim exemption, too. To some people, the right to abstain itself could be as important as a religious principle. We need to make a decision about the penalties to be imposed. I would not be prepared to make any detailed provision for the right to abstain of religious groups or of anyone else. Anarchists, too, might wish to be added to the list, if I was prepared to make one.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does my hon. Friend agree that we might devise the term "Christian Abstentionist" to cover people who wanted to be in that category?

Mr. Barron: We could define such a group, but that does nothing to stop us from opening the door to people getting away from exercising their vote, which is what the state is asking them to do.

Mr. Bermingham: It is not the state asking the individual to intervene but the individual exercising the right to influence the state. Surely my hon. Friend has it the wrong way round.

Mr. Barron: I dealt with rights at the beginning of my speech. I thought that my hon. Friend had been listening.

Mr. Winnick: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is interesting that the Liberal Benches were full when we were discussing proportional representation and that there is only one Liberal Member and no Social Democratic Members present now?

Mr. Barron: Perhaps the alliance does not think that my new clause will get it as many seats in the House as new clause 1.

The only objection that anyone could have to new clause 28 is subsection (1), which provides:

"It shall be the duty of every elector to record his vote at each parliamentary election."

Later parts of the new clause deal with the anomalies, on the assumption that subsection (1) is accepted. No major crime is involved and nobody would be sent to prison.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is my hon. Friend aware that it is said in Australia that compulsory voting favours the Labour party? It is clear that Labour voters often do not vote. Would my hon. Friend like to reflect on that while on his feet?

Mr. Barron: I have found no such relationship. My hon. Friend has said that Bob Hawke and his party have gained from compulsory voting, but it seems to me that the real beneficiary is the country as more people participate in elections.

I have some figures on general election turn-outs in Australia before and after legislation. People will want to know why I tabled new clause 28, and stand in the Chamber at this early hour of the morning to discuss compulsory voting. The third edition of the 1977 Australian encyclopaedia gives the turn-out figures.

Mr. Winnick: What page?

Mr. Barron: It is page 349. It states:

"The penalties for non-voting are small, but nevertheless the system produces an average poll of 90 per cent. of the registered voters, as compared with less than 50 per cent. when voting was optional."

In Australia the turn-out was lower before compulsory voting was introduced than it is now in general elections in the United Kingdom. The entry continues:

"The 50% figure is actually something of an exaggeration, as the total turnout at the general elections before 1925 was:

1901	52·1%;
1903	39·0%;
1906	46·9%;
1910	59·8%;
1913	70·9%;
1914	61·4%;
1917	68·2%;
1919	69·4%;
1922	54·3%.

It is, however, undoubtedly true that the 1925 election showed an immediate leap to 90·5%."

At subsequent elections the turn-out has always been between 90 per cent. and 96 per cent. All hon. Members will agree that in Australia since 1925 turn-outs have been substantially higher than those in Great Britain.

Subsection (2) to subsection (10) of the new clause deal with the practicalities of finding out exactly who has not voted, and sets out the manner in which to define that. A list is made of those who have not voted for

"valid truthful and sufficient reason".

It is important that the list is made up properly so that no one is penalised who should not be penalised because he has good reason for not turning out to vote at a general election. It is important that the introduction of compulsory voting in the United Kingdom should have the same safeguards. That must be considered extremely carefully.

Subsection (10) to subsection (12) deal with the penalties for people who have not voted and not given good reason for not having performed their duty. The penalties are not less than £5 and not more than £50.

I do not intend to go on for much longer. I am sure that some of my hon. Friends will be disappointed about that. This is an important matter and it should not be talked about frivolously. There is some merit in compulsory voting. It is not an infringement of anyone's right to decide whether to vote. It is a way to get more people to vote. The more people who vote the better. That would not necessarily mean that they are better informed politically. That is not something that we should decide on the turn-out in a general election. It has more to do with the education system, and the need for political parties to be active in society to ensure that people are politically more conscious when they go into a polling booth.

1.30 am

Mr. Beith: This is one of the most ludicrous and unattractive proposals that I have seen placed before us in the time that I have been a Member. It is the ultimate confession of failure. If we cannot persuade people to vote for us, we will force them to go into the polling station at a general election. It is not part of the democracy that any of us believe in that we have to force people to vote. Our approach must be to persuade them.

[Mr. Beith]

The new clause is not open to criticism. The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) has set out the details of what he has in mind. The true offence comes when one reads that the returning officer will send a form to each elector who has not voted inquiring why he failed to vote at the election "and calling upon him to give a valid truthful and sufficient reason why he failed so to vote".

Someone might live in Rother Valley and find the hon. Member unattractive and not wish to vote for him. That person will receive one of these forms on the doormat and will have to give a for not voting. He will have to send the form back to the returning officer. When that local government officer receives the form he will give his opinion whether the reason contained on the form is a valid and sufficient explanation for the elector's failure to vote. That is grotesque. It is one of many such forms that would land on the doormat in the kind of society in which the hon. Gentleman and some of his hon. Friends would like us to live, where there is nothing that we can do for which we do not have the permission of the state, and where the failure to do the things that the state requires of us leads us to being dragged before some commissar to give sufficient and valid reason why we failed to do this, that or the other. That is not the kind of state in which I wish to live. I wish to live in a state where men are free. A state in which voting is compulsory is not relevant.

"valid truthful and sufficient reason"

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) was a little hard on what I found to be an entertaining speech by the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron). He was right to raise the subject of getting more people to participate in our democracy. We all want that. I am not sure, however, that I can go all the way with him in thinking that we should make voting compulsory. We must recognise that people have the right to opt out as well as in. In any event, for the reasons that we have been going over interminably for the past two days, it is difficult to obtain an accurate register upon which one could base a compulsory voting system.

The hon. Gentleman was right to raise the issue. He has researched it carefully. A great many of the basic premises from which he starts are fair, but in going to the point of saying that there should be compulsory voting he has taken the matter a little too far. I hope that he will feel that, having properly aired the subject, he can let it go—and let us go as well.

Mr. Barron: I was nearly going to say that I was grateful for the Minister's comments. Having been given the opportunity to debate the matter, the Committee has not had a great deal to say, except in sedentary interventions.

The idea of forcing people to vote, which has been happening in Australia since 1925, has never stirred any great complaints about the inhuman or ill treatment of people casting votes in general elections in Australia. Earlier the hon. Member was trying to force people to vote by a different electoral system. I thought that there might have been further debate on the new clause.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 29

THREATENING LANGUAGE

'After section 97 of the principal Act (disturbances at election meetings) there shall be inserted the following section

"97(A) It shall be an offence for a person or persons at a lawful public meeting to which the last foregoing section applies, to use words which are threatening abusive or insulting to any racial group in Great Britain.".'.—[Mr. Winnick.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Winnick: I beg to move. That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause deals with the difficulties which arise at meetings held by racist groups. The purpose of the new clause is to make it illegal:

"to use words which are threatening abusive or insulting to any racial group in Great Britain".

I have press cuttings referring to some of the scenes which took place at election time involving organisations like the National Front. It is interesting to note that a newspaper has argued that the way in which these organisations carry on racialist meetings at election time makes a mockery of the freedom to hold such meetings.

The Observer said on 29 April 1979:

"Freedom carries with it many responsibilities, and few would deny that to speak in such a way that groups of people are put in terror makes a mockery of that responsibility. Yet, as the law stands, the National Front has the right to hold meetings in areas with large immigrant communities and preach its frightening humiliating anti-gospel of race hate."

I agree with that comment. It is distasteful, repulsive and ugly that racist candidates can organise meetings at election time with the purpose of making threats and insulting speeches against people who belong to ethnic minority groups.

The law needs to be changed. If we say in the House of Commons that we are opposed to intimidation of people because of their race or colour, and if we pass legislation like the Race Relations Act 1976, we recognise the problem. The new clause tries to change the position in relation to election meetings. It is important that we should try to remove the possibility of the National Front deliberately holding a meeting in an area where it knows that there are a large number of Asians or blacks. This is precisely what Mosley did before the war. He held his meetings in areas like the east end, where there were a relatively large number of Jewish people.

The new clause is modest in scope. If the wording is faulty, obviously it can be rectified on Report. The problem is sufficiently serious for the minority groupings who feel threatened by National Front meetings to make us think that it should be possible to give them the kind of protection outlined in the clause.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am intervening in the debate as I feel that my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) deserves support for the thrust of the new clause, which sets out to protect minorities. None of us can feel happy when in newspapers in various parts of the country and in news bulletins we hear reports of attacks, both physical and verbal, on minorities

Such minorities look to Parliament for the resolution of their difficulty. They feel that it is only in Parliament that decisions can be taken that can transform their position and secure their rights. The new clause is simple in so far as it makes it an offence for

"a person or persons at a lawful public meeting to which the last foregoing section applies, to use words which are threatening abusive or insulting to any racial group in Great Britain."

It is a simple new clause, and I should have thought that the Minister, who on some issues tonight has shown a little flexibility, would think that in the light of the reports—I ask him to listen to what I am saying—that frequently are brought to the attention of his Department, the Government should respond.

The new clause can hardly be opposed in all reason by the Minister. I had thought that, in winding up, even if he were to be unwilling to accept the thrust of the new clause, he would wish and seek to give to the House undertakings that would meet the objectives as set out in the new clause.

My hon. Friend has several press cuttings that reveal that some chief constables believe that they currently have the powers to deal with the problem. However, there are other chief constables who recognise that the powers that they have are not sufficient to deal with it. Therefore, equally, the Minister should identify what powers he believes currently exist to deal with it. He should be willing to address himself in his reply to the question whether, in his view, and on the basis of reports that he has received from chief constables following incidents throughout the United Kingdom, it can be said that those powers are sufficient. I believe that they are not.

If the hon. Gentleman wishes to establish the basis of my belief and that of my hon. Friends who would seek to support me and my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North, he need do no more than invite to his Department, to discuss these matters with him, representatives of the various immigrant organisations in various parts of the United Kingdom, in places such as Birmingham, Manchester and London. When they come to the House and seek the ear of hon. Members, they repeatedly draw attention to what they believe to be a deficiency in the law. While on the one hand the Minister tells us that the law will work—no doubt he will try to reassure us of that when he winds up—on the other hand, those people tell us that the law is not working.

There is clearly a conflict in view. The only way that we can resolve such conflicts is either for internal mechanisms available to Members of Parliament in the form of Select Committees to flash into action, if that be the term, and carry out their own inquiries to establish the truth, or for the Minister himself to set up an independent inquiry or, indeed, a Home Office inquiry to establish the truth.

One way or another that problem must be resolved. People believe that those who address public meetings in the way that has been suggested by my hon. Friend are inclined to use language which is racial in tone and which can unsettle communities. If people believe that and know it to be true, it is for the Minister in this society to ensure that every possible legal power is available to the courts and to chief constables to secure compliance with the law and the protection of minority communities.

1.45 am

Mr. Bermingham: I take on board what my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has said, and I suggest that there has been, and has been known to have been, a difference in practice among various chief constables in dealing wth what are basically section 5 offences under the Public Order Act 1936. If the Minister were to undertake tonight to amend section 97 on Third Reading to make it clear to chief constables that section 97 is in line with section 5, and that therefore section 5 proceedings could be brought in future, we would overcome the problem and get rid of many of the arguments that have been put forward. In some areas police will prosecute people for offensive behaviour at public meetings, whereas in other areas the police do not seem willing to prosecute because they argue that they do not have the powers to bring those proceedings for incidents arising out of meetings.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) has, as always, been most helpful. In referring to a lack of consistency in prosecution practice he is referring to a gap in our criminal justice system to which we are applying our minds at this moment with the Prosecution of Offences Bill and the creation of the independent prosecution service, which should have the effect of achieving greater consistency in prosecution practice.

I listened with great care to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), supported by his hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). The hon. Member for Walsall, North will remember our debate earlier in relation to the use of public meetings to hold rallies by racist groups and the discussion that we had on that. I think that I made it clear there that we share the hon. Gentleman's resentment at such behaviour and recognise that it is intended to be deliberately provocative. Indeed, as we know, in Southall in 1979 it succeeded in so being.

I have looked at the hon. Gentleman's new clause, and if I thought that there was any hiatus in the law I would be prepared to address it. But the law on this point is clear, and provided that we can make prosecution practice consistent, which I think the hon. Member for St. Helens, South will be minded to agree will come about with the independent prosecution service, it is hard to think that people will be able to stir up racial hatred in speeches without being brought to book.

I was invited by the hon. Member for Workington to state with clarity the present law. It is contained in section 5A of the Public Order Act 1936, which was amended by the Labour Government in 1976 by section 70 of the Race Relations Act 1976 to provide that:

"A person commits an offence if—

(a) he publishes or distributes written matter which is threatening, abusive or insulting; or"—

this is the relevant part for public meetings—

"(b) he uses in any public place or at any public meeting words which are threatening, abusive or insulting, in a case where, having regard to all the circumstances, hatred is likely to be stirred up against any racial group in Great Britain by the matter or words in question."

I should have thought that that would catch any racially inflammatory language of the kind the hon. Member for Walsall, North has rightly deplored. If, having had the opportunity of hearing what I say, he can bring to my notice any cases where it appears that the law is not being enforced, or any instances where reprehensible behaviour has occurred where apparently no breach of the law took place, I shall be more than willing to investigate.

I hope that I have made it clear to the hon. Gentleman that the law, which has been looked at within the last decade by a Labour Government, was intended, rightly, to be tight on these matters, and I hope that, certainly after the Prosecution of Offences Bill becomes law, we shall be able to deal with this problem wherever it might arise in the country.

Mr. Winnick: I have listened to the Minister and I think he recognises that the problem exists. The new clause was moved on the basis that as the Bill was going through the House it was a good opportunity to try to rectify the situation.

I have in my hand reports of meetings over the last few years in various parts of the country. They refer to riots at National Front meetings and make comments such as, "National Front meeting erupts into violence", "Police called to National Front election meeting", "Police break up electoral brawl", "Violence grows at hustings", and so on. It is in cases such as these that many of us are concerned that there is a breach of the law.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) pointed out, people seek protection from the House of Commons. It is all very well to say that protection exists, but if at a general election or a by-election meeting people come in who are little more than political gangsters, whose sole purpose is to produce as much violence and hatred as possible in an area where there are large numbers of people from an immigrant background, in my view the law needs to be rectified.

The Minister is saying that there might be some other means of tackling this problem in the near future, but I would be much happier if the Government were willing to accept either the new clause which I have moved, or another clause perhaps differently worded, which would to a large extent deal with the problem which I have outlined to the Committee today.

Question put and negatived.

Schedule 4

REPEALS

Amendment made: No. 84, in page 48, line 30, at end add—

'1984 c.60.	The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.	In Schedule 7, in Part I, in column 3 of the entry relating to the Representation of the People Act 1983, the words "In Schedule 1, paragraph 36"'. — [Mr. Mellor.]

Schedule 4, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported, with amendments.

Bill, as amended, to be considered this day; and to be printed. [Bill 87.]

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 80(5) (Standing Committees on European Community documents.)

WINE REGIME

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 9182/84, 11388/84 and 4096/85 (replacing 9469/84), draft Regulations reforming the wine regime and amendments to the original proposals; and supports the Government's intention to achieve reforms in the wine policy so as to curb over-production of wine and wine alcohol.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Question agreed to.

PETITIONS

Human Embryos

1.54 am

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): I beg to ask leave to present, on behalf of 1,000 or more of my constituents, a petition for the protection of the human embryo. This petition, which has been signed by constituents from all parts of South-West Hertfordshire, affirms that the newly fertilised human embryo is a real, living, individual human being.

Today, as the previously accepted moral position is pressed by scientific advances, it is perhaps opportune that I am presenting this petition on the very eve of the Second Reading of the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). The petition concludes:

That this House of Commmons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure which involves the purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experimentation, unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned.

To lie upon the Table.

1.55 am

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I beg to ask the leave of the House to present a petition signed by 3,450 people from all parts of my constituency relating to the Warnock report and the issues outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page). The petition is in the same terms as the one that he has presented. As he has so fully outlined the circumstances and as so many similar petitions have been presented to the House, I shall develop the matter no further save to say that I entirely agree with all those who have signed the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Molesworth Airbase

1.56 am

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I beg to ask the leave of the House to present a petition on behalf of myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), whom I am delighted to see in his place, and our constituents, relating to the Molesworth airfield. The petition reads as follows:

The Humble Petition of the residents of villages in the Parliamentary constituencies of Huntingdom and Corby

Sheweth

That there is disruption locally as the result of legal and illegal protests against the siting of Cruise Missiles on the Molesworth air-base.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House

Remove the illegal settlements on or near Molesworth Airfield

Provide adequate policing of the area to prevent the return of the illegal settlements

Enforce the law vigorously: prevent intimidation of residents and theft of property throughout the area

Ensure that the cost of the operation does not fall on the ratepayers but is funded by Central Government.

And your Petitioners as in duty bound, will ever pray &c.

The terms of the petition have to a substantial extent already been met and I know that my hon. Friend's constituents join my constituents in thanking those who have made that possible. The petition has been signed by 90 per cent. of the residents of the parishes of Clopton and Titchmarsh in the county of Northamptonshire and the parliamentary constituency of Corby, 90 per cent. of the inhibitants of the villages of Old Weston and Molesworth in the county of Cambridgeshire and parliamentary constituency of Huntingdon, and a substantial number of residents of surrounding villages in both counties.

Our constituents greatly resent the inaccuracies and distortions that have appeared in the media in the past few days and desire me to say that many of the reports have been entirely wrong. Our constituents are anxious that hereafter they be left alone by the people still unlawfully surrounding the Royal Air Force base. They wish to be left in peace to get on with their lives in the ordinary way. There has been substantial damage to crops and trees, theft of property and a large number of unfair allegations against our constituents. These are deeply resented and I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdom joins me in expressing our support for our constituents and our determination to ensure that they are able to live their lives in peace hereafter.

To lie upon the Table.

Air Transport (Government Policy)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

1.58 am

Mr. Edward du Cann (Taunton): I have just one point to make and I am grateful for this opportunity to make it. I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for being here to reply to the debate.

The air transport industry is one of Britain's success stories, but we need to work at keeping it that way. We cannot afford any more company failures such as those which wiped out a large part of Britain's passenger and all-cargo capacity in recent years. Some good names have gone from the passenger world and especially from the cargo world—Scimitar, British Cargo Airlines, Pelican and Redcoat. British Caledonian and British Airways, both brilliantly led companies, no longer have all-freighter aircraft, unlike Lufthansa, Air France, KLM, Japanese Airlines, and so on. One asks "Why not?". The all-British jet aircraft fleet has reduced from 21 to four. That is worrying and dangerous and, in my view, the reduction need never have happened. So I shall tell the House, if I may, what should be done by way of remedy. Before doing so, I declare my interest. I am the chairman of the company operating three of the four remaining freighters, and chairman also of its parent. My experience prompts me to voice considerable anxieties about the health of the British air transport industry. Cargo carrying is a small part of the air transport industry but what I have to say applies also to the passenger carrying industry. In any event, I believe that it is in Britain's vital interests, both strategic and economic, to maintain an effective and profitable presence in the market.

The way things are going, we shall soon have no British cargo-carrying industry left. If that happens, we shall be at the mercy of foreign operators. I am convinced that that would be unacceptable. There is an extraordinary parallel with our merchant fleet. Flags of convenience and lack of co-ordinated Government support are decimating British shipping. I do not want similar circumstances to be allowed to eliminate our aviation fleet. The road hauliers, too, have similar worries.

What is the solution or remedy? The British Government must be more positive in defending British interests. That is my advice. The Government must put Britain first. That is the clear suggestion that I wish to make to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State.

It is clear that 1984 and 1985 are proving to be watershed years for British air transport. The long and hard battle by the United Kingdom and United Kingdom operators to win cheaper fares on many air routes, both long and short-haul, is having considerable success. That is to be warmly welcomed, especially if it means cheaper fares in Europe. So is the deregulation of the United Kingdom's domestic routes. That, too, is a good start. Let us hope that that is extended to international routes. The route-swapping arrangement between the state-owned airlines and privately owned British Caledonian have been successfully launched. We hope this year to see specific proposals for the privatisation of British Airways and the British Airports Authority, another body which is well led by Sir Norman Payne.

The Government deserve great credit for this progress, and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be able to keep up the good work. However, there are other matters to be considered. For instance, what progress is there with the draft European Community air freight directive? It is essential that further improvements at Stansted, Heathrow and Gatwick go ahead without any more delay. Facilities must be able to cope with the traffic. Another and more worrying matter is the decline of Britain's cargo-carrying capacity.

Policy in general was clearly laid down by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport in a speech given after the White Paper's publication in October 1984. I am glad to pay tribute to my hon. Friend, for I have the greatest respect for his ability and for his wisdom. I greatly agree with what he said in the speech to which I have referred, from which I shall quote. He said:

"Our long-term goal"—

I am sure that he remembers this—

"is to liberalise air transport wherever possible . . . where foreign competition is fair and British interests are not prejudiced."

He added:

"We will . . . ensure that . . . airlines . . . will not have to face unfair competition and . . . safeguards against anti-competitive behaviour are adequate".

I fully endorse those statements and objectives; my complaint is that they are not being carried out by the Government machine. There seems to be an irreconcilable difference between the stated objectives of Ministers and the Civil Aviation Authority on the one hand and, on the other, the actual rules and regulations of the Department of Transport. I pay tribute to the man at the CAA of whom I have seen most and with whom my company has been negotiating, Mr. Colegate. He is a most able and, invariably, helpful man.

I return to the CAA. Paper CAP 501 is a statement on air transport licencing policy which was published a month ago. It states that the Civil Aviation Authority

"will seek to ensure that efficient British Airlines have the opportunity to operate profitably so as to attract and justify the investment necessary for the maintenance of their services."

The thrust of what should be policy is clear enough and in line with the Minister's statements. The document also states:

"the authority will continue to pursue liberal policies for the regulation of scheduled service freight rates and freight charter services."

That statement sounds just fine to the uncommercial ear, but the reality is that, if we wish to create conditions where efficient British carriers can operate properly, we cannot pursue unilaterally liberal policies because the predatory foreigners will treat the United Kingdom as a port of convenience. That is happening today. The result is that the possibility of bankruptcy for the home team is not merely a possibility but a probability.

Equality of treatment between our own much-regulated industry and the under-regulated foreign industries is imperative. That is not protection, it is common sense. Almost every other country in the world—the United States, France, Germany — appears to recognise that need. In my view, the United Kingdom should also.

Of course, I do not suggest that it is solely the operating regulations that have affected British cargo carriers adversely. The advent of wide-bodied passenger aircraft with large freight capacity in their bellyholds has been a factor for cargo carriers to compete with.

The document shows clearly that the CAA aims progressively to reduce cross-subsidisation, presumably to the point where passengers no longer subsidise freight on passenger airlines. If it is true that passengers are subsidising freight, perhaps that is a subject that should be inquired into. In any case, the policy announced by the CAA cannot possibly be carried through if passenger carriers, and especially foreign passenger carriers, are allowed to reduce freight rates according to their desire for extra sterling revenue without any reference to the real cost of carriage, and thereby to compete unfairly in the United Kingdom. As I shall illustrate in a moment, it is a fact that the Government machine exacerbates an already difficult climate because it does not seem to practise what Ministers and the CAA both preach as policy.

I shall list four ways in which the British Government positively discriminate against British business. First, in spite of the Prime Minister's exhortation to buy British wherever possible, the Government have on occasion used foreign carriers to carry British aid. Why? I can think of no good reason. Surely it should be an invariable rule that all goods exported that have British Government support —if only ECGD cover—should be carried by British carriers. All other donor or manufacturing countries designate their carriers, and so should we. The phrase, "American wheat in American bottoms" is well known. I suggest that our rule should be British goods in British ships and planes.

Secondly, on 1 January 1986, United Kingdom carriers will be required to fit engine hush kits. Fitting hush kits to a Boeing 707 involves spending some $2·25 million —an expensive addition to costs. Yet European airlines will be allowed a one-year exemption. Why? Third world airlines will be allowed a two-year exemption. Again, why? Why should British carriers be put by the British Government at a competitive disadvantage in the British market against our foreign competitors? Why should foreign noise be acceptable in British airspace, and British noise not? Why put fetters on British companies that we do not put on our competitors?

Thirdly, I come to safety. The Government rightly insist on a high standard of safety in respect of British aircraft and British carriers. Of course I support that. But the Department of Trade and Industry merely relies on a certificate of competence from foreign carriers. There are no checks. It is a fact that some foreign carriers operate overloaded aircraft with lower maintenance standards and overworked crews, and thus enjoy a lower cost structure than the United Kingdom carriers. That is unfair competition at best, and at worst, it is highly dangerous. Sooner or later, as sure as that we are all here this evening, there will be a serious accident in British air space. Why do we let these people fly in our air space? In my view, the public interest, let alone fairness, demands equality of treatment by the Government of British and foreign carriers.

Fourthly, I turn to a slightly more complex matter. There is an old rule, called the "4 City Pairs" rule, operated by the United Kingdom and, so I understand, by no other country in the world, which allows foreign carriers to operate in and out of the United Kingdom, to and from countries other than their country of origin— in effect giving their aircraft almost unlimited freedom to do business in Britain. That is also monstrously unfair.

I do not believe that any foreign operator should be allowed to operate fifth freedom flying in or out of the United Kingdom if a British carrier is available to operate a third or fourth freedom flight in its place. In a word, all applications by foreign carriers should be subject to a no-objection rule by British carriers. At present, foreign carriers are pilfering cargoes which should be carried in the bellyholds of British passenger aircraft and by British cargo-carrying planes. I say to my hon. Friend the Minister as plainly as I can that that should stop forthwith.

I have given four examples of ways in which the British Government discriminate against British carriers and in favour of foreign carriers in contravention of their declared policies. I deplore the growing emergence in civil aviation of a flags of convenience problem; the same problem which for so long has been a scourge in the merchant shipping world.

The question has to be seriously asked whether the British Government, whom I strongly support, at the end of the day want there to be any remaining British-registered air-freighter airlines. If they do not, certainly a policy of masterly inactivity combined with further high-sounding but in practice empty statements should see the demise of my company and others. As I have said, that would leave the British exporter with no alternative but to use foreign carriers, which are certain to exploit this eventually to maximum advantage. It would leave the United Kingdom as the only major trading nation in the world—and the United Kingdom depends more than any other nation on foreign trade—without a national or quasi-national all-cargo carrier. That would be a damaging result for the national wellbeing, and it would arise from official carelessness.

It would also seem a curiously paradoxical situation when so many of the high-tech goods that we are increasingly beginning to export, naturally seek to travel as air freight, as distinct from the days when we were, for instance, exporting large amounts of steel or coal, whose natural means of transport were by ship. In my view, such a situation would be wholly unacceptable strategically and economically.

If, on the other hand, the British Government want to preserve their residual all-freighter aircraft capability—I am sure that they do, and that my hon. Friend the Minister does—and to increase the cargo revenues of British passenger airlines — which I am sure that the Government do—they must impose the same rules on predatory foreign carriers operating in the United Kingdom as they impose on their own carriers, so that conditions of more equal competition exist.

It is nonsense to talk about reciprocity. We often hear about that, but it is nonsense to talk about it when Britain offers opportunities to foreign carriers which are not offered in return. Reciprocity must mean parity not only in terms of regulation but in terms of commercial opportunity.

We in this country are major exporters of high value goods, and to compare, for instance, the opportunity for third world-based operators to fly out of the United Kingdom with the opportunity for a United Kingdom operator to fly out of their country is unlikely to be in any sense reciprocal.

In essence, therefore, we need conditions where British carriers are encouraged to compete as freely as possible with each other on a fair basis and where foreign carriers must comply with our regulations, if they are to be allowed to operate in the United Kingdom. Additionally, the frequency with which they are permitted so to operate should be governed by the extent to which that gives British carriers reciprocal commercial opportunity based on real cost.

As I have said, for strategic and economic reasons—and, I suggest, also for defence reasons—we need a healthy, British-owned, British-managed, all-cargo fleet capacity. Britain can have that asset, given good will and given the will to have it on the part of Her Majesty's Government. I hope that tonight the Minister will assure the House that that is exactly what will occur in future.

2.16 am

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) for allowing me a minute or two in which to intervene in his debate. I am grateful to him for giving the House, even though it is not well attended at this hour, the opportunity to have on record details of one of the most serious developments to be taking place, not just in the air freight industry but in the scheduled airline industry. I congratulate him on drawing attention at an early stage to the problem.

The Government say, on the one hand, that they passionately believe in free market forces, competition, deregulation, relaxing controls, breaking up monopolies, rolling back the frontiers of Socialism, bringing forward private enterprise practices, outlawing predatory actions and restoring pride of place to British companies. There is, however, a yawning gap between what they say they believe in and what is happening.

My right hon. Friend referred to the freight airlines. One could also mention the scheduled and charter airlines. Why do the Government, to take one example, allow United States airlines to take predatory action out of Heathrow by way of the fifth freedoms, so that they can fly across the Atlantic into Heathrow and their passengers can then go via other American aeroplanes to Europe, while the British companies are not allowed to fly out of Heathrow in competition to British Airways or any other European carrier? They are actually debarred from competing with other airlines. The Government must make putting that right one of their first priorities.

I join forces with my right hon. Friend in asking the Government to liberalise the airways and to prevent the predatory action of foreign airlines from doing our airlines out of business.

2.17 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): I wish at the outset to thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) for giving us this opportunity briefly to discuss the problems of the air cargo industry.

Recent discussion of civil aviation policy has tended, naturally, to concentrate on the passenger business, and my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) has played his part tonight, as he has on many previous occasions, in drawing our attention to the problems of that sector.

As the subject of this brief debate is air freight, I shall concentrate on that. Air freight plays an increasingly important part in international trade. In 1983-84, for example, goods to the value of £16·5 billion—13 per cent. of our total visible trade — passed through Heathrow airport. We estimate that nearly 20 per cent. of our total visible trade travelled by air. A large proportion of this was carried in the holds of British passenger aircraft, particularly the long-haul, wide-bodied jets which have such extensive cargo space. I understand that this increased ability to mix passenger and cargo traffic has, as my right hon. Friend suggests, put pressure on the specialist air cargo services. I very much agree with him, however, that these specialist services will continue to play an important role and warmly welcome this opportunity of considering the problems facing these specialist carriers.

I agree wholeheartedly that, in pursuing our aviation policies, we must be ever mindful of our national interests, with respect to the aviation industry and more particularly perhaps to its customers.

At the passenger end of the business, through increasing competition and deregulation, we have developed a multi-airline industry whose growing strength and effectiveness is becoming the envy of the rest of the world outside the United States. I agree completely with my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams that this strength must be maintained. This British airline industry is, as a result, well placed to meet the challenge of fair competition—like my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton and my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams, I emphasise fair competition—from whatever direction it comes. It is our express policy to widen the scope of this competition, especially within the Common Market which, so far as the airline industry is concerned, barely exists. Our objective must be to ensure that British airlines play their part in the Common Market.

As my right hon. Friend has so generously acknowledged, we are deeply immersed, through negotiation, in the process of pulling down the barriers to competition in Europe and opening up new opportunities for our airlines. My right hon. Friend encourages us to even greater effort, and I have listened most carefully to what he has had to say on this matter.

The anxieties which my right hon. Friend has expressed, with particular reference to the specialist freight business, are based properly on the question of how fair is the competition. In effect, he asks, are we in Britain still playing by the rules of cricket while the rest of the world swings rounders bats in our face? My right hon. Friend has given four examples of these anxieties, and I shall do my best to respond to them. If time runs out before I deal with all my right hon. Friend's various points, I shall write to him about the outstanding points.

I turn first to what my right hon. Friend had to say about fifth freedom rights. It is certainly true that there exists in Europe a liberal charter regime. A British operator who can obtain the business is free to carry cargo from the east midlands to Munich, pick up cargo there for Maastricht, and pick up another cargo in Maastricht for the east midlands. His costs are reduced because he does not need to fly an empty aircraft on the Munich-Maastricht leg.

It is also true that we would like a similar liberal regime to be adopted in other parts of the world. Some countries are, indeed, liberal in this respect. Others, I regret, are not. Because of the wider benefits of liberalisation, we freely permit most foreign airlines to operate four fifth freedom charter flights on any particular sector in each year—the so-called four city pairs rule, to which my right hon. Friend referred. We allow them to operate further flights if, and only if, they can show that no British carrier is ready and willing to carry the cargo in question on broadly comparable terms.
